When the question regarded rights which the citizens of one State might claim in every other, the Government of the Union seemed to be a disinterested arbitrator. But if he were to examine the conformity of State constitutions with that of the Federal Government, these were the rights which would least frequently be brought into question. In almost every instance we should be obliged to determine the extent and limit of our own powers. These were the "vexed" questions of the constitution. He had endeavored to show that we were not bound to decide them, and that we ought not to decide them. Suppose that the clause objected to in the constitution of Missouri related to the exemption of a national bank from taxation by the State, or to the power of Congress in calling out the militia. Is it not apparent that our interest in these questions disqualifies us for their decision? He was ashamed to have detained the House so long, and could not enlarge further upon the subject. But Congress was in every respect an unfit tribunal to decide upon the conformity of the Federal and State constitutions; it was a party to the compact, and interested in its construction, and, therefore, should not expound it; it consisted of two Houses which might not be able to unite in any opinion; its authority would be lost the moment that it was submitted to. The new State, which acquiesced in the decision of Congress, would be authorized, the next month, to appeal to another tribunal, and the power would last just long enough to irritate and not to coerce. He had said already that, under this system, Missouri must amend her constitution to propitiate our dignity, and re-enact it to assert her right. The examination of the constitution of Missouri had already shown the impracticability of the whole system. Among minds as active and curious as those which we might expect to find in the national councils, it might be believed that almost every article in the Federal Constitution would be exposed to different constructions, and that no form of government could well be presented by a State, (except, indeed, that form for exhibition to which he had before alluded,) which would not offer to constitutional critics a great many doubtful or repugnant clauses. He believed that the gentlemen who argued that the House was bound in conscience to examine the constitution of every new State rigidly, had examined that of Missouri but very superficially. Yet it was worth while to advert to the result of their examination. It was supposed at first, and the majority of the House perhaps still thought so, that the only clause which was repugnant to that of the United States, was the one which prohibited the admission of free negroes. In another body, however, it had been discovered that the provision of a State bank was equally unconstitutional. In our own we had heard to-day two or three other points asserted, and perhaps established by the gentleman behind him; and a friend from Ohio on his left (a zealous opponent of the resolution) was prepared to prove, that at least seven provisions in the constitution of Missouri were incompatible with that of the United States. Mr. L. was exceedingly sorry that he had not explained his views to the House; for all these arguments would prove, that if any State constitution were much examined, individuals whose objections would apply to different parts of the instrument, might form a majority for rejecting the whole. With a full examination, the best constitution would be rejected, but with the slight and partial examination which would much oftener occur, the worst provisions would be sanctioned. Mr. L. said that he had the most unaffected respect for the candor, as well as the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL,)

to one of whose views he was about to advert. But he must not lose the illustration which the argument of that gentleman had afforded, of the imperfection of any examination into a State constitution which could be expected in that House. The question was too important for fastidious delicacy.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had contended that the expression of free negroes and mulattoes in the debated clause must be considered in its broadest sense, and include those who are citizens of some of the States. And to illustrate his view he had told the House, that, although a State has a right to maintain ships of war, it has a right to do so only in time of war, and that any provision of a State constitution for a navy, although it would be legitimate if limited to war, could not be so construed if its terms were general, but would clearly impose upon Congress the duty of rejecting it. Now it happened that the fourth article of the Missouri constitution had a provision about a navy, not limited in its terms to a period of war, and in the view of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Congress were in conscience bound to reject it. In his view, if they did not reject, they would sanction it. Well, they made no objection to it; they had examined the constitution, and had not even noticed it. Could there be a stronger illustration of the mischief of a system which considers Congress as bound to denounce an equivocal and doubtful provision, and in the very act allows, what it considers as the plainest violation of the constitution, to pass unquestioned, if not unread? Is not the system a safer, as well as a juster, which exacts only of the new State that its obligations to the Confederacy shall be those of all the other States, which considers its constitution and ordinances as the evidence of its consent to become a State; and when we design that the rights and duties of the new and old States shall be the same, leaves them to be expounded and enforced by the same tribunal?

If we had, indeed, reserved to ourselves the power of deciding whether the constitution of Missouri were repugnant to the Federal Constitution, and the opinion of the House should be that this repugnance existed, it would become material to inquire how this judicial authority should be exercised? Should we, while exercising, in respect to a new State, the powers of the Supreme Court in respect to an old one, annul the obnoxious article? Should we, "in our brief authority," command it to be expunged? Or should we disfranchise the State, because it used words almost as carelessly as we ourselves had done in the act of the last session? But these inquiries carried him too far.

Mr. LOWNDES said, that, with the strongest wish to hasten to the conclusion of his remarks, he thought himself bound to notice a doctrine, which he understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have avowed. The talents and character of that gentleman gave to his opinions an influence which involved no light responsibility. It was with mortification and pain, Mr. L. said, that he had understood him to express the opinion, that, under a law enacting that a new State shall be admitted, Congress, particularly if an election shall have intervened, may consider its admission as "an open question," and fulfil or disregard the law of the preceding Congress at its discretion. He had anticipated, in his former remarks, the influence of this doctrine, but not its avowal. He should be glad to know, before he proceeded further in his observations, whether he had understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania correctly. [Mr. SERGEANT explained. He was understood by Mr. L. to say, that he had expressed no opinion on the matter, but had spoken of it as a doubtful question.] Mr. L. proceeded. If the gentleman did not deny, it was hardly less extraordinary that he should doubt, whether the Government of this nation were bound by the obligations of faith and honor. But he would change the subject.

Mr. L. said he regretted that he had already consumed so much time that he could not dwell upon the view which he should hope that men of prudence and virtue would take of the condition of our country, even if they differed from him in all that he had yet said. He thought, indeed, that we were bound to admit the members from Missouri to their seats. But no one would deny that we had power to admit them. It was a comparative question, between different schemes of policy, and the country had a right to require that its Representatives should not reject one plan without weighing and adopting some alternative. Was it enough to say, with the composure of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, "it is the fault or error of Missouri?" Be it so. But it is not less our duty to guard the interests of the United States and the rights of our fellow-citizens, even in Missouri. Those who had read the law of the last session could not deny that she had acquired some rights incompatible with the dependence of a Territory. But, whatever was her condition of right, she was in fact a State, administering the government which she had formed, and enacting the laws which she preferred. Her courts were filled with judges of her own appointment; and, whatever interest of the United States might be assailed; whatever provisions of the laws or Constitution of the Union might be violated, there was now no legal method by which "an error or fault," in her judicial tribunals, could be corrected.—Should there be no appeal from their sentence? Should there be an appeal to military authority? There was now no other; and when the Representatives of the people refused to extend over Missouri the judicial authority, which would bend her laws and constitution in just submission to that of the Union, it was fair to ask them what connexion they proposed to substitute? The nation would hardly be content to learn that we satisfied ourselves with a prudent reliance upon time and chance, because "it was the fault or error of Missouri."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has told us, that if a single citizen shall be deprived of his Constitutional right under the laws of Missouri, the fault will be upon the Congress which shall admit her. I tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. L. said, that if a citizen shall suffer in Missouri, and invoke ineffectually the laws and judicial authority of the Union, the responsibility for all that he shall suffer will be upon himself and his friends. It is he who refuses to extend the authority of our courts over the State of Missouri, and, wiser than the Constitution, he rejects the tribunal which would act peacefully and effectually in support of individual right, and prefers to it a direct coercion of the State by legislative, if not by military power. The Constitution has provided a remedy for the infractions of individual right—not a mere rule, but a court to apply and enforce it. Your injured citizens appeal to its prompt protection, and they learn with astonishment that, in your zeal to support their rights, you have suspended their only effectual remedy. As humanity to the citizen makes you deprive him of his only effectual guard, so tenderness for the Judiciary (unaffected and unmixed) induces you to withdraw from their jurisdiction a question which might involve a conflict with Missouri, and leave them only the task of deciding the same question in opposition to Carolina or Virginia.

Mr. L. repeated the opinion, that the question before the House was a comparative one—between adopting the resolution, or some other scheme of policy which gentlemen should prefer to it. Every consideration of candor and prudence required that we should know what that alternative was. Was it preferable? Was it practicable? Even since the debate had commenced, the character of the question had been greatly changed in the eye of every practical politician by the passage of the Senate's resolution. The Senate considered Missouri as a State of right. They could co-operate in no measure which would make her a territory, or treat her as such. If we refuse to pass the resolution, she must still continue to administer her government and appoint her officers; to decide in her courts every question relating to the rights and interests of the United States, within her territory, and to decide these questions without appeal. If, under these circumstances, Missouri were not rightfully a State, ought we not to make her one? It was under this view of the subject, Mr. L. said, that, in his former observations, he had brought the admission of Tennessee to the view of the House. She had formed a government for herself, not very regularly. She had elected her Governor and Assembly, and was a State in fact. Her constitution, however, besides some other articles which were objected to, contained three which were clearly repugnant to the Federal Constitution. It gave exemption from militia duty to certain classes of the community. It denied to the General Government the right to cede by treaty the free navigation of the Mississippi, and it required the Legislature to provide a method by which the State of Tennessee should be sued, excluding from this right of suing all those who were citizens of any other State. Congress knew these provisions, but it knew that the paramount authority of the Federal Constitution annulled them. Tennessee was declared to be a State; and so little was to be apprehended from a repugnance between the State and Federal Constitutions, (when Congress did not interpose in interpreting and expunging them,) that the fact of the discordance in question was probably at this time little remembered, even in Tennessee. The same consequence would follow from the passage of the resolution before the House. We should be relieved from a question which afflicts and alarms every man whose object is the public good. We should leave the construction of a doubtful provision to the only tribunal in whose determination, on such a subject, the nation will confide, and we should show a just anxiety to support the rights of the citizen, by no longer suspending his only effectual remedy.

After Mr. L. had concluded his speech—

Mr. SERGEANT rose and said, that, by the courtesy of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina, having opened the debate, had a right also to close it, and he did not mean to ask the House to depart from the usual course of proceeding, though he considered most of the arguments employed as susceptible of an easy answer. But he was not about to enter again into the discussion; he rose only to offer a few words of explanation.

He had been supposed to have misunderstood, or to have misquoted, the words of the resolution, when he had stated it to be to this effect: "And hereby is admitted," meaning to infer that the admission of Missouri was, by the resolution itself, to be by virtue of the resolution, and therefore, by the present, and not by the former legislation of Congress. He had certainly never intended, nor would he now consent, to make this a question of verbal criticism; the argument rested on much more substantial grounds. And if, in fact, the words of the resolution were, as they had been stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, that circumstance would not in the least change its character as a legislative act, and a legislative act, too, which must necessarily precede the admission of Missouri, and of course conclusively negated the assumption (upon which the whole argument on the other side rested) that Missouri was already admitted. He had quoted the resolution from memory, according to what he believed to be the substance. But he was now satisfied that, upon every principle of construction, he was correct, and, to satisfy the House, he had called upon the Clerk to read the resolution. It is, in the material part, as follows: "Shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and is admitted." In this clause, the adverb "hereby" is connected equally with the whole of what follows. The meaning is exactly the same as if it had been "hereby is declared to be, and hereby is admitted," or, "by this is admitted;" for, "hereby," and "by this," are equivalent. But he was, perhaps, dwelling too long upon a mere verbal question, as every one at all acquainted with the phraseology of the enacting parts of laws and resolutions, would perceive at once that there was but one way of reading these words. To show, however, how entirely unprofitable the criticism upon the supposed misquotation was, he would suppose the word "hereby" to be expunged, and the words to be simply "shall be," and "is admitted;" would not the sense be exactly the same? Would it not mean that Missouri is admitted by the resolution, and not until the resolution is adopted? Does not the necessity of any resolution at all import the same thing?

There was another point upon which he and those who acted with him were charged with error. They were supposed to be unmindful of the obligation of the contract in the law of the last session. He must say that this observation was grounded altogether upon the assumption of that which was the point in controversy, and which ought to be proved; that is to say, that the law of last session did amount to a contract. He had purposely avoided the inquiry as wholly unnecessary, because, even if the law of last session was to be considered as a contract, the people of Missouri had not complied with the terms proposed to them, and therefore could have no right to claim to be admitted; the constitution submitted did not conform to the provisions of the law of last session.

He said, he trusted he had as strong a sense of the binding nature of a contract, when once entered into, whether by the Government or an individual, as any one could have, or ought to have. But, however liberal a man might be in the construction of his own engagements, in favor of others, it was clear that, in the case of the public, implicit obedience to an obligation must necessarily be preceded by an inquiry, (which he conceived the gentleman from South Carolina had entirely passed over,) whether any obligation existed. We must examine, first, whether the law is to be deemed an ordinary act of legislation, or is in the nature of a contract. Upon this subject he had no hesitation to say, without entering further into the argument, at present, that there appeared to be strong reasons for thinking that an act authorizing a Territory to form a constitution of State government, ought to be considered as an act of ordinary legislation, and not as a contract, and that no change was made in the condition of the Territory until its constitution was submitted to Congress, and the State admitted into the Union.

He could see no reason for a different construction of the act, and there were some objections to it, in his opinion, of very great force. If it were to be deemed a contract, it would not only be binding upon the Congress who passed it, but upon any future Congress to whom the application might be made for admission, which would be an encroachment upon their authority, and the authority of the people by whom they were elected. Now, it must readily occur to every one who reflected upon the subject, (independently of the objection to binding a future Congress unnecessarily,) that, even between the passage of an act authorizing the formation of a constitution, and the time of applying for admission, circumstances might occur which would render it inexpedient to admit, and of which Congress ought to be left free then to judge; and that it would be extremely unwise and improvident to throw away the right to exercise a discretion on the subject. He could see no good purpose to be answered by it, and every consideration of policy seemed to him to forbid it. He said, however, he did not feel it necessary now to come to a decision of the question, for the reason he had already mentioned; the people of Missouri had not put themselves in a condition to claim the fulfilment of a contract, because their constitution was not conformable to the provisions of the act of last session.

Proceedings.

He would remark, that the instance mentioned of the States formed out of the Northwest Territory presented no analogy. The Territory there was ceded to the Union by the States who claimed to be the owners of it, and was accepted by the Union, on conditions mutually agreed. Among them was one, confirmed by repeated acts of the Government, that the Territory should be formed into States; that, when they had a certain population, they should be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States; and, in the meantime, certain great principles of civil and religious liberty were agreed upon for their government, which were to be deemed fundamental, and to be the basis also of the constitutions of the States to be formed.

When an alteration of some of the terms was thought necessary, the consent of both parties was required. This was a compact with the States who made the cession, not with the inhabitants of the Territory. It bears no resemblance, therefore, to the case of a State formed out of a territory purchased by the United States, belonging in sovereignty to the United States, and held free from the obligation of any previous engagement, subject to such disposition only as the general policy might direct.

He had thought it proper to submit this brief explanation, not so much with a view to express an opinion, (which he had before purposely avoided,) as to show that the question was open, and he would detain the House no longer, as he perceived that all were desirous to come to a decision on the resolution.

When Mr. S. had concluded his remarks, the debate ended; not, however, before Mr. Gross, of New York, had intimated his intention to move the previous question, with a view to close the debate.

The question was then taken, "Shall the resolution be engrossed, and ordered to be read a third time?" And on this question the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Cannon, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Garnett, Gray, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hooks, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Little, Lowndes, McCoy, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLane of Kentucky, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, Montgomery, T. L. Moore, Neale, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Overstreet, Parker of Virginia, Pinckney, Randolph, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Robertson, Settle, Shaw, Simkins, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, B. Smith of Virginia, A. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Swearingen, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker, Warfield, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Baker, Bateman, Beecher, Boden, Brush, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cook, Crafts, Cushman, Dane, Darlington, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Eustis, Fay, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Gorham, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hemphill, Hendricks, Hibshman, Hill, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Maclay, McCullough, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, Monnell, R. Moore, S. Moore, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Nelson of Massachusetts, Parker of Mass., Patterson, Phelps, Philson, Plumer, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sergeant, Silsbee, Sloan, Southard, Stevens, Storrs, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Tarr, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tracy, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Wendover, Whitman, and Wood—93.

And the resolution for the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union was rejected.

Mr. LOWNDES then rose, and said that he did not wish to be disrespectful to a majority of the House, as declared on the vote just taken, but he now felt it to be his duty to call on them, having rejected the resolution proposed by the committee of their appointment, to devise and propose to the House the means necessary to protect the territory, the property, and all the rights of the United States in the Missouri country.

A motion being made to adjourn, was decided affirmatively, and, at a little before sunset, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 14.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill to establish the district of Pearl river; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was recommitted the bill further to regulate the entry of merchandise into the United States from any adjacent territory, reported the same with sundry amendments, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the whole House.

On motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire whether any, and what, further provision ought to be made by law to secure the safe transmission of public moneys from the several land offices to the places of deposit designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SOUTHARD submitted the following resolution, which was read, and laid on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a statement of expenditures and receipts in the Indian department; also, the nature and extent of the contracts entered into, and with whom, from the establishment of that department to the present period.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill for the relief of Daniel McDuff passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then, on motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill, reported at the last session, for the relief of the family of the late Oliver H. Perry. But, it being discovered that Mr. HAZARD, of Rhode Island, one of the committee who reported the bill, was absent from the House on account of indisposition, the Committee, with the consent of Mr. RANDOLPH, rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

The bill for the relief of William McIntosh passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was by the House subsequently ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill authorizing soldiers to devise their bounty lands in certain cases, also passed through a Committee, and was ordered by the House to be engrossed for a third reading.

The report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the petition of John G. Bogert, was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and being reported to the House, was concurred in.

The bill for the relief of Margaret Perry passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[These bills and report, though respecting claims of a private and personal character merely, gave rise, in the course of their investigation, to more or less debate, occupying altogether a good deal of time.]

MILITARY PUNISHMENT.

The following letter from the Secretary of War was received and read:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Dec. 14, 1820.

SIR: In answer to that part of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, requiring this Department to show whether the order given by Colonel King of the 4th infantry, for shooting deserters taken in the fact, was approved by any general officer in the service of the United States, or was known to, and passed over in silence by him, as stated in the defence of said Colonel King, I have to enclose an extract of the letter of Major General Jackson, on that subject, which was transmitted to the House of Representatives with the copy of the trial of Colonel King, and which is published in the appendix of that trial. This extract contains all the information within the knowledge of this Department on that subject.

In relation to that part of the resolution which requires any information this Department may possess, showing that corporal punishment has been inflicted on any soldier, whereby he came to his death, I have the honor to state, that the only report of that kind, which has reached this Department, was the case of a soldier at Fort Proble, near Portland, in Maine. Major Brooks, a correct and intelligent officer commanding that post, in September last, reported that the death of a soldier, an habitual drunkard, who had been on a fatigue party, under Lieutenant Hobart, and had been confined by him, had caused much excitement among the citizens, who attributed the death of the man to the conduct of Lieutenant Hobart; that the civil authority had taken up the affair for investigation, to which Lieutenant Hobart had readily submitted himself. The report was accompanied with the enclosed certificate of the jury of inquest as to the correct conduct of Major Brooks and the other officers of the post, in relation to the transaction. It thus appearing that the affair would undergo an investigation in the district court of the United States, the Department did not think it proper to order a military investigation.

I have the honor to be, yours, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the SPEAKER of House of Reps.

FRIDAY, December 15.

Among the petitions presented to-day, was one, by Mr. WENDOVER, from the New York County Agricultural Society, praying that such protection may be extended to the national industry as is demanded by the best interests of the country; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill extending the time for issuing and locating land warrants to officers and soldiers in the Revolutionary war, which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. MALLARY, from a select committee, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Tyler and John Tyler, jr., of Vermont, (to renew and extend a patent for a certain invention, the term of fourteen years having expired since it was first granted;) which bill was twice read, and, on motion of Mr. LIVERMORE, who remarked that it perhaps involved a Constitutional question, as it might be contended that, after the expiration of fourteen years, the invention became, by the Constitution, vested in the public, the bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. SOUTHARD, was taken up, and, for reasons which he stated, having been slightly modified by the mover, it was agreed to.

The engrossed bill to enable soldiers to devise their bounty lands, was read the third time.

A debate arose on the merits of this bill, occupying more than an hour, in which it was opposed by Messrs. LITTLE, SMITH of Maryland, FOOT, ANDERSON, and McCoy; and was supported by Mr. GROSS, of New York, and Mr. COCKE.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the negative by a decided majority.

The engrossed bills for the relief of Margaret Perry, and for the relief of William McIntosh, were severally read the third time, passed, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Anti-Tariff Memorials.

H. OF R.

ANTI-TARIFF MEMORIALS.

The report made by the Committee on Manufactures, on the 30th ultimo, in relation to the anti-tariff memorials from Belfast, in Maine, and Richmond, in Virginia, being under consideration—

Mr. TYLER, of Virginia, having called up the report for consideration, said that he had taken that course under a sense of duty, and in the remarks which he should make, although he should be free and candid, yet he hoped he should violate no rule of decorum. The report was a severe denunciation against his constituents, and it became him to inquire whether they had properly subjected themselves to that denunciation or not. If, said he, they have approached this body in any other than a respectful manner, and he should be convinced of that fact, they should not find in him now an advocate, nor should he have been so lost to the respect due to himself as to have presented their memorial. In truth, he considered himself somewhat implicated in this business; for, certainly, if he had been the instrument through which an insult had been offered to this House, he should acknowledge himself to be greatly culpable. I claim, then, said he, a free inquiry into this matter. I have a right to call on the committee to point out distinctly the features in the Richmond memorial which shall be esteemed offensive. I do not mean to say that my constituents have presented themselves before you as humble suppliants—that their language is that of base menials—that they have appeared at your door covered in sackcloth, and trembling in your presence. No, sir; they have spoken as becomes freemen. They have exercised a Constitutional right in a manly manner. They have addressed you, with reasons potent and strong, against the adoption of a destructive policy. They have approached you, not as their masters, but as the servants of the people, on subjects of deep interest and high moment. The committee, in their report, have not ventured to deny to them the use of manly language in addressing this House. Unless I am grossly deceived in the character of the chairman of the committee, he would be among the last to narrow down the right of petition to a mere sycophantic appeal, couched in language humiliating and dishonorable; a language the offering of hypocrisy, and discreditable even to slaves. If, then, it be admitted to be the right of the people to speak forth their sentiments, and to speak them boldly forth, I pronounce that there is nothing in the Richmond memorial in the slightest degree offensive.

The committee have selected but one sentence from the memorial, as offensive; and, until some other be pointed out, I have a right to conclude that it, and it only, can be objected to. [Here Mr. T. read the sentence from the report.] Now, sir, said he, there is but one substantive allegation in the sentence, viz: that the advocates of manufactures may be considered more the enemies of commerce than the friends to the system which they support. He asked, in what was this offensive? It is speaking what the memorialists believe to be the truth; not that the advocates of manufactures had declared their enmity to commerce. This is the first report, I believe, with which the committee had favored us, and, therefore its views were not made known to the nation. They left themselves to be judged of by the fruit which they produced, and I feel myself at liberty to declare in my place, that their measures can be considered in no other light than as inimical to commerce. This is not a new proposition. It was the basis of our arguments against the bills reported at the last session—we proclaimed that you were aiming a destructive blow at two of the great interests in this community, its agriculture and its trade. What did you want with high duties, but to give the home manufactures the home market; and, when the destruction of trade would follow as a necessary consequence, how, let me ask, can you take on yourselves to be offended, when you are told in plain terms of the consequences likely to flow from your measures? This language I have held to you before, and you did not esteem it offensive; I again, here in my place repeat it, and I feel assured that no one will be fastidious enough to consider it insulting.

Let me simplify the case. You and myself differ in opinion on a particular subject; you avow a disposition friendly to a certain interest, and resolve on the adoption of a course of policy, destructive, in my mind, to some other interest; shall I not be permitted to say to you in the language of friendship or remonstrance, beware lest you deceive yourself—if you adopt this policy, you will be viewed as the enemy to the interest, which, according to your declarations, you would not destroy. This is all that the sentence quoted from the Richmond memorial can be construed to mean, and in it I can see no offence. Why should gentlemen be so sensitive on this subject? Does it become the Legislature of this nation to hunt through every clause of a memorial for the purpose of culling out a sentence or a monosyllable which may contain some hidden offence? My personal knowledge of the liberality of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, creates with me inexpressible astonishment at the strictures he has indulged in on this occasion. These strictures cannot have been intended in the whole of them, for the Richmond memorial. I am authorized to say they have not arisen so much from that as from the Belfast memorial. The report itself teaches me to draw this conclusion. The committee complain of the acts of the last session being imputed to an individual, and not to the House. Now there is no imputation of this sort in the memorial which I presented, and the representation of the bills reported at the last session, "as a piece of State machinery," is to be found in the Belfast memorial. I do not feel myself bound to interfere in behalf of the inhabitants of Belfast; they are represented on this floor, and it belongs to their representative, if he thinks proper to do so, to vindicate them from the strictures of the report. But I do regret that the committee should so have connected their anathemas with the interpolation from the Richmond memorial, as to have given rise to the belief that it contained the greatest and most crying offence. I trust I have succeeded in showing that none was offered from that quarter, and that none exists.

But the committee insist that by that memorial they have been misrepresented in regard to a fact, and that the statement in the memorial that a bill was reported to repeal the drawback system is not true. I readily admit that the memorialists have fallen into error on this subject, but I utterly deny that any propriety exists in the terms used by the committee in reference to this error. The report represents this fear of a repeal of the drawback system as being a mere phantom originating "in the fears and ignorance of those who raise it." These are strong terms, and the committee ought to have been certain that they were justifiable in their use. But while they are pleased to reprobate a mistake made by others in terms of great severity, I undertake to say and to prove that they themselves have fallen into a manifest error. The fear on the subject of drawbacks is not a mere phantom existing in timidity and ignorance, but it has "a local habitation and a name," given it by the proceedings in this very hall. The propriety of repealing the drawback system has been submitted to this House for consideration. A resolution was introduced at the last session, and is imbodyed in your journals, by a member from Kentucky, who is now near me, (Mr. TRIMBLE,) directing an inquiry into the expediency of that measure. It is not a mere phantom then arising from ignorance, but is a reality which, considering the respectable source from which it came, was deserving of inquiry on the part of the public. That it was deserving of investigation by the people, will readily be deduced from the language of the report, for it is acknowledged that, had a bill been reported to the House proposing the repeal, it would have justly called forth an universal burst of indignation. I leave it to the committee and the gentleman from Kentucky to determine whether in truth it be a measure of such a character as to merit the indignation of the public. If the word "resolution" had been used instead of "bill" in the memorial, the sentence would have been as perfect, and the reference equally strong; and I submit to the House to decide whether a mistake in the use of a word, called for the reproaches and severe strictures which have been indulged in on this occasion. The committee will pardon me for saying that they have let go the substance and caught at the shadow. If they had attended to the object of the memorial and not its phraseology, they would have seen that its object was to defeat any measure, whether a bill or a resolution, which might be intended to repeal the drawback system. It was a legitimate object, and although the committee have abjured all intention of acting on the subject, yet I think that, without any disparagement to themselves, they might have done so in language more temperate. It is insinuated that the mistake into which the memorialists have fallen, was wilful, and with a view to misrepresentation. Now, sir, I have a right to inquire into the reasonableness of this insinuation, so far as the inhabitants of Richmond were concerned. What object was to be effected by it? Was it with the view of obtaining signatures to the memorial? The committee must have known that such an object would have been preposterous and idle. They required no artificial aid, no phantom to unite them against the increase of duties. The South is already united on this subject, and the opposition is levelled on all hands against the proposed alteration in the tariff. There was, then, no object to be accomplished, and it is a forced and an unjustifiable inference that the mistake committed was intentionally committed. A decent respect, then, for the feelings of others should have left the committee to the use of milder language than that which they have employed.

The committee suggest that the right of petition will be brought into disrepute if the House was to sanction the language used in the memorial. I have shown to you that there is nothing offensive in the memorial which I presented; and while the committee avow themselves friendly to the right of petition, I ask, if this report is not calculated to destroy the exercise of that right? Will the people of this country condescend to approach you, if they are to subject themselves to your reproaches? Will they be so lost to themselves as to address you on subjects of great national concern, when they are liable to be scouted at as timid and ignorant? No, believe me, they will not. It does not comport with their character, nor the principles of this Government. They have a right to speak to you in the language of authority. Who are you, that you should thus elevate yourselves above them? Are you any more than their servants? If you be, sir, you have undergone a strange metamorphosis since the establishment of this Government.

I thank the House for its attention to me. I have no proposition in regard to the report now to submit. My object has been accomplished. My remarks will go forth to the nation, and, I trust, will be sufficient to relieve my constituents from any odium to which they may have been subjected; and any disposition which the House may give to the report will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. BALDWIN replied, and defended the report of the committee, in substance as follows: He referred to the language of the memorials on the subject, and the imputations on the motives of those who supported the system of protection last session, as well as to facts which these memorials falsely alleged, to show that the language of the report was justifiable; that it was strong but not rude, and might with justice have been stronger; that it said no more than that the unfounded allegations of the memorialists were untrue. Mr. B. was particularly sorry that exceptionable remarks were inserted in the Richmond memorial, inasmuch as it was the only one of all those opposed to the tariff which expressed a willingness that any thing at all should be done for manufactures, and was, therefore, characterized by a superior degree of liberality. He admitted the full right in the people to speak freely of the tendency of the measures of Congress, but not to come forward and charge the House with what was not true; that the tariff bills contained no provision for the abolition of drawbacks was obvious to every one who had read them, and therefore the petitioners had certainly asserted what was untrue. The only proposition relative to drawbacks was made in the resolutions of a gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. TRIMBLE,) which were never called up for consideration. These unfounded reports had been in circulation a year, uncontradicted in any manner which would counteract them; and it was the object of the report to simply perform this duty, and disabuse the public on the subject, &c.

Mr. TYLER rejoined, substantially, that, to correct any error in which a portion of the people may have fallen, it was not necessary to denounce them as timid and ignorant.

Mr. KINSLEY, of Maine, offered a few remarks, intended, as the reporter understood, not hearing him distinctly, to defend the memorialists of Belfast, in Maine, from intentional misrepresentation of the views of the supporters of the new tariff. If they had supposed that the proposition to abolish drawbacks was passed at the last session, their distance from the Seat of Government, and a reliance upon incorrect channels of information, might be presumed to have caused the misapprehension; and, at any rate, the mistake, he conceived, was not worthy of this long and labored report from the Committee of Manufactures, or the severity of language which it applied to them. He could not conceive why the committee had selected from all the memorials on the subject two from such distant and almost extreme points as Richmond and Belfast for their animadversion.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, submitted a few observations in explanation of the resolutions which he offered at the last session relative to the cash payment of duties, and to the repeal of the duties on drawbacks. When he moved those resolutions, he was not prepared to say the drawback system ought to be abolished, though there were petitions then before the House from some parts of the country praying Congress to repeal the system. His object was inquiry only, and he brought forward the resolutions that the whole subject might be before the House. He might say, however, that such a repeal was not sustained alone by the petitions to which he referred, but it was supported by the opinion of one of the first of men and of patriots in this country or in the world, he meant Thomas Jefferson. In a letter to a friend here, which Mr. T. had perused soon after he offered his resolution, that great statesman had pointedly suggested the expediency of abolishing the whole drawback system. Mr. T. said for what he had done he should not deem it necessary to appeal to the authority of any man, and he should not, therefore, have adverted to the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, deserving as it was of respect, but that his proposition on the subject of drawbacks had been treated rather cavalierly by those who had thought proper to animadvert on it.

Mr. SWEARINGEN moved that the report and resolutions of the Committee on Manufactures be ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN, in reply to Mr. KINSLEY, observed that the reason why the committee had selected the memorials of Richmond and Belfast was, that they only contained exceptionable and improper remarks on the friends of the tariff bills. He had no objection to laying the report on the table, as its object was merely, as he said before, to correct the misstatements which had gone abroad on the subject.

The report and resolutions were then ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, December 18.

A new member, to wit: from Massachusetts, AARON HOBART, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Zabdiel Sampson, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

DEATH OF MR. HAZARD.

Mr. EDDY, of Rhode Island, rose, and briefly announced to the House the decease, on yesterday, of NATHANIEL HAZARD, Esq., a member of this House from the State of Rhode Island.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. E., resolutions were unanimously adopted, expressive of the feelings of the House on this occasion; resolving to attend the funeral, this day, at two o'clock; appointing a committee to superintend the same; and resolving, also, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, to go into mourning, and wear a black crape round the left arm for thirty days.

Messrs. EDDY, MORTON, RUSS, SHAW, MALLARY, ARCHER of Maryland, and COCKE, were appointed a committee accordingly; and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 19.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Joseph McNeil, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which bill was read the first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st November last, requesting the President to lay before the House information relating to the progress and expenditures of the Commissioners under the fifth, sixth, and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent, I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with documents, containing all the information in the possession of that Department, requested by the resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14, 1820.

The Message was read, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting information in relation to the horses furnished by the mounted men in the war with the Seminole Indians; as also, in relation to the rules prescribed for compensating said men, not applicable to all other troops of the same description, furnished in obedience to the resolution of the 12th instant; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, a committee was appointed to inquire into the situation of the settlements upon the Pacific Ocean, and the expediency of occupying the Columbia river. Mr. FLOYD, Mr. METCALFE, and Mr. SWEARINGEN, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. FLOYD submitted the following resolution, which, under the rule, will lie on the table for consideration until to-morrow.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of War be required to lay before this House a statement of the number and situation of the military posts in the United States at this time; together with the distribution of the army; designating the number of men, also, the number and rank of the officers at each place.

On motion of Mr. PHELPS, a committee was appointed to investigate the affairs of the Post Office Department, with power to send for persons and papers, and Messrs. PHELPS, ARCHER, of Virginia, CULPEPER, ALLEN, of New York, and HOBART, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. MONELL, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, regulations can be adopted, consistent with the interest of the Government, whereby the soldiers of the late war, who have not received their bounty lands, can be better provided for than under existing laws.

Mr. EUSTIS submitted the following joint resolution, viz:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, and it is hereby declared, That, on the — day of — next ensuing, the State of Missouri shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever: Provided, That so much of the 26th section of the 3d article in the constitution of said State, presented to Congress at the present session, as makes it the duty of the Legislature to pass such laws as shall be necessary "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever," shall, on or before that day, be expunged therefrom.

The resolution was read the first time, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN submitted the following joint resolution, viz:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be authorized to adjourn the respective Houses from Friday the 22d day of December, 1820, to Tuesday the 2d of January, 1821.

The resolution was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, submitted the following resolutions, which, under the rule, will lie on the table for consideration until to-morrow.

1. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to prepare, and lay before this House, a statement showing the number and tonnage of the American and British vessels which have cleared from the ports of the United States for any port in the West Indies, the Bahama Islands, and Bermuda, in the years 1816, 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820, distinguishing, in the last year, those which have cleared before the 30th day of September, and those which have cleared since that date.

2. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to state to this House, as far as he has information, the number and tonnage of the French ships which have arrived, and are expected to arrive, in the course of the present year, in the river Saint Mary's, since the 1st of July last; whether their cargoes are intended for the consumption of the United States, and to be introduced within the territories of the same, in evasion of the revenue laws; and what further provision he deems necessary to be made by law for the more effectual collection of the revenue on the Southern frontier.

HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MERCER submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Buildings be instructed to inquire into the practicability of making such alterations in the present structure of the Hall of the House of Representatives, as shall better adapt it to the purposes of a deliberative assembly; and, if no such alteration can be effected, to ascertain whether it be practicable to provide a suitable Hall in the centre building of the Capitol.

Mr. M. briefly explained his object in offering this resolve, which, it would be observed, proposed an inquiry merely. It was, he said, utterly impossible, as every gentleman's experience must have taught him, to hear more than one half of the members who addressed the House, without changing one's seat for the purpose. For one, he declared, that, owing to this circumstance, he felt himself utterly incapable of discharging the duty imposed on him by his constituents. He had, he said, in anticipation of such a duty as he now proposed to devolve on the Committee on the Public Buildings, made it his business to examine the centre building. He had satisfied himself that the room intended for the Library, simpler in its structure than the present Hall, which was of a figure unfavorable to deliberation, would answer all the purposes of a Representative Chamber. It would be a room larger than that which often accommodates five hundred members in the British House of Commons; as large as that which has accommodated a more numerous body in Massachusetts; and larger than that which is occupied by a more numerous body than this in the State of Virginia.

The resolve for inquiry was adopted, as above stated, but not without opposing voices.

DANIEL McDUFF.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel McDuff," was read the third time; and on the question, shall it pass? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 70, as follows:

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill providing for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road, were discharged from the consideration thereof; and it was recommended to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

WEDNESDAY, December 20.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Morgan Brown," made a report thereon, recommending that the said bill be postponed indefinitely. The bill and report were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS made a report on the petition of Lewis H. Guerlain, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS also made a report on the petition of Alexander Milne, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS also made a report on the petition of John Rodriguez, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill in addition to the several acts making provision for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States during the Revolutionary war; which was twice read.

[The object of the bill is to provide for the case of persons who, owing to disability, cannot appear in open court to take the necessary oaths.]

The bill was laid on the table, for the purpose of being printed for better examination: before it should be ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the House then proceeded to consider the joint resolution submitted by him yesterday, proposing a recess of both Houses of Congress from Friday, the 22d instant, to Tuesday, the 2d day of January.

Mr. RHEA having expressed his wish to hear some reasons for this proposition—but no debate thereon arising—

The question on ordering the same to be engrossed for a third reading, was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows—For the engrossment 42, against it 110.

So the resolution was negatived.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia; and, the same being again read, were agreed to by the House.

Mr. ROSS submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House the names of all persons who have been prosecuted and convicted in the courts of the United States, under the act of Congress passed the 14th of July, 1798, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,' particularly designating in what State, and before what court convicted; the amount of the fine, together with the term of imprisonment inflicted on each defendant; also, the amount of fines paid into the Treasury of the United States, and by whom; the amount of such fines as may have been collected by the officers of Government, and which have not yet been paid into the Treasury of the United States; the time when collected; also, by whom, and from whom collected.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. FLOYD; and, being again read, Mr. LATHROP moved to amend the same, by adding thereto the following words: "and whether any of the officers of the Army hold any other office under the Government, and, if so, with what salary and emoluments."

And the question being taken so to amend, it passed in the affirmative.

The said resolution, as amended, was then agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of War be required to lay before this House a statement of the number and situation of all the military posts in the United States at this time; together with the distribution of the Army, designating the number of men; also, the number and rank of the officers at each place; and whether any of the officers of the Army hold any other office under the Government, and, if so, with what salary and emoluments.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Elias Parks," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The amendment was read, and concurred in by the House.

H. OF R.

Ohio and Michigan Boundary—Death of Mr. Slocumb.

DECEMBER, 1820.

OHIO AND MICHIGAN BOUNDARY.

The House then, on motion of Mr. SIBLEY, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution for fixing the boundary line between Ohio and Michigan.

[This resolution declares, that the line heretofore caused to be surveyed, marked, and designated, from the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, due east, in pursuance of the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate certain boundaries," passed May 12, 1812, so far as the same extends due east from the western boundary line of the State of Ohio, be and remain the established boundary line between the said State of Ohio and the Territory of Michigan.]

Mr. Ross, of Ohio, moved to strike out the whole of the resolution after the word "Resolved," on the ground that the line therein proposed is altogether different from that which has been established, not only by the description of boundaries contained in the Constitution of Ohio, but also in substance by the act of the Congress of the United States authorizing the formation of the constitution of that State, and by subsequent acts of Congress. In support of these positions, Mr. R. entered into an argument of some length. He contended, also, for the right of Ohio to a voice in the decision of this question, which, by this resolution, it was not proposed to allow to her.

Mr. SIBLEY, Delegate from Michigan, opposed the motion of Mr. Ross, in an argument of considerable length and detail, contending, as well for the right of Congress to settle this question as for the justice and expediency of establishing the line as now proposed.

When Mr. S. concluded, the Committee rose, and, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, were discharged from the further consideration of the resolve, and it was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

THURSDAY, December 21.

DEATH OF MR. SLOCUMB.

Little business was transacted in either House of Congress to-day, both bodies having adjourned at an early hour, to make arrangements to attend the funeral of a deceased member of the House of Representatives, and, as a mark of respect, usual on such occasions.

As soon as the Journal was read in the House of Representatives, Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, rose, and announced to the House the decease of JESSE SLOCUMB, Esq., a member from the State of North Carolina; and, on the motion of Mr. SMITH, resolutions were then unanimously adopted expressive of the feelings of the House on this occasion; resolving to attend the funeral, this day, at three o'clock—appointing a committee to superintend the same—and resolving, also, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, to go into mourning, and wear a black crape round the left arm for thirty days.

Messrs. SMITH, of North Carolina, BURTON,

FISHER, HOOKS, SETTLE, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and DAVIDSON, were appointed the committee of arrangements.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, also, it was resolved that the Speaker of the House acquaint the Executive of the State of North Carolina, with the vacancy occasioned in the representation from that State by the death of Mr. SLOCUMB.

FRIDAY, December 22.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to establish a port of entry in the district of Sandusky, in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing an "organization of the army, as proposed under the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th of May, 1820," which is intended as a substitute for so much of table A, which accompanied his report upon the reduction of the army, as relates to the details of organization; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TRACY submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement, showing the number of soldiers recruited for the service of the Army of the United States during the year 1820, indicating the fund out of which the expenses of said recruiting have been paid; and, if any unexpended balance of a former appropriation has been used, in what year said appropriation was made.

MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill extending the time for locating Virginia military land warrants.

The blank for the term of extension was filled with two years from the 1st of January, 1821, and the time within which returns may be made was fixed at four years.

And the bill being further amended, the Committee rose and reported the same to the House; and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. DARLINGTON in the chair,) on the bill to repeal the act entitled "An act to lessen the compensation of marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned." Considerable discussion took place on the subject of the bill among the legal gentlemen of the House, which ended in the Committee's rising and reporting progress. The Committee were then discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and it was recommitted to a select committee.

The House then, on motion, adjourned to Tuesday next.

DECEMBER, 1820.

Colonel James Johnson—Death of Mr. Burrill.

H. OF R.

TUESDAY, December 26.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a system of field service and police, and a system of martial law for the government of the Army of the United States, submitted in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States of the 22d of December, 1819; which, with its enclosures, was, on motion of Mr. PLUMER, referred to the Military Committee, and ordered to be printed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis,' with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments were concurred in by the House.

Mr. MONELL submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish this House with an account of compensation to counsel to assist district attorneys, and judge advocates in their office, for the last eight years, and to whom such compensation has been made.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the engrossed bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office," was recommended to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to establish a port of entry in the district of Sandusky, in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COOK submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the number of soldiers of the late army to whom warrants have been issued for military bounty land; and, also, the whole number of soldiers, who, from the date of their enlistment, and have not received such warrants, will be entitled to receive such bounty, designating, in both cases, the number of double and single bounties.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. TRACY on the 22d instant, and the same being again read, was concurred in by the House.

COLONEL JAMES JOHNSON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Dec. 22, 1820.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st of December, 1820, directing that the Secretary of War communicate to that House what sums of money have been actually paid to Colonel James Johnson, on account of transportation furnished the expedition ordered up the Missouri river; and, also, what sums have been paid him for detention of steamboats, or other incidental charges, and the causes of such detention; whether any difference of opinion existed between the Department of War and the said Colonel James Johnson, relative to the value of transportation or other charges exhibited by him against the United States; and what evidence was submitted to them, on which they formed their opinion—I enclose a letter to this Department from the Quartermaster General, which, with the documents accompanying it, contains the information directed to be communicated. By reference to the report, it will appear that a difference of opinion existed between the Department and the contractor in relation to the charges of the latter; and that, according to the terms of the contract, the points of difference were referred, as was stated in the report of this Department to the House of Representatives of the 2d of February last. It was in the first instance determined to have the reference at or near to St. Louis; and General Rector, of that place, was selected with that view, on the part of the Government, and Colonel Morrison, of Lexington, Kentucky, on that of the contractor; but, on application on the part of the contractor, the place was changed to this city, under the belief that it would be a mutual accommodation, and facilitate the ultimate decision. It thus became necessary to select other persons, and Commodore Rodgers was chosen as the referee on the part of the Government, and General John Mason, of Georgetown, on that of the contractor; and, with the assent of the parties, the Attorney General of the United States was selected as the umpire. The Attorney General having declined to act, the arbitrators, in conformity to the terms of the contract, select Walter Jones, Esq., as umpire.

The statement of the amount which has been paid to the contractor, contains not only the amount paid for transportation on the Missouri, but also that on the Mississippi and the Ohio, and comprehends the sum paid to him for transportation performed both in 1819 and 1820. It may be proper to remark, that the expedition (for reasons stated in the report of the 2d of February, already referred to) not being completed in the Summer and Fall of 1819, as was expected at the time of forming the contract, the Department proposed that the rate of transportation necessary to complete the movement should be fixed, as both the contractor and the Government had acquired such a knowledge of the subject as to enable them to determine what ought to be allowed with some degree of certainty, to which the contractor assented; and the rate was fixed at eight cents per pound to the Council Bluffs.

The account of the contractor for transportation, particularly for this year, is not finally adjusted; but it is believed when it is, the account will be found to be nearly balanced.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. JOHN W. TAYLOR,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. COCKE, the letter and its accompaniments were ordered to be referred to a select committee. Messrs. COCKE, MALLARY, OVERTREE, and SETTLE, were appointed by the Speaker to be the committee.

The Secretary of the Senate then came in with a message, announcing the death of the Honorable JAMES BURRILL, Jr., a member of that body and that his funeral would take place from the Senate Chamber, at half past ten o'clock to-morrow.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. EDDY, it was—

Resolved, unanimously, That this House will attend the funeral of the Honorable JAMES BURRILL, Jr., late a member of the Senate from the State of Rhode Island, to-morrow, at half past ten o'clock, A. M.; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning, and wear crape for thirty days.

The House then adjourned to Thursday next.

THURSDAY, December 28.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the officers of the army a salary or stated sum of money per year, instead of the pay and emoluments as now allowed by law.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of the appropriations necessary for the service of the year 1821; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RICH gave notice that, on Tuesday next, in case he should be able to obtain the floor, he should submit a proposition for instructing a proper committee to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, prospectively, the importation of distilled spirits and malt liquors, and sundry manufactured articles which come most in competition with domestic fabrics.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That no lands purchased from the United States on or before the first day of July last, shall be considered as forfeited to the Government for failure in completing the payment thereon, until the 31st day of December, 1821; and that all persons indebted to the Government for lands shall be permitted, on or before the day aforesaid, to surrender to the register of the general land office of the district in which their purchase or purchases have been made, by half-quarter sections, or legal subdivisions of fractional sections, any part of the quantity which they respectively hold, and the sums which such persons may have paid on the land so surrendered shall be carried to their credit on the quantity retained; the quarter sections and fractions shall be divided for the purpose of surrendering, as by law is now directed. No interest shall be charged against any person for moneys due and unpaid on any tract surrendered as aforesaid, or on any tract retained and paid for on or before the said 31st day of December, 1821; and on complete payment being made for any tract, agreeably to the provisions of this act, a patent shall issue, as in other cases.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all persons indebted to the Government for lands, shall, on payment in cash of the whole purchase money, for any tract, on or before the 31st day of December, 1821, be allowed a deduction of — per cent. on the original price at which their lands were purchased, excluding interest, and computing the moneys already paid as a part of the said purchase money.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons indebted to the Government for lands, and who shall not, on or before the 31st day of December, 1821, have made payment therefor, shall be permitted to pay the sums by them respectively due, in — equal annual instalments, without interest, the first of which shall be payable the — day of —; and a failure to make payment of any of the aforesaid instalments at the time they may become due, shall deprive the person so failing of all the benefits to be derived from this section.

The bill was twice read and committed.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. SMYTH, from the Military Committee, reported the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the first day of May next, the Military Peace Establishment of the United States shall consist of six thousand non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, with a due proportion of field and company officers, according to the present organization of companies, and in such proportions of artillery and infantry as the President of the United States shall direct; and, that the corps of engineers, as at present established, be retained in service.

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States cause to be arranged the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the several corps of troops now in service, in such manner as to form and complete the corps to be retained in service under this act, consolidating the corps of ordnance and the corps of light artillery with the corps of artillery, and the corps of riflemen with the infantry, and cause the supernumerary officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, to be discharged from the service.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be one Brigadier General, with one Aid-de-Camp, one Assistant Adjutant General, and one Assistant Inspector General; there shall also be one Adjutant General, one Quartermaster General, and one Judge Advocate, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments, of a Colonel of Cavalry, as heretofore prescribed by law. There shall also be a Paymaster General, with a salary as heretofore fixed by law; a Commissary General of Purchases, with a salary of two thousand dollars per annum, and one Assistant Commissary General of Purchases, whose compensation shall not exceed two and a half per centum on the public moneys disbursed by him, nor the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum; and two Military Storekeepers, to be compensated as heretofore; one Commissary General of Subsistence, with as many assistants as the service may require; one Surgeon General with a salary of two thousand dollars per annum, and one Apothecary General, with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars per annum.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be, to each regiment of infantry, and to each battalion of artillery, one Adjutant, one Quartermaster, and one Paymaster, one Surgeon, and one Assistant Surgeon.

And be it further enacted, That the Topographical Engineers and their assistants shall be discharged from the service of the United States.

And be it further enacted, That the Judge Advocate shall keep an office in the City of Washington, and, in addition to the duties which may be assigned to him by the President of the United States, he shall keep a record of all trials by general courts martial, and report the decisions.

H. OF R.

And be it further enacted, That all officers of the army whose continuance in service is not provided for by this act, shall be discharged from the service of the United States; and that, to each commissioned officer, who shall be deranged by virtue of this act, there shall be paid, in addition to the pay and emoluments to which he shall be entitled at the time of his discharge, three months pay.

The bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, gave notice, that on the 8th day of January, he should move to take up for consideration the bill, reported at the last session of Congress, to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida. He had been reminded of it, he said, by the bill reported this day by the Committee on Military Affairs, for the reduction of the Army.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, explanatory of his report of the first instant, upon the state of the finances; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 21, 1820.

SIR: In conformity with the provisions of the eighth section of the act of 1st May, 1820, entitled "An act in addition to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," statements are annexed to the estimates, of the public expenditure for the year 1821, which are herewith transmitted, showing—

1. That the permanent appropriations, and those for a term of years not yet expired, amounted to $11,381,975 00
2. That, of the sums appropriated for 1820, and previous years, it is estimated that there will remain on the books of the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1821 - 6,907,619 03
3. That there will be, on that day, in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent of the War and Navy Departments - 927,241 29
4. That the whole amount of unexpended balances of appropriations subject to the disposition of the Executive Government during the year 1821, is estimated at - 7,834,860 32
5. That, of that sum, there will be required to defray the expenses incurred in 1820, or necessary to effect the objects for which the several appropriations were made - 3,632,659 41
6. And that there will remain unexpended, and not necessary to effect the objects for which the several appropriations were made - 4,202,200 91

As it is ascertained that the sum of $4,202,200 91, with the exception of $1,860,437 57, which have been deducted from the estimates of the War Department for 1821, and which will form a part of the expenditure of that department during the year, will not be required, if that amount should be directed to be carried to the account of the surplus fund, the estimates for the year 1824, and the balance against the Treasury on the first day of that year, as presented in this report, will remain to be provided for.

It may be proper to observe, that all sums which will be carried to the account of the surplus fund on the 31st day of this month, are not comprehended in any of the foregoing statements.

Inaccuracies having been discovered in the estimate of the probable expenditure of the year 1821, presented in the annual Treasury report of the 1st instant, resulting, principally, from the different manner of keeping the warrant and appropriation accounts in the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, I avail myself of this occasion to correct those inaccuracies, and to present the amount of the deficiency which will have to be provided for during the ensuing year.

The receipts into the Treasury during the year 1820, and the amount remaining in the Treasury on the first of January of that year, were estimated in the annual report at - $22,326,244 63

The payments from the Treasury to the 30th of September last, amounted to - 16,908,413 80

Which, being deducted from the aggregate amount above stated, leaves for the service of the 4th quarter - 5,417,830 83

The payments made in the 4th quarter, and those which are required to complete the service of the year 1820, are as follows:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous,
already made - $476,920 05
And to be made - 930,293 51
1,407,213 56

Military department, already made - 93,688 90
And to be made - 665,164 61
758,853 51

Naval department, already made - 1,446,228 00
And to be made - 1,110,000 00
2,556,228 00

Public debt, payments already made, and to be made - 4,900,000 00

Making the aggregate sum of - 9,622,295 07

And leaving a balance against the Treasury, on the 1st of Jan. 1821, of - $4,204,464 24

To avoid complexity, the sums estimated to be necessary to complete the service of the year 1820, or to effect the objects for which the several appropriations were made, are, in the above statement, considered a charge upon the Treasury during the fourth quarter of the year; although it is probable that a portion of those sums may not be drawn until late in the ensuing year, and possibly a small part not before the year 1822. In the annual report no sum was charged upon the fourth quarter, but what was understood would be drawn.

H. OF R.

Treaty of Ghent.

DECEMBER, 1820.

The estimate of the receipts into the Treasury during the year 1821, presented in the annual report of the Treasury, amounts to - - - $16,550,000 00

The estimate of the public expenditure for that year is as follows:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous - - - 1,769,850 04

Civilizing the Indians, and Indian trade - - - 29,200 00

Military department, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian department, revolutionary and military pensions, arming the militia, arrears prior to the 1st Jan'y, 1817, and the sum of $1,-860,437 57, which has been deducted from the estimates, and is not included in the above balance against the Treasury - - - 6,798,515 18

Naval department, including the gradual increase of the Navy 3,428,676 81

Public debt, being the amount of principal and interest payable in the year 1821 - - - 5,477,776 76

Amounting together to - - - 17,504,018 79

Which presents an excess of expenditure beyond the receipts, of - - - 954,018 79

Which, added to the balance estimated against the Treasury on the 1st January, 1821, of - - - 4,204,464 24

Leaves to be provided for the sum of 5,458,483 03
But the Secretary of the Navy has stated, in his letter of the 18th inst., herewith transmitted, that, of the appropriation of $1,000,000, for the gradual increase of the Navy, not more than $500,000 will be required in 1821; and the residue being deducted - - - 500,000 00

Will leave a balance against the Treasury of - - - $4,658,483 30

It will be perceived that this balance is less than that presented in the annual report of the Treasury, by $2,793,103 74; which amount consists, 1st, of the sum which, it has since been found, will not be wanted for the naval service; 2nd, of balances of appropriations, for civil list and miscellaneous objects, which, it appears upon subsequent examination, will not be required; 3d, of an excess in the estimate in the charge for the military service, resulting from the different mode of keeping the warrant and appropriation accounts in the different departments; and, 4th, of the balance in the hands of the Treasurer, on the 1st of January, 1820, as agent of the War Department, which ought to have been deducted from that charge, as it had already been drawn from the Treasury.

In determining the amount of the loan which will be necessary for the service of the year 1821, if that shall be the only mode resorted to for meeting the deficiency, it is proper to state that, of the sum now in the Treasury, there are upwards of $600,000 of special deposit, which cannot be available during the year. The time necessary to transfer the revenue collected in the Western States, and in those bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, beyond what is expended in those States, to the places where it will be expended, may be estimated upon an average at six months. One-half of the sums collected in those States may, therefore, be considered, through the year, as in a situation not to be applicable to the demands upon the Treasury, as it will be in transitu between the places of collection and those of expenditure. If this amount be stated at $600,000, there will be, through the year, the sum of $1,200,000 which cannot be considered as available.

To insure the prompt discharge of all demands upon the Treasury, and to place the public credit beyond the reach of accident, the sum of $1,000,000 ought to remain in the Treasury. It is probable that, of the appropriations for 1821, nearly that amount will remain in the Treasury, or in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent, at the end of the year. But it is considered unsafe to trust to that contingency. It is, therefore, respectfully submitted, that provision be made for raising the sum of $7,000,000, in aid of the funds which it is estimated will be received into the Treasury during the year 1821. If that amount should be raised by loan, the interest of the debt thus created will increase the public expenditure, and render the amount proposed to be raised indispensable.

I remain, with respect, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

The Hon. J. W. TAYLOR,
Speaker House of Representatives.

TREATY OF GHENT.

On motion of Mr. MALLARY, the House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Secretary of State on the expenses attending the execution of the 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, made in pursuance of a resolution of this House.

Some conversation took place as to what committee should be referred the examination of this subject. Mr. MALLARY proposed a select committee, another gentleman proposed the Committee of Foreign Relations, &c.

In the course of the conversation—

Mr. COBB said it was time some inquiry should be made into the subject, for, from this report, it appeared that the survey of the Northern boundary line, under these articles of the treaty, was likely to cost the United States a pretty round sum—having already cost the Government, as appeared by this report, only a hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars.

Mr. MALLARY said his object was to have an investigation of the matter; to see whether the progress of the commission had been proportionate to its expenditure, &c. With that object only in view, it was not material to him what committee the subject was referred to.

Mr. FOOT preferred that the subject should be referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, with which it had an evident connexion. He further remarked that it could not be objected to its going to that committee, that they had before them at present any very important business.

The subject was finally referred to a select committee; and Messrs. MALLARY, LOWNDES, CANNON, HENDRICKS, and LINCOLN, were appointed a committee accordingly.

NOTES IN PAYMENT OF DUTIES.

Mr. LOWNDES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that the notes of no banks by which notes below the amount of five dollars are, or may be, issued, shall be taken in payment of duties or debts to the Government of the United States.

In introducing the resolution, Mr. L. adverted to the viciousness of the currency where notes for dollars and parts of dollars supply the place of specie, as, where such notes are issued, they always will. He spoke also of the efforts made in some of the States, and now making in Virginia, to banish those notes from circulation—efforts which were always vain, so long as such notes were issued by neighboring States, &c. No authority but Congress, he contended, was competent to correct the evil in any manner; and, the object of his resolution being for inquiry only, he did not anticipate any sound objection to its adoption.

Mr. STORRS said he had no decided objection to inquiry into this subject, but he hoped the House would reflect on the effect which the adoption of the measure suggested would have, in giving a preference to the notes of the Bank of the United States over those of all other banks. He hoped that the Committee of Ways and Means, whose information on such subjects was so extensive, would examine this question in all its bearings, and present their views of it to the House.

Mr. LOWNDES said it was hardly possible to suppose that the committee would not know, as every member of the House would see, that the effect of the adoption of such a measure must be favorable to some banks and unfavorable to others. But, Mr. L. said, there are many banks, and those among the best in the States, which do not issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars. It was for the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire whether the Government should not lend its aid to produce uniformity in this respect.

Mr. MEIGS agreed in opinion with his colleague, and was opposed even to authorizing an inquiry into this matter. When this great Bank of the United States had furnished the Union with a circulating medium of equal value in all parts of the Union, he might perhaps be inclined to give it further facilities; but, for the present, he would not, for one, consent to go further in this respect than Congress had already gone. The Secretary of the Treasury had already the power to forbid the reception of notes not in good credit, by the collectors, &c., which he had duly exercised. If a measure of the sort now proposed were to succeed, the notes of a great majority of the banks in the United States would cease to be receivable in payment of taxes, and would be driven from circulation. He could see no other effect which could flow from the adoption of the regulation suggested in the resolve, but to give an almost exclusive circulation to the notes of the Bank of the United States, and he was therefore opposed to the resolve.

Mr. SOUTHARD spoke in favor of the resolve. He thought it was bad policy ever to have permitted the banks to issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars, and believed that such issues had a great agency in driving specie from circulation a few years ago. He was of opinion that excluding the small notes from circulation would restore specie to its former general currency.

Mr. LOWNDES spoke in reply to Mr. MEIGS, denying that the particular object of his motion was to benefit the United States Bank. Suppose no such bank were in existence, he said, and the interest of the country required that its currency should consist in part of gold and silver, and not of paper merely, would it not be well, under such circumstances, at least to inquire into the policy of prohibiting the circulation of notes of a denomination under five dollars—the effect of which measure would be to substitute specie, in part, for notes, in the circulating medium of the country? The object of the resolution was not to institute an inquiry in order to benefit the Bank of the United States; but, if it were the policy of the country to encourage the circulation of specie, which he presumed no man would doubt, he asked whether that policy ought to be disregarded, because a resort to it might incidentally benefit the Bank of the United States? If it were true that the Bank of the United States had not afforded a circulating medium of equal value, &c., that itself would be an argument not against, but in favor of this inquiry.

Mr. MEIGS resumed the floor. The great Bank of the United States, he contended, had not fulfilled the duties which it was expected to have performed. There were a hundred banks in the States, he said, about the legality of whose institution there were no doubts, whose paper was as current and in as high credit as that of the Bank of the United States, and who issued notes of a less amount than five dollars. And why should they not? Was the circulating medium of the country intended only for men who deal in tens and hundreds of dollars? The object of this resolution, he said, was plainly neither more nor less than to restrain the circulation of the notes of banks issuing notes of less than five dollars, and of course to benefit the Bank of the United States by making its notes the only current paper. He was, therefore, yet decidedly opposed to this proposition.

Mr. TRIMBLE said he should vote for the proposed inquiry, and regretted the opposition to it. The people of the United States, he said, expected that the National Government would make the inquiry, and do what appeared, on inquiry, to be within the scope of its power, to restore to this country a sound circulating medium. At a former session, a report had been made to this House, in which it had been suggested that a circulating medium might be established, to consist of small coins of convenient denominations. He presumed it was intended to take up the subject at the present session, and, if possible, to adopt some measure to carry that idea into effect. He observed, by the way, that with regard to the Bank of the United States, he was not much disposed to offer to it any advantages in addition to those which it already enjoyed. Adverting to what had fallen from other gentlemen respecting small banks and small bank notes, Mr. T. said that Congress had set the example to the States in establishing them; in this District, with a population of some thirty thousand, Congress had established twelve banks, and it had a branch of the Bank of the United States besides. Mr. T. here alluded to the miserable small notes in circulation in the District, respecting which he made a ludicrous comparison, which the reporter did not hear with sufficient distinctness to commit to paper. He hoped some measure would be adopted by Congress to effect a circulation of coins for all transactions under five dollars. It was expected from Congress. It was in the power of Congress alone to effect this object, and Congress had already too long delayed the exercise of the power.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks on the proposition before the House, the object of which he understood to be to exclude from circulation all bank notes under five dollars, with a view to introduce, in place of them, a specie currency. Such a measure, Mr. S. believed, would have the effect to prevent the general exportation of specie whenever there was a demand for it abroad, by dispersing it over the country, in such a manner that it could not readily be gathered together in large sums. Mr. S. showed, by reference to what had taken place in different parts of the country, and more recently by voluntary arrangement of the banks in Baltimore, that such would be the effect of the exclusion of small notes from circulation. Whether it was politic to do, in this respect, what would have the appearance of striking at the State banks, was another question; there could be no doubt, however, of the authority of Congress in this regard within the District of Columbia, nor of the expediency of exercising it, &c.

Mr. SILSBEE made a few observations to the same effect as those of Mr. SMITH. He was in favor of the resolution, and believed that the sooner the circulation of these small notes was stopped the better it would be for the country.

Mr. MERCER, in expressing his approbation of the resolution, said he was surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky should have reflected so pointedly on the District of Columbia; for, as the old saying is, those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. Of the banks of this District, he would only say that he believed they were in a better state than any beyond the Alleghany mountains; and, with respect to the circulation of small notes within the District, the people of the District had been the first to direct the attention of Congress to the subject; and he intimated the hope that the session would not pass without making some provision to restrain these issues of notes, particularly by the corporations of the city and towns of the District. With respect to the Bank of the United States, Mr. M. said it had nothing to do with this question. Whenever that subject should properly present itself to the House, he should take the opportunity to offer some few remarks on the impolicy of affording further advantages to that already powerful institution.

Mr. BALDWIN said he was unwilling at any time to oppose a proposition having for its object an inquiry into the expediency of any measure. But this was an exception. It was the beginning of a system of legislation which looked towards an interference with the State banks. The next step might be, to propose that no notes of State banks should be received in payments to the United States. The same principle as is found in the proposition suggested in this resolution, would equally justify that legislation which he had just mentioned. It is best to stop, said Mr. B., before we begin this course. What we have already done has led to a question of the rights of States to lay taxes; in regard to which some think the judicial decision has been too much against the States. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. B. said, had already a discretionary power on this subject. Why then should this House take the matter up, when the proposition submitted was at least of questionable character? He knew of no motive which could induce him ultimately to sanction the proposition; but, before he would even vote for an inquiry into it, he must have much stronger reasons in its favor than had yet been assigned.

Mr. TRIMBLE said he well recollected the proverb which the gentleman had quoted to him. The example of multiplying banks, however, was set by the Congress, and the people of Kentucky but followed it; and that example had a powerful effect. Whatever might be thought of Congress immediately around the Seat of Government, at a greater distance a very high opinion was entertained of them; and when they established the twelfth bank within this District, the people at a distance thought it a wonderfully wise measure, and the good people of Kentucky followed the example which Congress had set them. Congress, Mr. T. said, had set a pernicious example in this respect, and ought to be prompt in acknowledging their error and retracting it as far as practicable. The adoption of this resolution would be one step towards doing so.

Mr. MERCER said, if the subject had been the policy of multiplying banks, he should have thought himself unhappy in the proverb he had brought to his aid. But the question was of the absence of specie, occasioned by the circulation of small notes; and, Mr. M. said, that he believed in the State in which the gentleman from Kentucky resided there is not a specie-paying bank, whilst there is not one in operation in this District which does not pay specie. Mr. M. made some further remarks in defence and support of State banks against the Bank of the United States. He was opposed to one bank in a country, as he was to one head in a monarchy, &c., and was as much opposed as any one to subjecting the State banks to the sway of the great banking institution of the country.

Apportionment of Representatives.

Mr. BURTON said it appeared to him that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) had placed this subject on its proper basis. If Congress had the power to interfere with the circulation of one dollar notes of the State banks, it certainly had the same power in regard to all the notes of State banks. Mr. B. was opposed to the resolution. The substitution of specie for small notes was a matter to be regulated by public opinion. When specie vanished some years ago, the issue of small notes was indispensable; on the other hand, when specie became plentiful in the cities, public opinion there corrected the evil. If we adopt the resolution, said Mr. B., we at once commence an attack on the State banks, and there is no knowing where it will end.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, for his part, that he considered it improper to attempt indirectly a measure which could not be directly approached. Such, he said, would be the effect of the adoption of the resolve now proposed. Every State in the Union had authority to do, by direct legislation, what it was now proposed to do indirectly. Mr. L. was, therefore, for leaving this matter wholly to the State Legislatures. In Pennsylvania a law had been passed prohibiting the circulation of notes for less than five dollars. In other States the same had been done. In New Hampshire, though attempts had been made to effect this object, the laws had been afterwards repealed. Let each State, said Mr. L., regulate this matter for itself. It was not pretended, he said, that the proposed measure was necessary in aid of the collection of the revenue. On the other hand, if it became necessary to resort to internal taxation, it would be indispensable to have small bills in circulation, without which the revenue could not be collected. Silver and gold, Mr. L. said, would forever centre in the cities; they would not remain in the remote parts of the country, and, in their absence, small bills were indispensable. He hoped, therefore, that the country banks would not be prevented from issuing them.

Mr. COBB was surprised at the nature of the objections to this resolution, which proposed to establish no principle, but merely to make an inquiry. What was the object of the resolution? It was to inquire into the expediency of a measure which, if adopted, would probably have the effect to force a general specie currency. Certainly, if it had that effect, a great benefit would result to society from its adoption; because specie is subject to no variation, and will answer all purposes in all places, which paper currency will not. He could not see that, by this measure, the United States Bank was to be benefited either one way or another; and, as to the abstract policy of the proposed measure, he did not see how a doubt could exist.

The question was then taken on agreeing to Mr. LOWNDES's resolution, and decided in the affirmative—59 votes to 40.

FRIDAY, December 29.

Another member, to wit: from the State of Ohio, SAMUEL HERRICK, appeared and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that the records of the Treasury do not contain the information required by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, relative to the number and tonnage of American and British vessels which cleared out from the ports of the United States for the ports of the West Indies, Bahama Islands, and Bermuda, in the years 1816, 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820; which letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House two other letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, one transmitting the annual statement of the district tonnage of the United States, on the 31st of December, 1819; the other transmitting the annual statement of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States to foreign countries during the year ending on the 30th September, 1820; which were severally read and ordered to lie on the table.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. ANDERSON submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, at the present session of Congress, for the apportionment of the representation in Congress among the several States, according to the fourth enumeration of the people of the United States.

Mr. A. made a few remarks in favor of his motion. On most subjects, he said, it was certainly desirable to have before you all the facts of the case before you legislate; on this particular subject, however, he believed Congress could legislate best without knowing the fact of the population of the States respectively. On former occasions of this sort, much difficulty had been found in legislating, from the operation of local feelings, naturally producing a desire on the part of the representatives of each State to fix on such a ratio of apportionment as should leave to it the smallest fraction of numbers. The legislating at the present session, before these numbers were known, would, it appeared to him, obviate these difficulties, as the only object of consideration would be, what ratio is of itself the most eligible? If the census of each State was waited for, he feared that the decision of Congress would be influenced by very different principles, &c. He was careless about the shape of this inquiry, but, feeling anxiety for the object of it, he hoped the resolution would be agreed to.

Mr. LOWNDES said, as the resolution proposed an inquiry merely, he certainly should not object to it. If it were possible to fix, by anticipation, the ratio of representation, he admitted it would be decidedly proper to pursue that course. But, important as the object might be, he feared it would be found wholly impracticable. Any act of this Congress fixing the ratio would, he feared, have no other effect than, as an expression of the opinion of the present Congress, it might have an influence on the next Congress. It would be an imperfect law, requiring future legislation to carry it into effect. Another act would be necessary, when the numbers of population were ascertained, to declare how many Representatives each State should be entitled to; and, he apprehended, in making that declaration, the next Congress would not be governed by any decision the present Congress might make on the subject. On this point, however, he did not mean to express a decided opinion, but he submitted, for the consideration of the committee which would be appointed, if this resolution was agreed to, whether any legislation by the present Congress would be definitive, or whether it would not in fact leave the question yet open for the decision of the Congress.

Mr. ANDERSON said that, supposing this to be, according to the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina, a preliminary law only, yet, being passed, it would be considered by the next Congress binding on them so as to make the actual declaration of the number of Representatives to which each State should be entitled a matter of course. The only objection to the proposed course which had ever suggested itself to his mind was, that it would leave uncertain the exact number of members of which the House of Representatives would be composed. Yet, he believed, though the number could not be exactly ascertained, it could be nearly so, and that, if Congress legislated on the subject at the present session, the total number of Representatives would be less than at present.

Mr. FULLER said he much approved the reason which had been assigned for fixing the ratio of representation at the present session; but he thought the purpose could have been better attained at the last session of Congress than at the present, because members could not by possibility have obtained any partial information which would have an influence on the decision of any one of them on the question. At the present session, said he, we are not in that situation. The States least remote can come pretty near a certainty as to the amount of their population, and some States may have an accurate knowledge of their numbers. Representatives from other States, from their situation, could not obtain similar information. If determined now, moreover, the decision would be liable to be reversed at the next session. He was, therefore, inclined to oppose the resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON said, if the population of the respective States were now really known, the fact would be a good argument against his motion. He had supposed an entire ignorance prevailed on that subject. For himself, he said, he did not know the population even of the village in which he lived, much less of the State which he represented. He did not admit that, decided now, the subject would yet be open at the next session. All the next Congress would have to do would be to pass a law conforming the number of Representatives to the principle established in the preceding law. That, he believed, might be done without a law; but he supposed it would be most formal and proper to do it by law.

Mr. CAMPBELL said if the resolution embraced an affirmative proposition, he should say it was inexpedient to pass it. He did believe, he said, that from many of the States information might now be obtained which would influence the decision of this House as to the ratio of representation. Mr. C. also believed, if partial information could be guarded against, there would yet be as much difficulty in legislating on the subject now as at the next session, and the same opposition to a large ratio from the apprehension of its reducing the numbers of Representatives from some of the States. On the former occasions, although difficulties had occurred, the ratio had been always fixed within the proper time, and, as far as he knew, to the general satisfaction of the country. He hoped the same would be the case at the next session. Every man cannot realize his own wishes, and the majority of opinions must at last decide. Under all the circumstances, he thought it best to defer this matter to the next session, when Congress could act with the aid of all the lights that could be thrown upon it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said as this resolution proposed inquiry only, he saw no objection to it. The committee would inquire fully into the subject, and report the result of their deliberations. It would then be time enough to debate the main question, which was not presented by the question now before the House.

The question being then taken on agreeing to the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative; and Messrs. ANDERSON, LOWNDES, CAMPBELL, FULLER, and STORRS, were appointed a committee accordingly, under said resolution.

The orders of the day were called over; but many members being absent, and no disposition appearing to call up business, the House, on motion of Mr. HILL, adjourned to Tuesday.

TUESDAY, January 2, 1821.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Clement B. Penrose and John B. C. Lucas, which was twice read and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports showing the number of soldiers recruited during the year 1820—the fund from which the expenses of recruiting have been paid, &c., prepared in obedience to a resolution of this House; which letter and report were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURWELL submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the select committee, to whom the Message of the President, transmitting an account of the expenditures of the commissioners under the fifth, sixth, and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent, for designating the northern boundary of the United States, was referred, be instructed to report a bill fixing the salaries of the commissioners and agents employed in that service.

Unsettled Balances.

H. OF R.

On motion of Mr. HILL, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the compensation of persons employed in transmitting to Congress the votes for President and Vice President.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following report from the Secretary of State:

The Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th instant, has the honor of reporting that a copy of the volume, containing the commercial regulations of foreign countries, which was printed under the direction of the President, conformably to a resolution of the Senate of 3d March, 1817, was transmitted to each of the Ministers and Consuls of the United States, with a request that they would examine with attention the part of the volume containing the regulations of the respective countries where they resided, and communicate to this department any supplementary information upon the same subject which might be in or come into their possession.

The communications hitherto received in answer to this request, together with some others, relating to the same subject, are herewith transmitted in obedience to the resolution of the House.

The original documents themselves are submitted, as they were received, in the belief that such parts of the information which they contain, as may be immediately desirable to the House, will be most easily collected from them; and as no satisfactory abstract or digest of them could be prepared in time to be available to the House during their present session.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 30, 1820.

The report was read and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring every class of public officers, charged either with the collection or disbursement of the public money, to settle their accounts within specified periods, under the penalty of absolutely forfeiting their respective appointments.

On motion of Mr. HALL, of New York, the Committee on Commerce were directed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a lighthouse at the mouth of the Oswego river, on the shore of Lake Ontario.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House a statement, showing the number of tons of French vessels which have entered from any of the ports of France, and cleared outward for any such ports during the years 1816, 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820, and the number of tons of vessels of the United States, which have entered from any of the said ports, and cleared out for the same during those years.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d of November last, requesting the President to inform that House what naval force has been stationed for the protection of the commerce in the West India islands, and parts adjacent, during the present year; and whether any depredations, by pirates or others, upon the property of citizens of the United States, engaged in such commerce, have been reported to our Government, I now submit, for the information of the House, a report from the Secretary of the Navy, with accompanying documents, which contain all the information, in the possession of the Government, required by that resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1, 1821.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of War, of the 27th day of March, 1820, on the petition of Seth Weed, made some progress in the report, and had leave to sit again. Whereupon, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of the report, and the petition was again referred to the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a copy of the report of the land commissioners at St. Helena, dated 18th November, 1820, with lists of the claims, and of the settlers; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. STORRS, after referring to the documents to show that an agent had been employed in one of the commissions under the British Treaty, although the appropriation was withheld by Congress at the last session, in order to abolish the agency, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of State be instructed specially to inquire whether any moneys have been disbursed through that Department, or authorized to be disbursed, on account of any salary or compensation to an agent or acting agent or any person employed in that capacity on the part of the United States, during the year 1820, under the 6th or 7th articles of the late Treaty of Peace with Great Britain; and, if any moneys have been so paid, to inquire and report to the House by authority of what law, and out of what appropriation, the same has been paid.

And, the question being taken on agreeing to the resolution, it was agreed to without opposition.

UNSETTLED BALANCES.

Mr. WARFIELD submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury transmitting a list of balances on the books of the Second and Third Auditors of the Treasury which have remained more than three years prior to the 30th of September, 1820, a list of the names of persons who have failed to render their accounts to the said auditors within the year, and a list of advances made prior to the 3d of March, 1809, by the War Department, which remained to be accounted for on the books of the Third Auditor of the Treasury on the 30th of September, 1820, be printed for the use of the members of this House.

Mr. WARFIELD said, he considered the document described in this resolution as among the most important which had ever been submitted to the consideration of this body. It exhibited the impositions which had been practised on the Government by persons in its employ or holding offices under it. We hear, said he, many complaints of the profuseness of the expenditure of the public money, and our fiscal concerns are in a deranged condition. He wished the people to be fully informed of the manner in which the funds of the Government had been dilapidated. This was a document which ought to be spread at large before the people. When we examine it, said Mr. W., we find under every letter of the alphabet a list of defaulters in every station, and of every rank, from that of commanding general to that of the subaltern. The people ought to know these flagitious impositions, and how money was in so many instances unaccounted for to large amounts by paymasters, quartermasters, and contractors. We are placed here as the guardians of the rights of the people, and ought not to hesitate, from the consideration of the little expense of printing it, to multiply copies of this document for their inspection.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remarked that this was a document of great size, and full of figures; and said Mr. S., if we print it for the people, they will understand about as little of it as we do now. The document did not, he said, afford data from which a correct opinion could be made up. We have known persons kept upon this list, said Mr. S., for twenty or thirty years as owing thousands of dollars, who, on their accounts being properly examined and balanced, did not owe a cent. The very men on the list of the present year, who appeared to owe the great amounts of which the gentleman had spoken, might not be really indebted a single cent. Mr. S. said he had considered this annual document of so little importance, that, although he filed nearly all the documents laid before Congress, he had never thought it worth while to file that. For these reasons, and for the additional reason of the expense of this printing, Mr. S. hoped the resolution would not pass.

Mr. WARFIELD said, that the people would not understand this document, was a supposition which was not, in his opinion, founded in fact. There was as much intelligence among the people as was to be found in their Representatives in this House. They were entirely competent to understand a document of this sort; and, if they did not examine it after it was furnished to them, the fault would be theirs, and not that of this House. As to the gentleman's not having much regarded this document, Mr. W. said, he did not consider that as a conclusive argument. Without hazarding much by the assertion, he would say that it was a document which deserved the attention of that honorable gentleman, and of every member of the House. The explanatory notes to each item were such that a pretty accurate judgment could be formed from the list; indeed, no man of common sense could fail to understand it. He did not say that this document was conclusive as to guilt on the part of the persons whose names were given, but, referring to the explanatory notes, no one could be at a loss to comprehend, generally, what was the character of each account. The document ought to be before the people. He wished the names of those who had been thus imposing on the public to be held up to public view. The defalcation was in the general outrageous, and, where there was any modification or apology for it in particular cases, it was so stated as to leave no difficulty in comprehending it, &c.

Mr. FULLER said that the original intention of the law, under which the report in question was made, was to expose to the public odium those persons who really had the public money in their possession, for which they could not, or would not, render a just account and pay the balance; but that the lists contained not only such as merited the epithet of defaulters, but also comprehended a very great mass of individuals, whose disbursements of the funds intrusted to them had been just and legal, and against whom there was no reason to suppose any considerable balance, if any, would be found on an equitable adjustment; but, from various causes, such an adjustment could not be obtained without a departure from the rules, by which the accounting officers, were necessarily governed. In many instances the accounts were in a train of settlement, and would no doubt exhibit the most perfect fairness in the parties concerned. Thus, he said, by including all persons, whose accounts were not settled, without distinction, the weight of the odium was diminished or lost. If the gentleman from Maryland could so modify his motion as to obtain a classification of the cases reported, distinguishing those who had refused or neglected to render their accounts or to pay the balances which they respectively owed, he should readily concur in the proposition; but, in such a vast mass of cases, when only one or two of a number would probably be found culpable defaulters it was impossible to make a due discrimination, and the salutary effect and intention of the law, by which the report was required, were in a great degree frustrated. He hoped such a modification of the resolution would be made, and that the Comptroller would be required so to classify the reported cases, that the innocent might not be confounded with the guilty.

Mr. LOWNDES concurred in the view which had been taken by Mr. FULLER, and wished that the resolution might lie on the table, with a view to seeing whether such a discrimination or classification of the cases might be made as to show distinctly the class of cases remaining unsettled from circumstances, separately from that of actual defalcation.

Mr. WARFIELD not objecting to this course, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

PROHIBITION OF IMPORTS.

Mr. RICH, of Vermont, rose to offer the resolutions of which he gave notice some days ago; and, in doing so, expressed himself as follows:

I rise, sir, to submit the proposition of which I gave notice a few days since; a notice, from which it will have been perceived that I propose an inquity into the propriety of prohibiting, prospectively, the importation of sundry commodities, the product of the skill and industry of other countries, and which are at present allowed, to the prejudice of a free and vigorous employment of the skill and capital of our own citizens. Hence it will have been understood that a decision of Congress is solicited by at least one of its members, on the propriety of fixing upon some future period, beyond which, and in regard to the proposed articles, the American manufacturer shall enjoy the benefit of the markets of his country, uninterrupted by foreign competitors, who owe no allegiance to that country, and who will neither fight its battles nor contribute to the support of its institutions.

Sir, I submit the proposition in the most confident belief that, should the proposed measure be adopted our establishments will have reached such a state of maturity by the time the prohibitions shall have taken effect, that exorbitant prices for domestic fabrics cannot be maintained if attempted: that the merchant will find the partial loss in his hazardous foreign trade counterbalanced by an increased coasting and inland trade less hazardous: that the agriculturist will find a progressively increasing and steady demand for his products: that the manufacturer, sure of the future markets of his country, will be zealously employed in his preparations to supply them, and, for his skill and capital thus employed, will realize a reasonable and fair return: that the foreign manufacturer, deprived of our custom in his own country, will seek for it in the employment of his skill and capital in this: that a system of revenue which shall have been adapted to the change of circumstances will be more certain and productive than that which depends entirely on imports; and that, finally, the greatest interests of the country will have been so arranged and adjusted that, whether we shall in future be met with orders in council, French decrees, embargoes, or war, neither our enterprise, prosperity, nor happiness, can be materially interrupted.

Sensible as I am that the policy of the proposed measure will be doubted by some, and unhesitatingly pronounced unwise by others, I have not obtruded myself upon the indulgence of the House without reflection, nor without the most thorough conviction on my own mind that the adoption of a measure of the character of the one proposed, would greatly promote the best interest of the country.

It having been my purpose to obtain the sense of the House upon the principle, rather than attempt the most unexceptionable details, it will certainly deserve consideration (should the main object be approved) whether the proposed prohibitions have been too far extended, or have fallen short of their proper limits. And should it be the will of Congress to adopt any measures with a view to the encouragement of domestic manufactures, and with them the general industry of the country, a consideration still more important will suggest itself, to wit: whether the encouragement shall be indirectly afforded, by a modification of the tariff, leaving the citizens to "feel their way," advancing with hesitancy, if at all, watching "the signs of the times" and the countervailing policy of other countries; or whether the more direct course shall be pursued.

On this question, I may very possibly have come to an erroneous conclusion; but, unless I am altogether mistaken, the direct course is by far the most eligible; as it will be secure against a defeat by foreign regulations, and one the effects of which can be estimated with much the greatest certainty, and will hence prove a powerful incentive to enterprise and industry, which cannot be called into full and vigorous activity except by the influence of strong motives. But, should the indirect course be taken, neither the agriculturist, the manufacturer, the merchant, nor the financier, can calculate for the future with such certainty as will inspire the requisite confidence to insure success.

However much we may have been benefited by obtaining the manufactures of Europe in exchange for our agricultural produce, during the long succession of years, while the markets of the world have been open to them, and at prices unexampled in the annals of commerce; and whatever advantages we may have derived from the operations and employments incident to such exchanges, I feel no hesitation in pronouncing an opinion that a period has arrived when but a single alternative is left to our choice, viz: either to retire voluntarily from a portion of our former pursuits, while our disposable means are worth preserving, and while the industry and enterprise of the country shall yet possess vigor and animation, (already very much impaired,) or be driven from them, at no remote period, by the force of necessity, with our means exhausted, and the spirits of the country depressed by a contemplation of the unfortunate contrast between our then condition and that from which we shall but recently have fallen. And, sir, when we contemplate that the happiness and prosperity of the people are undeniably the effects of a judicious and wise administration of the Government, and that by an injudicious administration directly the opposite effects will be produced; and when we also consider that our institutions, which are the pride of freemen throughout the world, have no other support, and can have no other, than the affections of the people for whom they were ordained and established, are we not called upon to employ our best efforts to prevent such a state of despondency as may extinguish all feelings for the Government but those of cold indifference? And is there not some danger that, should we continue to shape our measures to the maxim of "letting things alone," and that, too, while other nations are pressing upon us with their corn laws, and their other prohibitions and restrictions in one hand, and their bounties and premiums in the other, a state of public feeling may be produced which shall cause the philanthropists universally to weep for the danger to which our institutions shall be exposed?

It is universally admitted, so far as my information extends, that, be the acts of the Government what they may, the period will some time arrive when this country will cease to look to Europe or elsewhere for its most needful manufactures; and the great difference of opinion which manifests itself, is, whether the Government should, by its measures, accelerate the arrival of that period, or whether it should not rather "let things alone," and leave to chance or the force of necessity, the accomplishment of that great national object. Were we a nation having no intercourse with the rest of the world, it would certainly be my policy to "let things alone;" and I would now do so, with regard to the internal application of the skill and industry of the citizens. But, while I would do this, I would endeavor that they should also be "let alone," by the people and Governments of other countries. Nothing appears to me more unwise, than for to imagine that the great interests of this country can be permanently promoted by a course of measures which shall have been adopted without any regard to the condition or policy of other countries. And gentlemen will permit me to inquire, how long, in their opinion, the "star-spangled banner" would waft triumphantly upon the mighty deep, should the Government "let it alone?"

I have no desire, sir, to see manufactures forced into existence by the acts of the Government or otherwise; but I desire, most sincerely, to see such measures adopted as shall gently invite our national resources to be forthcoming in the form of manufactures, to the full extent of the real wants of the country; and, consequently, sufficient to place us beyond the reach of those pressures to which, otherwise, we must always be exposed, on the occurrence of war, or other interruptions of commerce—which shall give such vigorous activity to our national enterprise and industry, as shall of itself make an American citizen proud of his country, and form the basis of new and lasting attachment to our institutions; and which, finally, will afford some protection against that kind of foreign influence which, through the magic of fashion, puts all the tailors, milliners, and mantuamakers in requisition, on the arrival of a ship from Europe or the Indies; an influence, the suppression of which, would form a new and honorable trait in our character, and diffuse a proud national feeling throughout the community.

I apprehend it will be universally conceded, that a prohibition on the import of distilled spirits and malt liquors, would greatly promote the agricultural, and subserve the general interests of the country; and that no essential interests would materially suffer, should such prohibition be made to take effect at an early period.

While, then, I would propose that a prohibition should not take effect upon manufactured articles, till time shall have been allowed to bring our establishments to a suitable degree of maturity, and enable the great interests of the country to accommodate themselves to the change, and the Government to organize its finances, I would exclude spirits and malt liquors; at the termination of a period barely sufficient to give effect to a system that should bring into the Treasury, from domestic liquors, a revenue equal at least to what is now derived from foreign. And, in the mean time, instead of a general modification of the tariff, as suggested at the last session, I would propose an increase of duties upon such articles only as should be prospectively prohibited; and in regard to such, would abolish the custom-house credits, partly with a view to an augmentation of revenue, and to strengthen the invitation to our internal resources to be forthcoming, and partly to check unreasonable investments in foreign commodities, with a view to monopoly, after the prohibition shall have taken effect. And to secure a future, certain, and augmented revenue, I would levy an excise duty upon the domestic articles which should be substituted for those the importation of which shall be prohibited. The excise to take effect simultaneously with the prohibitions.

I am not insensible, sir, that, should a majority of the House concur with me in opinion that the importation of some articles may, after a given period, be prohibited, with benefit to the country; there must naturally be a great diversity of sentiment as to the articles and the times at which the prohibition in relation to each should take effect. Still I may be permitted to hope, that such diversity may not entirely defeat the proposition: that so far as gentlemen shall only doubt of the policy of the measure, (if there be any such,) they will permit the experiment to be made, if but to a very limited extent; and that, in regard to the selection of articles on which to make the experiment, a spirit of conciliation will be manifested, without which it is in vain that we attempt to legislate for the benefit of a country so extensive as that for which we have the honor to act.

Admitting the prohibitory system to be proper, under any circumstances of the country, and at any possible period of time, much, in my judgment, would be gained, if the period, although far remote, should now be rendered certain, as to some few articles at least. For, in that case, the application of the skill and capital which should incline in favor of the manufacture of such articles, might be diverted with a good degree of certainty as to the results, and an experiment would thus be made, the effect of which would be sufficiently tangible to be judged of, and of great utility in the future legislation of this country.

Sir, I have felt that it was due to the House and myself, that I should accompany the proposition with the explanations I have given of my views upon the subject; and, without consuming further time, I will send it to the Chair, and leave it to be disposed of as the better judgment of the House shall direct.

Mr. RICH then submitted his resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting (except for the export trade) the importation of,

1st. All distilled spirits and malt liquors, from and after the — day of —, A. D. —.

2d. All manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall constitute a component part, from and after the — day of —, A. D. —.

3d. All cotton and flaxen goods, of which either cotton or flax shall constitute a component part, to wit: sheeting, shirting, counterpanes, table-cloths, stripes, checks, plaids, gingham, chintzes, calicoes, and prints of all descriptions, hosiery and cotton yarns, twist and thread, from and after —.

4th. All kinds of glass wares, and window glass, from and after —.

5th. Iron in bars, rods, sheets, castings, spikes, and nails, and all manufactures of sheet iron, or of which sheet iron shall be a material of chief value, from and after —.

6th. All manufactures of lead, copper, or tin, from and after —.

7th. All descriptions of paper, from and after —.

8th. All manufactures of leather, or of which leather shall constitute a component part, from and after —.

9th. All descriptions of hats, and ready made clothing from and after —.

Resolved, That the said committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying an excise duty upon the domestic articles which shall be substituted for those, the importation of which shall be prohibited: the excise to take effect, simultaneously, with the prohibition.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, suggested the propriety of laying these resolutions on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES said, as the resolutions proposed an inquiry only, he saw no objection to acting on them at once, though he did not oppose their being ordered to lie on the table. If agreeing to them were to imply any approbation of the plan which they proposed, the question would be very different and really important. It was obvious, however, that the agreement to inquire into the subject would compromise no one. In the course of his remarks, Mr. L. suggested, that the resolutions proposed to direct a committee to inquire into matters in the investigation of which that committee were probably already engaged.

Mr. RICH said, he was not unwilling that the resolutions should lie on the table for consideration. But, he said, he considered them as embracing a great principle, which sooner or later Congress must adopt, and the sooner, the better.

Mr. BALDWIN, in reference to the suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES, that probably the Committee of Manufactures might now be engaged in the investigation of this very subject of prohibitory duties, rose to say, that nothing of that sort was at present before that committee, nor did he know that it would be, unless it were specially enjoined on them to inquire into it.

After some other inconsequential observations, the resolutions were, on motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY EXPENDITURES.

The bill making partial appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1821, underwent some brief discussion, which was confined to one item of the proposed appropriation, that of $150,000 for the Quartermaster's department.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, submitted a letter from the Secretary of War explanatory of the necessity there was for this partial appropriation, to which, also, Mr. S. added a few explanatory observations.

Mr. COCKE said he wished for some information before he afforded the means of making further advances of public money. He called the attention of the House to the list of unsettled balances, amounting to somewhere about sixteen millions of dollars, which had grown out of the practice of making advances to public officers. There was already, he said, according to a late report from the Secretary of the Treasury, a considerable sum of money in the hands of the Treasurer for the use of the War Department. How was that disposed of? What had become of the immense sums which they said they had saved within the last year? We are now called upon to advance sums which, by-and-by, for any thing we know, will form additional items in the list of balances; and, until he was better informed, he should be opposed to the bill. Mr. C. assigned, as another reason against passing the bill now, that it was probable a reduction of the Army might take place during the session, which would make smaller appropriations sufficient.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that he was as much opposed as the gentleman from Tennessee to the system of advances of money to public agents, where it could be avoided. From conversation with the Secretary of War, Mr. S. had ascertained that he also was convinced of the inconveniences of the practice, and had determined that, for the future, as few advances as possible should be made. But, for the present year, Mr. S. said, the contracts were already made, and the money must be paid: and what possible difference, Mr. S. asked, could there be between appropriating it, as now proposed, and doing it in the general appropriation bill? In regard to small contracts, payment might generally be deferred till the contract was completed; but, in regard to large contracts, every one must know that few men had capitals sufficiently large to undertake them without the aid of advances by the Government. A certain confidence must be reposed in public officers; without which they cannot discharge their duties effectually. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would not continue to oppose the bill on this score. With respect to the reduction of the Army, Mr. S. said he had learned, on inquiry, that, in all contracts which had been made by the War Department, a proviso was inserted, that, if the quantity of provisions, &c., engaged for should not be wanted for the public service, the Government should have the right of taking one-third less than the quantity contracted. This, the gentleman would see, would obviate any difficulty which might otherwise arise in consequence of a reduction of the Army.

Mr. EVSTIS inquired whether the Committee of Ways and Means were satisfied that the whole sum ($481,000) proposed in the estimates for the Quartermaster's department would be actually necessary for that branch of the service?

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, replied that the Committee of Ways and Means had not considered that subject, but it appeared quite probable, without much consideration, that it would be necessary. The whole sum appropriated for the same object during the past year had been expended. His honorable friend from Massachusetts had not adverted, Mr. S. presumed, to the difference between the present organization of the Quartermaster's department and that which existed some years ago. The provisions and supplies for the Army are now furnished in bulk by the Commissary General, and then taken up and distributed by the Quartermaster's department, which augments greatly the charge of that branch of the public service.

Mr. LOWNDES made a few remarks in reference to Mr. COCKE's objection to this bill. He admitted that it was not advisable, as a general practice, to make partial appropriations; but he did not see how that could be well avoided under the present practice of Congress, which was to defer the passage of the general appropriation laws until some time after the commencement of the year. The expenditures for the Quartermaster General's department, during the last year, had been settled and accounted for, as an examination of official papers would show, with an accuracy and promptitude which was indeed surprising, and could not fail to be entirely satisfactory to the gentleman from Tennessee. It was evident that the appropriation now asked for was necessary, and he trusted there would be no objection to its passage.

Mr. EUGRIS said, with respect to the amount estimated for the Quartermaster's department for the present year, he could not see how more than half of the amount asked for could be applied. The only objection to assenting to the partial appropriation now proposed for that object, was, that it might be construed into a pledge that the House meant eventually to give the whole that was asked. He had no doubt, he said, that the money, if appropriated, would be expended with the utmost economy, and that every farthing of it would be promptly and properly accounted for. His objection to the appropriation was, that, according to his present impression, in time of peace one-half of the amount proposed to be appropriated for the Quartermaster's department would be sufficient. On this subject he did not mean to express a decided opinion, but spoke according to his present view of the subject. He, therefore, protested against the vote for this appropriation being considered as a pledge to vote for the whole amount of $481,000 for the Quartermaster's department.

Mr. COBB said, that voting for this sum would by no means pledge the House as to any future vote. But connected with this was another circumstance which deserved notice. The sum appropriated for the Quartermaster's department for the last year was $450,000. It appeared, by the estimates laid on the table this morning, that the expenditures for that branch of the military service had exceeded the appropriation by $20,000, and the Secretary of War had stated, in his letter, that it was impossible to bring the expenditure within the sum appropriated. Mr. C. inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, if he could give any reason why it was impossible. He recollected that the House had determined, at the last session, to bring down this item of appropriation to $450,000, in order to arrest the progress of the Yellow Stone expedition, and for no other reason that he knew of. Yet, notwithstanding that expedition had been stopped at the Council Bluffs, it appeared it had been "impossible" to bring the expenditure within the appropriations. On what account had it been impossible? Mr. C. said he should like to hear if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was prepared to answer the question.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he certainly did not understand that this bill would pledge the future vote of any gentleman. When the House came to act on the general appropriation bill would be the proper time for examining the matter spoken of by the gentleman from Georgia, or any other matter respecting which gentlemen felt any difficulty or required any information. This bill did not propose any appropriation for covering deficiencies of the past year.

Mr. TRIMBLE rose to give the information which the gentleman wished. Last year so much had been deducted from the amount of appropriation for the Quartermaster's department, as was supposed would have been required by the continuation of the Yellow Stone expedition. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was of opinion that $450,000 would be enough, supposing the Yellow Stone expedition to be discontinued. When the bill went to the Senate an inquiry was made of the War Department on that point; in reply to which it was stated, that four hundred and eighty thousand dollars would be wanted, though the expedition should not proceed further than it had already gone. The Senate put that amount into the bill, but the House persisted in its first determination, and therefore there had been appropriated for that branch of the service thirty thousand dollars less than was asked. The expenditure, it appeared, had exceeded the appropriation twenty thousand dollars, being less by ten thousand than had been estimated by the War Department.

Mr. SMITH confirmed the statement which Mr. TRIMBLE had just made.

Mr. STORRS remarked that, although thirty thousand dollars less than was asked had been appropriated, it appeared to be acknowledged that twenty thousand dollars beyond the amount of the appropriation, had been expended, and expressed his desire to know by what authority? Mr. S. subsequently withdrew his opposition to this bill on the ground that it did not pledge the House either in regard to the making up the deficiency or to future appropriations.

The debate subsided into a nearly general assent to the passage of the bill; and, after negating a motion by Mr. COCKE, to postpone the subject, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

grossed bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office," reported the same with an amendment, which was concurred in by the House; and the bill ordered to be re-engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Bowie and Kurtz, and others, accompanied with a bill for their relief, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Gabriel Berzat, deceased;" and, "An act for the relief of Thomas L. Ogden, and others;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. CANNON submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the number of cadets educated at the Military Academy that have remained in the service of the United States five years; also, the number that have received commissions, and have resigned before the expiration of five years; also, the number that have left the Military Academy without commissions, and the amount of money that has been paid to each one; also, the sums of money that have been paid to cadets who were permitted to stay at home (if any) for the time between their appointment and that of their being mustered at the academy; also, the whole number educated at the academy, who were in the service of the United States during the late war; and the number of those, thus engaged in the service, who were in any battle or battles fought during said time with the enemies of our country; also, the whole expense of maintaining officers and instructors of the academy each year, since the year 1802; the whole expense of ammunition and soldiers that have been placed at the academy, for their assistance, since its first establishment; also, how far martial law has been carried into effect there, and whether, or not, the professors and teachers are, or have been, under martial law, and whether, or not, any of the cadets have been sent from said academy, or dismissed by order of the superintendent, or any other officer, without a trial, or any specific charge being proved against them; also, how many foreigners are professors or teachers in said academy; and the number of cadets, if any, that have been admitted into the same from the families of foreigners.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for Samuel G. Hopkins, late a captain in the Army of the United States, to settle his accounts with the Government upon the principles of equity.

The said resolution was read, and the question was taken to agree thereto, and determined in the negative.

On motion of Mr. BURWELL, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, and the same being read, was modified and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee to whom was referred the Message of the President, transmitting an account of the expenditures under the fifth, sixth, and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent, for designating the northern boundary of the United States, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of fixing by law the salaries of the commissioners and agents employed in that service.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and laid on the table one day for consideration; and the same being again read, was agreed to by the House.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the deputy surveyor of the Vincennes donation tract other and further compensation than is at present authorized by law.

The House proceeded to consider the bill in addition to the several acts making provision for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war; and

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend it by adding to it the following sections:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no pensioner under the aforesaid acts shall be stricken from the rolls, who, upon giving in the schedule of his property as is therein directed, shall be worth less, after deducting his debts, than — dollars.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every pensioner who has, under the act of the 1st of May, 1820, been stricken from the pension roll, shall be placed again on the pension roll, if application shall be made by him, if, upon examining his schedule, he is worth less than — dollars.

And, debate arising thereon, the bill was again ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, it was

1. Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire and to report to this House whether, in their opinion, the permanent revenue is adequate to meet the expenses of this Government.

2. Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether any measures may, in their opinion, be necessary to increase the revenue, and, if so, to report the measures to this House.

3. Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, or imposing additional duties on, the importation of foreign spirits, and imposing an excise on domestic distilled spirits.

4. Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether, in their opinion, any further measures are necessary to be adopted for the due enforcement of the existing revenue laws.

5. Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making any alteration in the existing laws which relate to the verification of invoices, or to manifests of goods imported from foreign ports.

6. Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making any provision by law for the due enforcement of the provisions of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' passed the second day of March, 1799."

On motion of Mr. COOK, the House took up his motion, submitted on the 26th ultimo, calling for a statement of the land warrants issued, and yet to be issued, to soldiers of the late war, &c.—but, after some debate between Messrs. COOK and RHEA, the House refused to agree to the resolution.

On motion of Mr. ROBERT MOORE, the Committee for the District of Columbia were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law to secure mechanics and others payment for their labor and materials in erecting any house or other buildings within the District of Columbia, by giving them a lien thereon.

Mr. WARFIELD submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the first Comptroller of the Treasury be directed to report to this House whether, in the statement of balances which have been due more than three years, accompanying his letter of the 27th of November last, there have been made the discriminations and suggestions required by the fourteenth section of the act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts passed on the 3d March, 1817.

Bills from the Senate, of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Gabriel Berzat, deceased;" and, "An act for the relief of Thomas L. Ogden, and others," were severally read twice, and referred; the former to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and the latter to the Committee of Claims.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the military service of the United States for the year, 1821," was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the number and station of all the military posts of the United States, and of the distribution of the Army; designating the number and grade of the officers, and the number of men at each post; prepared in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 20th ultimo; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, took into consideration the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient that the annual expenses of the Government should be reduced; that, for the accomplishment of this object, it is further

2. Resolved, That all such offices as are not immediately necessary for the transaction of public business, and the abolition of which would not be detrimental to the public interests, shall be abolished.

3. Resolved, That the salaries of all civil officers, whose compensation has been increased since the year 1809, shall be reduced to what they were at that period.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce the Army to the number of six thousand non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, preserving such part of the corps of engineers, without regard to that number, as may be required by the public interest; and including such reduction of the general staff as may be required by the state of the Army when reduced as herein proposed.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient that the appropriations for the erection of fortifications shall be so made as to require a less sum annually, by extending the time within which they shall be completed.

6. Resolved, That the act making an appropriation of one million of dollars per annum for the increase of the Navy be so amended as to extend the time within which such increase shall be made, and to reduce the annual appropriation to the sum of five hundred thousand dollars.

7. Resolved, That it is expedient to recall from active service one half of the naval force now employed, and to place the same in ordinary.

And the same having been read—

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The task which I have undertaken, to investigate all the subjects involved in the resolutions just read, would be a fearful one, to heads much more profound than mine. But, as I am well convinced that the Committee are not prepared to expect a display of any profound ideas from me, I deem an apology for the very imperfect views which I shall offer quite unnecessary.

Broad as the resolutions would appear, they are defective, in not embracing all the objects upon which I mean to touch in the course of my remarks. For this reason I shall take the liberty of offering one or two amendments before the investigation of them shall be closed.

I think the preference which is to be given to the form in which these resolutions have been introduced, will be obvious. They admit of the Committee's taking a full view of the state of the nation. They admit of an inquiry into the financial resources of the country, and of the sources from which revenue is derived by the existing laws; into the extent of the various establishments requiring the expenditure of the public money; the necessity and usefulness of them, and the adequacy of the revenue to their maintenance; whether they are to be supported by the imposition of additional burdens upon the people, in the shape of loans or taxes, or whether the interests and true policy of the nation would not rather point to their reduction in preference to such a resort. The importance of the question involved in such an inquiry will not be denied. Attempts at a partial view of them, and at making partial reductions in the public expenses, are always attended with the danger of doing nothing, or of running into an extreme parsimony in relation to particular objects. It is the duty of the Legislature to determine what shall be the "portion of the produce of the land and labor of the country to be placed at the disposition of Government." This must be determined by the capacity of the people to contribute this portion. When, however, it is ascertained, it is right that you should have before your eyes all the objects of expenditure, before you will be able properly to distribute it among the several objects.

By what principles the Legislature of this nation shall be governed in determining this "portion of the product of land and labor," (which is only a definition of what are called taxes,) has been a subject of great discussion and contrariety of opinion, from the institution of the Government to the present day. My opinion upon the subject can be expressed in very few words: The people of that nation are happiest whose rights are protected at the least expense, with the least danger from the instruments of protection, and where there are the fewest obstacles created, by law, to the exercise of individual industry, and the display of individual enterprise. I can scarcely conceive of controversy upon a position so reasonable and plain.

We boast that our form of Government best admits of reducing the principle I have stated into practice. I very much fear that history has yet to determine, from our conduct, whether, like the Athenians in relation to politeness, we shall show that we only know it, or, like the Lacedæmonians, we practise it. That we have an idea of it I think is very evident; for no people under the sun boast more of their national simplicity, frugality, and economy, than we do, even at the very moment that an increase of the public burdens is required to defray the ordinary expenses of the year. To prove a conformity between the boast and the fact, is a task I have no disposition to undertake.

Admitting the practicability of economical principles, (which, so far from denying I shall attempt, before I conclude, to prove,) I will take the liberty to say, that in no nation can taxation be rendered more oppressive than in ours. This arises from our form of Government; from that "imperium in imperio;" that exercise of two distinct kinds of sovereignty by the same people, of which we are so proud. The affairs of the Confederacy are administered by one body of magistracy, under the Federal Constitution, and must be supported in its expenses. The government of each State, in whose care is confided the greatest portion of the people's rights, conducted by another body of magistracy, and must also be supported. The expenses of either government, taken separately, have nothing alarming in their amount. If added together, they are swelled to an enormous sum, and it requires but little augmentation to make them onerous indeed. Suppose the General Government should determine upon some grand and expensive political scheme, the execution of which requires an increase of revenue; for instance, a magnificent scheme of internal improvements, in favor of which a vote of this House has already been had; and that one of the States, say New York, determines on a similar scheme, as she has done, also requiring an increase of State revenue; is it not obvious that the burdens of the people of that State would be rapidly increased? I have alluded to this scheme of internal improvements only by way of exemplifying my ideas. If, however, the view is extended to all the powers which may be exercised by each sovereignty, requiring the expenditure of money, it will be seen that the adoption of but very few of these magnificent schemes will make the public burdens alarmingly oppressive, and destructive of a large share of our comforts.

The facility with which this state of things could be produced, was most distinctly perceived by the people who authorized the formation of the Federal Constitution, and by whose authority it was put in operation. The old Federal Government asked of the States the power to impose a very small tax on commerce. The Convention which met to confer that power produced the Federal Constitution, as the result of their labors, and submitted it to the people for their ratification. In their examinations of this instrument, they could but see how injuriously the unlimited power of taxation therein conferred might be exercised.

Gentlemen can see, by turning to the various acts of ratification, how many of the States, by express declarations and limitations, attempted to guard against the abuse of the powers conferred upon the Federal Government, and to settle the principles of policy by which the agents employed in the administration of that government should be guided. These acts speak a language that cannot be misunderstood; and let it be remembered that this language is held by the people by whom the Federal Constitution was made and ratified to their servants thereafter to be appointed to execute the purposes of it. It is in these acts that we shall first discover the marks of distinction between what has since been appropriately denominated the ordinary and extraordinary sources of revenue. By the first was meant the revenue derived from commerce, to which has since been added the price of the public lands, and, by the second, internal taxes in the broadest sense of the term. Here it is that we see the makers of the Constitution declaring that "standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty," and that the defence of the country shall rest upon the militia. Here, in short, we shall see asserted and dictated, in the plainest terms, all those principles of economy and rules of political conduct which I am attempting to advocate. To read the whole of these ratifications would tax the patience of the Committee more than I wish; but I pray their indulgence in reading one or two of them. The ratification of New York contains the following expressions: "That the people have a right to 'keep and bear arms; that a well regulated militia, including the body of the people capable of bearing arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free State.'" "That standing armies, in times of peace, are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be kept up, except in cases of necessity, and that at all times the military should be under strict subordination to the civil power." "That Congress will not lay direct taxes in this State, but when moneys arising from the imposts and excise shall be insufficient for the public exigencies, nor then, until Congress shall first have made a requisition upon the State to assess, levy, and pay the amount of such requisition," &c.* On this last subject the language of the ratification of North Carolina is as follows: "When Congress shall lay direct taxes or excises, they shall immediately inform the executive power of

* See Journal of the Federal Constitution, pages 427, 431.

'each State," &c.* Such, sir, was the jealousy displayed by the people of the States—parties to the Constitution—in relation to the subject of internal taxes. That they intended that the General Government should rely only upon the imposts for defraying the expenses in times of peace, cannot admit a doubt. If, however, the public exigencies—if a state of war, or other extraordinary circumstance, should require it, then, and not till then, was resort to be had to other sources of revenue, so long as the necessity should continue. What was it, sir, but a departure from those principles, and some others prescribed in the same imperative manner, that caused the people, at a later period in the Government, to withdraw their confidence from their agents then in the administration of affairs, and to substitute Mr. Jefferson and his friends in their places? The mention of the name of this distinguished man leads me to call the attention of the Committee to certain opinions of his in corroboration of the ideas I have advanced; not because they are his opinions, but because they were those of the people at that period. They will also be found in the writings and speeches of the "conscript fathers," and the reports and proceedings of Congress of that day. Mr. Jefferson's opinions were then considered as the test of political orthodoxy. I am aware, sir, there has since been a considerable change in the times, and that, in this change, men have not been able to preserve a uniformity of political visage. But, if his principles were then founded in truth and political propriety, they are now equally worthy of being adopted in practice. Such is certainly my opinion of them, and, therefore, I shall not relinquish them. In his inaugural speech, among other principles advanced by him, are the following: "A well disciplined militia, our best reliance in peace, and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority; economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts, and sacred preservation of the public faith; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce, as its handmaid;" (the word manufactures is not to be found in the sentence—should it hereafter creep in, I hope it will be understood to be an interpolation,) "the diffusion of information, and the arraignment of all abuses at the bar of the public reason; freedom of religion—freedom of the press—and freedom of persons under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially."*

These principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation. The wisdom of our sages and blood of our heroes have been devoted to their attainment; they should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civic institutions, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust; and should we wander from them in moments of error or of alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps, and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety. How beautiful the style—how much more beautiful the principles! It would be a speculation not entirely fruitless to compare our present political course with that of the administration just previous to the delivery of this speech, and test its correctness by the "touchstone" of these principles. Then an army in time of profound peace was deemed proper—so it is now. Then an expensive navy was to be created and supported—so it is now. Then a large debt was not considered a national curse—nor is it now. Then a latitudinous construction of the Constitution was the fashionable doctrine—so it is now, by more than one solemn vote of this House. Then a sedition law was both proper and Constitutional.* In another branch of the Legislature they have lately said it was not unconstitutional. The comparison might be urged much farther, but I will not pursue it.

In his first Message to Congress, Mr. Jefferson speaks the following language:

"War, indeed, and untoward events, may change this prospect of things, and call for expenses which the imposts could not meet. But, sound principles will not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow-citizens to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not, perhaps, happen, but from the temptations offered by that treasure.

"These views, however, of reducing our burdens, are formed on the expectation that a sensible, and at the same time a salutary reduction, may take place in our habitual expenditures. For this purpose those of the Civil Government, the Army, and Navy, will need revisal. When we consider that this Government is charged with the external and mutual relations only of these States; that the States themselves have the principal care of our persons, our property, and our reputation, constituting the great field of human concerns, we may well doubt whether our organization is not too complicated, too expensive; whether officers and offices have not been multiplied unnecessarily, and sometimes injuriously to the service they were meant to promote."

I beg pardon of the Committee for having detained them so long by reading these extracts. But really they are so applicable to the present situation of the nation, that they seem to be addressed to us with equal propriety as to the Congress for whom they were intended. Yes, sir, if a system of economy were not recommended to us by its evident propriety, under the most favorable circumstances, we are now driven to its adoption by the embarrassments by which we are surrounded. What is our present condition? What is the state of the nation?

We have an Army, which, with its various appendages, is more numerous than it ever was before in a time of peace.

We have a Navy, the force and expense of which have almost quadrupled in ten years.

* Ibid, page 444. Nearly the same language is used in the ratifications of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Virginia, South Carolina, and Rhode Island.

* The Senate refused to refund to Mathew Lyon a fine imposed on him under the Sedition law.

JANUARY, 1821.

Reduction of Expenditures.

H. OF R.

We have a pension list, whose rapid growth and extended length should affright us.

We have a civil list of constantly increasing expense.

We have a national debt of $90,000,000, which, to say the least of it, is not diminishing, and the interest upon which requires more than one-fourth of the estimated receipts into the Treasury for the present year.

And, to crown the whole, for the last and the present year, the annual revenue calculated to be received, by official reports submitted to our inspection, is insufficient to support these establishments, by millions of dollars.

However coolly some may affect to view this state of things, to me it presents a subject of the most lively interest. It is, at least, sufficiently gloomy to urge us to a review of our policy, and to correct its errors, if any there are. This is a duty which the nation expects us to perform, and let us not shrink from the task.

By the reports from the Treasury Department, it will be seen that, at the last Congress, it was calculated the receipts into the Treasury for the year 1820, exclusive of loans, would be somewhere about $22,000,000. At the present session, with more certain data upon which to make the calculation, it appears that the estimate of the receipts of the year 1820 will but little exceed that sum, inclusive of the loan of $3,000,000, authorized at the last session. The appropriations then made, after very great reductions from the estimates, were about $25,000,000; so that the receipts will be less than the appropriation, by a sum of at least $2,600,000. This, however, is not the worst of the evil. If you take into consideration all the charges upon the revenue of the year 1820, inclusive of the appropriations for that year, and of the sums appropriated in 1818 and 1819, and which have not been paid, it appears that the actual balance against the Treasury is more than $4,000,000, at the end of 1820.

By the same reports it is estimated, that the receipts of the present year, (1821,) from all sources of revenue, will be $16,550,000. Of this sum, we are told that at least $1,200,000 will not be available in the course of the year, on account of $600,000 in notes upon banks that cannot be converted into current money, and on account of the time it requires to transfer a part of the revenue received in one part of the country, to another, where it is to be disbursed, and which, it is supposed, will render a further sum of $600,000 unavailable; so that the sum estimated to be received into the Treasury will really not be more than $15,350,000. By the estimates just laid on our table, it appears that the amount of money required for the current expenses of Government in 1821, is $17,519,068 22, consisting in the following items, viz :

For the public debt - - -	$5,477,776 76
The civil list, and miscellaneous expenses, &c. - - -	1,769,850 04
The Navy, inclusive of $1,000,000 a year for its increase - -	3,428,676 81
The War Department - - -	4,585,352 61

Unexpended balances, not provided for - - - - -	1,875,437 00
Permanent appropriations - - -	81,975 00
	$17,519,068 22

If to this you add the interest upon the contemplated loan of $7,000,000, at 5 per cent., it will swell the sum to $17,869,068 22, exceeding the estimated available receipts by $2,519,068 22.

If to this you add the estimated balance against the Treasury, at the end of the year 1820, it will be seen that, in order to effect all objects for which appropriations have been heretofore made, and to furnish what will be required for the service of 1821, a sum but little short of $7,000,000, in addition to the available estimated receipts of the year, must be provided. It has heretofore been usual to have in the Treasury at least $1,000,000 above all charges upon it, as a contingent fund, which may be required by unforeseen circumstances. If it is conceived to be proper to preserve this fund, then the sum to be provided, above the receipts of the year, will be nearly $8,000,000.

In the Treasury documents frequent mention is made of "unexpended balances of appropriations." For instance, those of the last year, and which are deducted from the estimates of the present year. In the calculation which I have just submitted, of the expenses of the present year, I have stated these balances at $1,875,437, and said that they were to be provided for. I hope no gentleman will be deceived in relation to these "unexpended balances of former appropriations." The truth is, that their amount is not, never has been, and never will be, in the Treasury, unless Congress procure the money, and put it there. To talk, therefore, of deducting from the estimates of the year that which does not exist in fact, is absurd. If you will first borrow the amount of these unexpended balances, and place it in the Treasury, then you may deduct it from the estimates. But that will be just the same thing as taking no notice at all of them, and proceeding to provide for the whole amount of the sums estimated to be necessary for the service of the year. If you have to borrow it, it is perfectly immaterial whether you do it in the shape of money necessary for the current expenses of the year, or money necessary to make good the amount of appropriations heretofore made, but not received into the Treasury, and which, as it will not be wanting to effect the objects for which the appropriations were made, may be deducted from the estimates of the next year. The thing is in fact the same, although it may be done under two different names. The whole mystery, if any there be, is in not distinguishing between "unexpended balances of appropriations" and unexpended balances of money appropriated. In the first instance the amount may never have been received, although the appropriations were made upon the presumption that it would be. In the second, it has been received, but was not wanting for the object for which it was appropriated. Now, it will be seen, from the reports, that the balances proposed to be deducted from the estimates of the money wanted for the service of the year, are of appropriations, and not of money. By casting our eyes upon the Treasury report of the 21st December, 1820, it will be perfectly obvious that the amount of these unexpended balances has never been in the Treasury. The Secretary says:

"That, of the sums appropriated for 1820, and previous years, it is estimated there will be on the books of the Treasury," (not in the Treasury,) "on the 1st January, 1821	$6,907,619 03
"That there will be on that day, in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent of the War and Navy Departments	927,241 29
"That" (consequently by the addition of these two sums) "the whole amount of unexpended balances of appropriations" (not money) "subject to the disposition of the Executive Government, during 1821, is estimated at	7,834,860 32
"That of that sum there will be required to defray the expenses incurred in 1820, or necessary to effect the objects for which the appropriations were made	3,632,659 47
"And that there will remain unexpended (of appropriations) "and not necessary to effect the objects for which the several appropriations were made	4,202,200 91"

In the next page the report proceeds to inform us that, of the whole "estimated receipts into the Treasury in 1820, the amount applicable to the fourth quarter of the year ending the 31st of December, 1820, will be

"That the payments made in the 4th quarter, and those which are required to complete the service of the year 1820, amount, in the aggregate, to	9,662,295 07"

Leaving a balance against the Treasury, on the 1st January, 1821, of $4,204,464 24

Now, in this sum of $9,662,295 07 is included only such part of the appropriations theretofore made as was necessary to effect the objects for which they were made, and consequently that the receipts into the Treasury will not effect the objects intended by a sum of $4,204,464 24, although it is ascertained that these objects can be effected with a sum of $4,202,200 less than was estimated for them. Had the whole amount appropriated been wanted to effect these objects, the balance against the Treasury, instead of being what it is, would have been $8,406,664 24. That I am right in this conclusion, will be evident from the explanation given by the Secretary of the Treasury. For, he says, "to avoid complexity, the sums necessary to complete the service of the year 1820, or to effect the objects for which the several appropriations were made, are in the above statement (which I have just referred to) considered a charge upon the Treasury during the fourth quarter of the year, although it is probable that a portion of these sums may not be drawn until 'late in the ensuing year, and, possibly, a small part not before 1822. In the annual report (that of 1st December, 1820) no sum was charged upon the fourth quarter but what was understood 'would be drawn;" thus accounting for the vast difference between the charge on the fourth quarter, as represented in the two reports. The truth is, that the payments for many objects are often not made for two years after the appropriation is passed, from a failure to settle accounts, and many other causes easy to be conceived.

Thus, then, it appears that within three years past the appropriations for the expenses of the Government have exceeded the estimated receipts into the Treasury more than $8,000,000; that the amount of these required to complete the objects intended has exceeded them more than $4,000,000; and, according to the various estimates laid before us, that the sum required for the service of the year 1821 (exclusive of the payment of any part of the principal of the public debt) will exceed the estimated receipts of that year more than $2,500,000. Who can view this state of things with indifference, unless he is prepared to impose new burdens on the hand of labor, and thus create new sources of revenue? To this, however, we must come, unless we "retrace our steps," and more especially if we adhere to the pledge which, by a statement made by a gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) at the last session, the Government seems to have made, with itself if not with the public creditors, and which I highly approve, to wit: that its receipts should exceed its expenses in each year, by a sum equal to the amount of the Sinking Fund, which is now $10,000,000. To release the Treasury from its present embarrassments, and to guard against their recurrence, we must now resort to one of three methods. 1st. We must impose new taxes, in some shape, to the amount required; or, 2d. We must add to the national debt; or, 3d. We must retrench in our expenses, by reducing our establishments to the lowest state that the public safety will possibly admit. To the first, in a time of profound peace, I am decidedly opposed. Internal taxes are sufficiently oppressive and vexatious at any time. I cannot forget, what I think is evident, that this nation ever has considered them as reserved for extraordinary occasions. To the second I am equally hostile. Mr. Jefferson has aptly called a national debt a "mortal canker." To me, there has always been something highly objectionable, if not immoral, in the idea of burdening our posterity, for the support of our extravagances. The following remarks of Mr. Jefferson are so admirable that I cannot forbear subjoining them:

"When, merely by avoiding false objects of expense, we are able, without a direct tax, without internal taxes, and without borrowing, to make large and effectual payments towards the discharge of our public debt, and the emancipation of our posterity from that mortal canker, it is an encouragement, fellow-citizens, of the highest order to proceed, as we have begun, in substituting economy for taxation, and in pursuing what is useful for a nation placed as we are, rather than what is practised by others under different cir-circumstances. And whensoever we are destined to meet wants which shall call forth the energies of our countrymen, we have the firmest reliance on those energies, and the comfort of leaving for calls like those the extraordinary resources of loans and internal taxes. In the mean time, by payment of the principal of our debt, we are liberating annually portions of the external taxes, and forming from them a growing fund still further to lessen the necessity of recurring to extraordinary resources."—Message of 15th December, 1802.

My plan, therefore, is one of radical retrenchments, to the full extent, if possible, of the annual deficiency. If, however, good policy should say that these cannot be made, I will consent to unite, with such as can be, a loan of an amount necessary to answer the national wants. But the pruning knife must first be applied, and that effectually. My present impression is, and I hope I shall be able to show it, that three millions, at least, may be lopped off the annual expenses of the Government, without danger; and I now declare, that, unless such reductions are made, I will not vote for one cent of taxes or loans.

It may perhaps be urged that I have given too gloomy a picture of the condition of the finances. But let it be remembered that I have done it upon the official documents. Let it not be said that the calculation contained in these documents make matters worse than they are, and that the receipts of the present year (1821) will be greater than is estimated. Last Winter we were misled by similar suggestions, and most sincerely have we been punished for our folly in giving credit to them. Had we then made the reductions which I now propose, how much better would our situation have been. That the revenue will improve from the present sources, I have no doubt, but not in the present year. It will be seen that the data upon which the Treasury calculations have been made are given to us. Upon these data, no doubt, the estimates have been as favorable for the Treasury as they could be made. Estimates must always be attended with some degree of uncertainty; for, to make them correspond certainly with the receipts would require a degree of sagacity little short of a prophetic spirit. The receipts are sometimes above, but more frequently under the estimates. Last year, (1821,) it would seem, they were two millions less. That they will considerably increase in 1822–3–4, I believe; but I think it demonstrable that the increase will not be greater than will enable the Government, within those years, to relieve itself from the loans incurred in the last and present year, and to leave the Sinking Fund to operate upon the war debt which will then become due.

My plan, then, is, that the expenses shall be reduced three millions at least, which I think cannot be done without greatly reducing the existing establishments; that, if there should yet be a deficiency, it shall be supplied by a loan, redeemable at will. Upon what terms it can be effected, I cannot speak with certainty; but, from information I have lately received from the principal commercial cities, I am so strongly under the impression that it can be effected at five per cent. redeemable at will for a certain number of years, (say five, within which, that uncertainty concerning the investment of capital now apparent in the trading world will probably have ceased,) and afterwards at the will of the lenders, that I would be willing to incur the responsibility of effecting it on those terms.

Let us then, see, in the first place, whether the reductions proposed can be made without detriment to the public safety. In doing this, let it be remembered that we are at peace with the whole world; that the principal difficulty in our foreign relations (I allude to the Florida Treaty and our affairs with Spain) is upon the point of amicable settlement, according to the most undoubted accounts; and, therefore, that we need entertain no fears of a rupture with any foreign Power; and there is as little cause of fear from our "savage neighbors."

In looking into the civil list, I am obliged to confess that I find myself too ignorant of its details to analyze it very scrupulously. Such has been my situation, that I have never had an opportunity of examining it with attention, so as to detect its most useless and expensive parts. The first part of it which presents itself for examination is the expense of the Legislature. Upon the subject of the compensation of members of Congress, my opinions have been long known. I have never attempted to disguise them. I think now as I thought three years ago, that they are worse paid than any other public servants; that, if you wish Congress to be intelligent and independent, you must make a seat there sufficiently lucrative to place him who fills it above the reach of improper influence by more profitable stations; that the compensation should be such as to make a seat more desirable than most other offices. Since the war, the compensation of many of the officers has been increased upon the avowed and proper ground of the depreciation of the currency of the country. In my opinion the pay of Congress has never been properly proportioned to that of other public servants. Three years ago I was favorable to such proportion. Congress, however, although it determined upon increasing it, on account of the depreciation of the currency, fixed upon eight dollars a day as bearing a proper proportion to other public salaries. Well, sir, money has appreciated. Three dollars now will purchase as many or more necessities and comforts as four would then. If depreciation of currency was a good cause for an increase of salaries, (and I admit it was,) appreciation is an equally good cause for their diminution. I shall therefore vote to diminish all that have been increased. If this should be done, can there can be any good reason why, for similar causes, we should not reduce our own compensation? I think not. Therefore, in case other salaries are reduced, I shall vote to reduce the pay of Congress. By a reduction of all salaries, and the pay of Congress, at the rate of twenty per cent. I have calculated a saving to the Treasury of fifty thousand dollars at least.

From a report laid on our tables from the Treasury Department, it would seem that by abolishing certain offices in the collection of the customs, there can be a saving of one hundred thousand dollars. In the organization of the Departments in this city, I think a considerable one could be made. There is now such a degree of complexity under the present organization that one had as well attempt to penetrate the celebrated labyrinth of the days of fable as to understand the connexion of the various offices in the several Departments with each other. We know that the difficulty of bringing to a speedy adjustment the numerous accounts of the receipts and disbursements of public money, in the late war, afforded cause for the creation of many new offices. They have now been in operation for four or five years; and it would seem to me that, if the officers have done their duty, there can be no good reason to continue them. This load of business must, or ought to have been despatched. Could not the public accounts be now managed by three auditors and one comptroller? We have an officer called a Paymaster General. Of what use is he? I have understood that, since the death of the late incumbent, (who, it would seem, died greatly in arrears,) no money is placed in his hands. For aught that I can discover, his business is merely to make out estimates of pay, and correspond with the district paymasters; and this any clerk could do, who understands the common rules of arithmetic. Nearly the same observations may be made about one or both of the commissaries. A clerk of common talents would be able to discharge their duties in examining proposals and making contracts, which at last must undergo the revision of the head of the Department. Then the Surgeon and Apothecary Generals; their duties cannot be so considerable as that one or both cannot be dispensed with. In time of peace, I should suppose each regimental surgeon would be able, if you will furnish him the money, to purchase the necessary medicines and instruments for that portion of the army whose health is intrusted to his care. At least, I think, one of them can be abolished. We have also a Postmaster General, and two assistant Postmasters General. The usefulness of the two assistants I cannot discover. What duties have they to perform that an intelligent clerk could not, and, indeed, does not now discharge? The retention of them is better calculated to destroy all responsibility than for any other purpose. Who now understands the situation of the Post Office Department? I venture to say, no one. Place the whole responsibility upon one man, and then you will be enabled to unravel all its secrets, if any there are. Among other things, I cannot forbear to mention the host of clerks employed in the various public offices in this city. I had made, at one time, a calculation of their number and cost, but I have mislaid my memorandum. I think, however, that, giving them an average salary of twelve hundred dollars each, the sum total of their salaries is not short of three hundred thousand dollars. Whatever necessity there may have been for such a number heretofore, that necessity cannot now exist if they have done their duty; and, if they have not, they should be discharged on that account.

On the subject of miscellaneous expenditures, I can say but little. I have no doubt, however, that there could be retrenchments to some extent; the wisdom of a committee would discover wherein. On the whole, my firm impression is, that in the civil and miscellaneous list, by a new modification of the offices, by the abolition of others, and by reasonable reductions in the salaries of those retained, and by adopting all practicable means of retrenchment, there can be an annual saving of at least $230,000.

I now call the attention of the Committee to the Army. It has not escaped their attention that, at the last session of Congress, a resolution was adopted in this House in the following words, viz:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a plan for the reduction of the Army to six thousand non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, and including such reduction of the general staff as may be required by the state of the Army as is herein proposed, and preserving such parts of the corps of engineers as, in his opinion, without regard to that number, it may be for the public interest to retain; and, also, what saving of the public revenue will be produced by such an arrangement of the Army as he may propose in conformity with this resolution."

One of the resolutions I have proposed, is to execute the principle of reduction contained in the one I have just read. The Secretary of War has submitted a plan conforming to this requisition in every thing but one, and that is, I cannot see in it any thing like "a reduction of the general staff" as the reduced state of the Army might require. It is far from my intention to examine this report in detail; I have no inclination for such a task. Differing widely, as I do, with the report, in many of its principles, I yet agree that it is the ablest, most ingenious, and, upon the whole, the best defence of a standing army in time of peace which I have seen in print since the commencement of Mr. Adams's administration to the present day. To that part of it wherein I differ with its author in principle, there is an answer prepared to my hand, by one whose profound views of national policy will be admitted by all republicans, and upon which I can more safely rely, because it has been sanctioned by the voice of the nation. It will be found in Mr. Jefferson's first Message to Congress. "A statement," says he, "has been formed by the Secretary at War, on mature consideration, of all the posts and stations where garrisons will be expedient, and of the number of men requisite for each garrison." (I wish we had been furnished with a similar document.) "The whole amount is considerably short of the present Military Establishment. For the surplus no particular use can be pointed out. For defence against invasion, their number is as nothing; nor is it considered needful or safe, that a standing army should be kept up in time of peace for that purpose. Uncertain as we must ever be, of the particular point in our circumference, where an enemy may choose to invade us, the only force which can be ready at every point and

'competent to oppose them, is the body of neighboring citizens, as formed into a militia. On these, collected from the parts most convenient, in numbers proportioned to the invading force, it is best to rely, not only to meet the first attack, but, if it threatens to be permanent, to maintain the defence until regulars may be engaged to relieve them. These considerations render it important that we should, at every session, continue to amend the defects which from time to time show themselves in the laws for regulating the militia, until they are sufficiently perfect; nor should we now, or at any time, separate until we can say we have done every thing for the militia which we could do, were an enemy at our door.'

An attempt to enlarge upon this extract would hardly be pardoned by the Committee. It requires none. To all the arguments contained in the report of the War Department, either in favor of a standing army, or against the efficiency of the militia for the defence of the country, I am content to plead this extract as a set-off, and have no doubt but that public opinion will award me judgment for a balance.

As to the extent and particular manner of reducing the Army, I shall now say but little, having been anticipated by the bill reported by the Military Committee, many of whom I know possess so much more knowledge upon the subject than I do, that I willingly leave this branch of the discussion in their hands. I will simply observe, for the purpose of making myself understood in a calculation I am about to present of the saving to be made by the proposed reduction, that I am decidedly in favor of reducing the officers proportionably with the privates of the Army. I can see no utility in an army of officers. To the idea of the Secretary of War, that it will be proper to retain the whole body of the officers, better to preserve a knowledge of the science of war, I cannot subscribe. Could you retain them for fifty years, on a peace establishment, they would be no wiser in the science of war, at the end of that term, than they now are.

In inquiring into the present numerical force of the Army, I find it will not do to examine the official reports of its strength. I have made the inquiry from the estimates of appropriations required for its support in the last year. Could I have seen the estimates of the present year at an earlier period, I would have made it from them. I presume they are not essentially different. From the estimates of 1820, I find the sum total of all the persons for whom pay is asked, including officers, servants, and privates, of every grade and description, to be near 14,000. But let us say 13,500. I find the amount of the appropriations estimated for the support of these under the following heads, viz: pay, subsistence, forage, clothing, bounties, and premiums, medical and hospital department, quartermaster's department, contingent expenses of the Army, and retained bounties, if I have added them correctly, to have been $3,380,614. Then I have said as 10,000, the present rank and file, is to 13,500, (the whole number requiring pay,) so will 6,000 rank and file be to 8,100, the whole number requiring pay after the reduction. Then, again, as 13,500, the present number, is to $3,380,614, the estimated expense, so will be 8,100, the number after reduction, to $2,028,368, their estimated expense, which deducted from $3,380,614, will produce a saving of $1,352,264.

The sum estimated for fortifications this year is $800,000. In saying that one-half of this sum can be withheld, I do not wish it to be understood that I am opposed to the erection of fortifications. I am simply for procrastinating their erection during the present pressure upon the Treasury. To commence without finishing them would be wrong. But where is the necessity of hurrying their completion? Why not proceed more leisurely in the work? Are we in danger of a war? Is there any fear of an invasion requiring them for immediate use? We know there is not in all human probability. Need we, then, involve ourselves in debt to finish them? I think not. No danger can result from proceeding more slowly. Those commenced cannot fly away, and the materials are not of a description that are likely to perish. If they were, they would be unfit for fortifications. Should our means increase, I shall be willing to recommence more rapid operations.

There is one expense in which I think a considerable retrenchment can be made, not included in any specific resolution submitted by me. I allude to the Revolutionary pensions. I feel that I am walking on ticklish ground. This is a subject as fruitful of fine speeches as any that was ever presented before Congress. It is not my intention to move a repeal of the law, but merely to reduce the annual amount. It will be recollected, that at the session, when the law on this subject was passed, the currency of the country was at a very low state of depreciation. I have no doubt this circumstance had a principal influence in fixing the allowance to each private at eight dollars per month. I think it can be fairly reduced, without any charge of injustice, to five dollars per month, with which as many necessities and comforts can now be procured as with eight dollars per month, when the law was passed. An additional reason for such a reduction will be found in this, that, in most cases, the allowance to invalid pensioners, the wounded soldiers, is but about five dollars per month. In some cases I know it is higher, according to the degree of disability. The proposed reduction will make an annual saving of more than $300,000.

In the Ordnance department, I apprehend, some saving could be made, but I know not to what extent.

In noticing the retrenchments proposed in the Naval Establishment, I shall not dwell long. Here, too, I am in a great measure anticipated. I wish it clearly to be understood that I am no enemy of the Navy. Whatever might have been my opinion when the building of the Navy was commenced, I now think there would be extreme folly in building ships of war to sell them, or let them rot. As we have them, let us take care of them. I do not oppose its gradual increase; but I think we are increasing faster than necessary. We have now no use for it. Let us increase, but more slowly. Instead of applying $1,000,000 annually, let us apply only $500,000, and extend the term within which all the intended increase shall be made. The Treasury will be relieved; there is no fear that the materials collected will be lost, and the public service does not require expedition in the work. I am happy to learn that the Naval Committee agree with me on this subject, and I see that the Secretary of the Navy and Commissioners of the Navy Board, with a candor and magnanimity that do them honor, have expressed themselves not unfavorable to the measure.

From the estimates, I see it is proposed to keep in service, during the present year, about 3,000 able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys. It is worthy of remark that, in this country, Congress have no other check upon the number of seamen to be employed than what may be exercised in withholding the appropriations. In England, I believe the number is always settled by a solemn vote of Parliament. We limit by law the number of soldiers, but not of seamen. I do not perceive the necessity of keeping in service a number so large. Our vessels of war are to be found in the Mediterranean sea, on the coast of Africa, in the Indian seas, in the Pacific ocean, in the West Indies—scattered almost over the world, under the plea of protecting commerce and suppressing the slave trade. I apprehend the expense of their maintenance is nearly equal to the commerce protected. By this time the Algerines must be sufficiently intimidated, and all the pirates and slave-traders are either captured or driven off the ocean, so that we might safely reduce the naval force now in active service one-half for two or three years, within which, it is hardly probable they would renew their depredations. It is to be hoped we shall then be in a better financial condition. I propose this as a mere temporary measure, to be continued only until the Treasury is better filled. My calculation is, that, by so doing, a further present annual saving can be made of $500,000. The estimated expense of the Navy for the year 1821, (exclusive of the $1,000,000 per annum, and the expenses of the Marine corps) is $2,207,740.

Should the Committee think the proposed plan worthy of adoption, I have calculated that the sum total of reductions will be $3,230,000, or, in round numbers, let us say $3,000,000,* in the annual expenses of Government. Let it not be supposed that I think this saving can be made in the year 1821. I think no such thing. Time will elapse before we can pass the laws, and more, before the arrangements can be made to carry them into execution; advances may be made to the soldiers, seamen, and officers, discharged, and the very changes in the establishment will create some expense; so that, probably the saving for this year will not be greater than $1,000,000 or $1,500,000. But, in 1822 and 1823, it will be fully equal to the sum proposed, if no change takes place in our foreign affairs, which is believed. But, whatever saving is made in this year will lessen the proposed loan to the amount of the saving.

My object, in conclusion of my remarks, is, to show what will be the result insured by the proposed reductions until the year 1825. As I have said, I cannot believe the receipts in the Treasury in 1821 will exceed the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury. The average receipts for the next four years he calculates at $20,000,000. I wish it may be so. I shall make considerable allowances, so as to be upon more certain grounds to accomplish the objects I have in view, (beyond the introduction of greater economy in the expenses of Government,) which are, to pay off the debt incurred in the expenses of the last and present year, before the war debt becomes due, so as to leave the Sinking Fund unencumbered, to operate with its full force upon that debt. I therefore have proceeded upon the calculation; that the receipts into the Treasury in the year 1821, inclusive of a loan of $6,000,000, (all that is necessary,) will amount to $21,350,000. That the expenses of that year, reduced only $1,000,000, (when probably it will be $1,500,000, if the whole of the retrenchments are adopted,) will be about $21,000,000, leaving a balance in favor of the Treasury. That, in 1822, the receipts of available funds will be $17,000,000, being (exclusive of loans) $2,650,000 more than in 1821.

That, in 1823, they will be $19,000,000, and in 1824, they will be $21,000,000; that, with these funds, after making reductions to the amount of $3,000,000 per annum upon their estimated amount of this year, we cannot do more than pay the expenses of Government, the interest upon the old debt, and redeem the money borrowed in the last and the present year, by the end of the year 1824, (at which time the war debt becomes due,) and yet leave in the Treasury such an unappropriated amount as ought always to be there; that, if you do not reduce at all after the end of this year, you may, to be sure, bear the expenses of Government, but your debt will then be increased to more than $96,000,000. It would seem to me that such results must compel us to adopt some measures similar to those I have proposed.

The calculations whence these conclusions are drawn are subjoined:

The expenses of the year 1821 will be as follows:
 Balance against the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1821, as stated in the Treasury report of the 21st of December, 1820 - - - $4,204,464 24
 For the principal and interest of public debt - - - 5,477,776 76
 Other current expenses of the Government, consisting of the following items, viz:

* To wit, in round numbers:
In the civil and miscellaneous list	- -	$230,000
The expenses of the Army	- -	1,300,000
Fortifications and Ordnance	- -	400,000
Revolutionary pensions	- -	300,000
The appropriation for increase of Navy	- -	500,000
Expenses of the Navy	- -	500,000

THURSDAY, January 4.

Mr. LOWNDES submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to report to this House a statement of the money in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1821, together with a statement of the money in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent for the War and Navy Departments, on that day.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to report to this House the balance of each distinct appropriation for the Navy remaining in the Treasury, or in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent for the Navy Department, on the 1st January, 1821, with an estimate of the amount of each of those balances which will not be required to defray expenses actually incurred before that day.

Which, being read, and the rule requiring them to lie on the table one day being unanimously dispensed with, they were agreed to by the House.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws which direct the manner in which money shall be drawn from the Treasury for the expenditures of the War or Navy Departments, or ordered for the use of those Departments.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for compensating persons employed in transmitting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, reported a resolution, declaring that it is inexpedient to increase the allowance authorized by the existing laws; which, being read, was concurred in by the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of State:

The Secretary of State, conformably to the direction of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of 30th November last, has the honor of submitting a copy of a report made to the President of the United States, on the second of May last, containing all the information in the possession of this Department, relative to the annual amount of the fees of the Clerks, District Attorneys, and Marshals, of the respective Courts of the United States, the amount of whose fees does not appear in the Register of Officers in the service of the United States. He submits, also, copies of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury and of a report of the Comptroller of the Treasury, with a return of the statements required by the resolution of the House, with reference to the naval officers, collectors, and surveyors, of the customs.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 3, 1821.

The report was read, and, together with the documents, ordered to lie on the table.

The engrossed bill to extend the time for the location and return of location of Virginia military land warrants, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The bill for the relief of Daniel Seward was taken up, on motion of Mr. Ross, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution, yesterday submitted by him, calling for certain information relative to the Military Academy.

The adoption of this resolution was opposed by Mr. SIMKINS, as calculated to give needless trouble to the public officers, as requiring information already heretofore given to Congress, and which, if it were received, would not be made use of, &c.

Mr. CANNON declared that he at least considered the information important, as preliminary to a motion which he intended to make, in some shape or other, during the present session, with respect to the Military Academy, &c.

Mr. LITTLE was opposed to acting on the resolution, believing that the required information was already before Congress, or would come before them under resolutions already adopted at the present session, &c.

After some further conversation between Messrs. CANNON, SIMKINS, and FOOT, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

MISSOURI.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, read from his seat the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether there be at this time existing, and in force, in Missouri, any legal tribunals or tribunal, derived from the authority of the United States, invested with competent jurisdiction and powers for the examination and determination of cases of controversy which have arisen, or may arise therein, under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, or controversies to which the United States are or may become a party; and, if there be no such tribunals or tribunal, then to report to this House the provisions and measures which, in their opinion, may be necessary to be adopted by Congress, for causing the authority of the Government and laws of the United States to be respected, and for assuring protection to the property and other rights of the United States, and of their citizens, within Missouri.

Before forwarding the motion to the Chair, Mr. A. stated the motives which induced him to offer it. Whatever might be the situation of Missouri, with respect to this Government, the propriety remained the same of instituting the inquiry he proposed, and of adopting the resolution. He must be candid enough to state, however, that to him it appeared that Missouri stood entirely disconnected from any legal or political relation with this Government. With our own hands, said Mr. A., we have cut all the moorings which attached her to it, and she floats entirely liberated and at large. She stood formerly in the relation of a Territory to the United States: she had proposed to assume the new relation of a State of the Union. This House had refused her permission to do so, and, Mr. A. said, she stands discharged from all relation to the Union. It was vain to tell him that Missouri was a Territory. Such an assertion was disproved by the fact, known to every one, that she had discarded every attribute of that character. The concession which Congress made to Missouri at the last session, Mr. A. said, consisted of two parts: the permission to depart from the existing relations of a Territory, and the permission to assume, under certain conditions, the relations of a member of the Confederacy. She must have departed from the relation of a Territory before she could have availed herself of the second part of the concession to her. What is it that Congress can admit into the Union? Not a Territory, but a State. Missouri was therefore obliged to cease to be a Territory before she could be in a condition to claim admission into the Union; and she became a State. Not only, then, in point of fact, but in legal acceptance, Missouri is no longer a Territory.

Mr. A. said he was not intimating, nor would he be understood as intimating, that the people of Missouri wished to be permanently disconnected from the Union. He was assured she was attached to the Union by feelings generated by her descent from it, and by a true reverence for the principles of its institutions. Nor did he say that she had shown any disposition to throw off the yoke of allegiance to the Union; it was this House which had itself cut loose the harness, and thrown away the reins. Mr. A. went on to say, that, if Congress could act at all at present with reference to Missouri, such was now her condition, that it could not act by law, but must act by force. The authority of the Union might hang over her, but there was no legal modes by which it could be exercised. All its ordinary and regular conductors were broken off. With regard to Missouri, Mr. A. said the citizens of the United States had individual rights, which it was the duty of Congress to secure. Many of them, for example, had received donations of land in that Territory, in requital of their services, of their blood, and of the glory they had acquired for their country. Congress were bound, by the most sacred of all obligations, to insure protection to those rights. The question, therefore, which he wished to present to the consideration of gentlemen was this: Where are the tribunals and methods by which these and other rights can be protected—where the channels by which the authority of the Government can be enforced? No man could say that there existed such tribunals, or channels, for the enforcement of our authority. My proposition, said Mr. A., is not presented because of any peculiar situation of Missouri, but because of the ambiguity of it—because no man can say what it is. Suppose, he said, that he was right in his opinion of the condition of Missouri, every one would say that an inquiry ought to be instituted with the view to establish some bonds of relation between Missouri and this Government. But, suppose that he were mistaken on this point, the inquiry would yet be proper, in order to remove the doubts which he and others entertained. In every view in which he considered the subject, he thought the inquiry ought to take place. He did not propose that this inquiry should be committed to himself, or to those who agreed with him in opinion, but he proposed to refer it to a standing committee of the House, which might reasonably be supposed to be an impartial tribunal, and at the head of which (Mr. SERGEANT) was one of the most prominent of those who differed from him in opinion on this topic.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Mr. A. said he was far from supposing that there would be any opposition to this proposition; but, if there were, he would say to the opponents of it, that they had taken upon themselves to direct the course of our legislation on this subject, and, if they had not foundered, they had at least brought us into the neighborhood of shoals and breakers. If gentlemen who constitute the late majority of this House were to refuse to agree to the proposed inquiry, he would then say, what he was now very far from saying, that they were afraid to pursue the principle of their own vote in its operation, and to stand confronted with the results.

The resolution having been read from the Chair—

Mr. SERGEANT suggested that the resolution was one of such a description as ought not to be acted upon without affording an opportunity to every member of the House to vote upon it. He therefore moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. COBB said it was a very unusual course to move to lay on the table a resolve proposing inquiry merely. It would seem almost a matter of course to agree to such a resolution moved by any gentleman. When the committee should report would be the time for deciding any principle involved in this proposition.

Mr. SERGEANT said, if this were a simple proposition for inquiry, in the ordinary shape of such propositions, there would be no force in the remark of the gentleman from Georgia. But, Mr. S. said, he thought it perfectly plain and obvious that this resolution assumed, as the ground work of it, certain opinions in regard to Missouri, about which the sentiments of the members of this House had already been more or less expressed. It was taken for granted, no doubt, by the mover, and his proposition assumed it as a fact, that, in consequence of something which has happened, a change has been produced in the position of Missouri in regard to the Union, which renders it necessary that there should be new legislation in regard to it; and it of course took for granted what had been a source of litigation certainly, and what a large portion of this House will not accede to. If a question existed whether the relation of Missouri to the Union be thus changed, it was a question which ought to be discussed and decided in this House, before a committee was charged with it in any shape. The inquiry whether the relation of Missouri to the Union be in reality changed, must precede the adoption of a resolution such as this is, which assumes that a new code of laws is necessary for its government. He thought this House ought not at once, without notice, to go into the discussion of the question whether Missouri has or has not changed her condition. So strongly impressed was he with this opinion, that he had moved to lay the resolution on the table; and, if the discussion were pressed at this time, he should certainly vote against the resolution.

Mr. LOWNDES said he had hoped the resolution would have appeared to the House to be such a one as did not involve any of the questions which had been suggested. As, however, time was desired, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would consent to its lying on the table until to-morrow. But assuredly, Mr. L. said, it did not involve any such question as had been supposed. It proposes an inquiry into the matter of fact, whether there now exists a tribunal in Missouri adequate to particular objects. It proceeds on the supposition that every party in the House is desirous to know the actual relation which Missouri bears to the Union—to decide whether it be necessary to legislate or not to legislate on the subject; not only to ascertain what is the relation between Missouri and the Union, but what it may be proper to do, if any thing, in consequence of the fact thus to be ascertained. Whilst, however, Mr. L. said, he believed that resolutions of inquiry ought in general to be assented to without objection, and whilst he believed this to be of that character merely, yet if, from the terms of the resolution, it should appear to any member, and most of all it appeared to a member of the committee to whom it was proposed to assign the consideration of the subject, that it involved an important principle, he admitted it would be proper to give time for the consideration of it.

Mr. GROSS, of New York, said, that though he presumed he entertained, with respect to the answer which ought to be given to this resolution, the same opinion as the gentleman at the head of the Judiciary Committee, he was ready to act upon it without delay. If he believed that it took any thing for granted, particularly if he believed that it took for granted that there was no legal tribunal by which such questions could be settled, he should certainly vote for laying it on the table, and finally against the resolution. But, as he was of a different opinion, he should vote for the resolution, and against laying it on the table. It would be well recollected, he said, that during the discussion of the subject at the present session, the position had been taken that Missouri was a State, and that, though admitted into the Union, she was an independent State. This position was taken by a gentleman whose weight of character and talents gave a color to whatever he should advance. For his part, Mr. G. said, when the question on the admission of Missouri was before the House, he had made up his mind on the subject of this resolution. He hoped that, if the resolution passed, the true answer would be given, and he was therefore in favor of the resolution.

Mr. FLOYD said, it was a very unusual thing for the House to hesitate in respect to motions for inquiry. He was glad to find that the gentleman from New York thought so clearly on the subject. As this was an important subject, he wished to record his opinion on the postponement, and therefore required that the question should be decided by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered—

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said, if the wish of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for delay were pressed, though it was so unusual a course, he should be bound, by considerations of courtesy, to accede to the motion now before the House. He was rather disposed, however, to take the same view of this matter as had been taken by the gentleman from New York, that every one, before he gave a vote against the admission of Missouri, must have foreseen the necessity for a resolution and inquiry of this sort. Every member of the majority of the House must have known that the question must have come upon him in some shape or other, and must therefore have been prepared for it. With regard to the character of this proposition it was not novel. If the facts should be ascertained as the gentleman from New York supposed, there would be no occasion for any expression of the opinion of the Judiciary Committee as to what ought to be done, &c.

Mr. FULLER made a few remarks to the effect that he did not consider it of much importance whether the resolution passed to-day or to-morrow; that he had examined it, and had no great objection to it; but, only to save the needless trouble of calling the yeas and nays, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would withdraw his objection to laying it on the table.

Mr. ARCHER said he had already done so, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania pressed it, though such a course was not usual, nor in his opinion necessary in this case.

Mr. SERGEANT said that the gentlemen from South Carolina and Virginia had concurred in considering this resolution as proposing an inquiry into a matter of fact. Mr. S. said, if he understood this resolution at all, it proposed an inquiry, not into a matter of fact, but a matter of law, and that matter of law involving a point on which there was known to be more or less difference of opinion in this House. The question, whether there now exists a tribunal in Missouri, was not a question of fact, but it was a question of law. It was not a question whether tribunals heretofore have existed, but whether they do now exist. There was an objection to referring to a committee an inquiry into a matter of law, which is not to be tested by evidence, &c., but must depend upon opinion, which every member in his place would form as well as a committee, whose report on such a subject would only leave the question where it stood before. With respect to what is to be done in relation to Missouri, it must be perfectly obvious that this cannot be ascertained until the sense of the House is ascertained on the previous question; and the clear course would be to ascertain the sense of the House, and then send the matter to a committee to report such bills as should be calculated to give effect to it. He did not know that, on further examination, the resolution might be liable to the objection he now felt to it; but he wished time to decide that point.

Mr. STORRS wished the resolution to lie on the table, for this reason—that he wished gentlemen to have time to obtain the necessary information to enable them to act on the subject. He had himself no information whatever which went to show that Missouri was not in the same situation now that she had been for the few years past, except that her convention had met, and agreed upon a form for her future government. He did not say, that he had not heard, out of doors, that she had elected a Governor, Legislature, &c. But he did not wish to proceed to the consideration of this resolution until the information was given to him officially, on which he was to act. A resolution addressed to the Executive, who is charged with the execution of the laws of the United States, would, he supposed, elicit the necessary information. For aught we know officially, said Mr. S., the officers of the United States in that Territory may be at this moment in the full discharge of all their functions. He could not consent to assume it as a fact, that the authority of the United States in Missouri was in full operation. He could not assume it as a fact, that the President has failed in his duty of appointing a Governor and other officers, in pursuance of the laws. By entertaining this inquiry, said Mr. S., the House would assume, in some degree, the duties of the Executive, and bring us in collision with that department. For his part, he said, he could not consent that this House should thus take upon itself the responsibility which belonged to another department of the Government. Whenever the authority of the United States in Missouri was set at defiance, or whenever, from any cause whatever, the authority of the United States in that Territory should be at an end, he presumed Congress would receive from the Executive department information of it. Until such information was received, he could not agree to consider the subject. When it did come, he reserved to himself to decide what course ought to be taken. But the proper course for gentlemen at the present time appeared to him to be, to call on the Executive to inform the House whether the laws of the United States were at present duly executed in Missouri, &c. If the President should say, in reply, that the laws are not executed, and our authority not in existence, it would then be time enough to refer the subject to a committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL said the time might come, during the present session, when he should not have the smallest objection to this resolution; but, he must be allowed to state, that he did not think the present was the proper time. It was well understood, that there were several projects on foot for the admission of Missouri into the Union. When all these failed, he said, he should be as ready as any gentleman to assent to this resolution. If gentlemen were prepared to say that no further efforts would be made to accomplish that object, he was ready to vote for the resolution now. But, he said, in every quarter of the country, it is anticipated that the discussion will be revived on the resolution from the Senate: in the paper from Richmond received to-day, there were two or three letters from Washington to that effect. The understanding was, he believed, that perhaps next week the resolution on the table of the Clerk might be called up, and decided on. If every effort should fail for the admission of Missouri, it would be proper to adopt such a resolution as this, but, in his opinion, not till then.

Mr. Foor rose to show, by example, that the motion to lay this resolution on the table was not unprecedented. He agreed fully in opinion with the gentleman from Ohio, that the resolution ought to be laid on the table, and should not agree to take it up again until the resolution from the Senate should have been finally acted on.

Mr. Lowndes said, a very little reflection would satisfy any one that it was not necessary to postpone this resolution until the other question referred to should be decided. He submitted to the House the consideration, that the report of the committee under this resolution might have considerable influence on the question to be decided on the proposition from the Senate. It appeared to him, he had no hesitation in saying, that no man could vote on the various propositions which had been alluded to, unless his mind was made up on the topics presented by the resolution now before the House. Whilst up, Mr. L. adverted to what had fallen from his friend from New York, who opposed the resolution because we know nothing officially of any change in the actual condition of Missouri. If we knew nothing on that subject, said Mr. L., it would be reason enough for inquiry that there is out-of-door conversation on the subject. We must not act on such information, but was it ever before heard that we must not inquire into any matter because it has been spoken of out-of-doors only? The practice of every day was different. But, if official information was necessary, the House had that information. It had information, from the constitution presented by Missouri, that, at a certain time, the authority of the United States was to determine, and that of a new State to commence. He did not here speak of the question of right in regard to the people of Missouri, but of the question of fact. It was true that there was a question of fact presented by this resolution, but it was also true that there was a question of law, and nothing was more usual than, in regard to questions of law, to refer them to the committee of this House consisting of legal men, constituted to consider such questions, being the committee to which it was proposed to refer this resolution.

Mr. Storrs explained, that he had reserved the question of the expediency of an inquiry into this matter. His objection to acting on the subject now was, that it appeared to him the proper course would be, first to call on the Executive.

Mr. Archer said, he acceded to the proposed postponement, only because, as the mover of the resolution, he felt bound to do so. If not thus obliged, he should have voted against postponement. The objections of the gentleman to the resolution, he said, were not consistent—one gentleman opposed it because it proposed an inquiry into facts; another because it proposed an inquiry into a matter of law. Both objections could not be sound. He believed, he said, in conclusion, that the responses to this resolution would be very easy indeed; and he must be allowed to indulge the remark, that, in the reluctance of gentlemen to act on the subject, he found a confirmation of his belief that the answer could be easily given.

The question on laying the resolution on the table was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, 91 votes to 58, as follows:

REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union; and the consideration of Mr. Cobb's resolutions for reducing the expenditures of the Government was resumed.

Mr. Smith, of Maryland, delivered a speech in reply to Mr. COBB's speech of yesterday, generally in opposition to the resolutions.

Mr. EUSTIS followed, in reply to a part of Mr. SMITH's remarks; and, at 4 o'clock, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 5.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of John Crute, which was twice read and committed.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the Committee on the General Post Office, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Erastus Granger; Mr. TRACY moved to reverse the report; when, on motion, the report was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of J. Ottramare, which was twice read and committed.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee of Naval Affairs, reported a bill to amend the act for the gradual increase of the Navy. [Repealing the first section and reducing the appropriation for that object of that law, from one million of dollars, annually to five hundred thousand dollars, for six years.] The bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, submitted the following resolutions, which were read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

1. Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House what amount of appropriation will be necessary to complete existing contracts for the erection of fortifications.

2. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform this House what sums of money will be requisite to complete existing contracts, made in pursuance of the act for the gradual increase of the Navy.

On motion of Mr. FULLER, the Message from the President of the United States, received the 2d instant, communicating information in relation to the protection afforded to the commerce of the United States in the West Indies, &c., was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Two Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The first of the said Messages was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I communicate to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, which, with the papers accompanying it, contain all the information in the possession of the Executive, requested by a resolution of the House of the 4th December last, on the subject of the African slave trade.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4, 1821.

The Message and documents were referred to the Committee on the subject of the African slave trade.

The other of the said Messages was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of 15th of December last, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before that House a statement of expenditures and receipts in the Indian Department; also, the nature and extent of the contracts entered into, and with whom, from the 2d of March, 1811, to the present period, I now transmit a letter from the Secretary of War, with a report of the Superintendent of Indian Trade, which contain the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4, 1821.

The Message and documents were ordered to lie on the table.

REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union; and the consideration of Mr COBB's resolutions was resumed.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, said, the resolutions under consideration covered much ground on which he should not enter. He would leave what related to the revenues of the country to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland.) He was satisfied to hear that honorable member affirm that the receipts of the year 1821 would exceed the expenditures of the year. I would not, said Mr. S., destroy or cripple any of the institutions of the country for the purpose of paying off immediately the national debt. If we should borrow at a lower rate of interest a part of the sum which we pay off, we are diminishing the debt and its interest, and doing well. I will put a case to the honorable member from Georgia, (Mr. COBB.) Suppose that he owed $100,000 to the bank at Savannah, and had determined with himself to pay it off in ten annual instalments: would he, if his cotton crop failed a year or two, break up his establishments, and allow his plantations to go to ruin, that he might pay the amount of his contemplated annual instalment, or would he not renew his notes, and wait for more favorable seasons before he paid off his debt? He would, doubtless.

The proposition made by the honorable member from Georgia, for retrenchment of the expenditures of Government has my approbation, and I will go with him in making every reasonable retrenchment. The principles laid down by Mr. Jefferson in his addresses to Congress, and quoted by the honorable member from Georgia, are worthy of universal approbation. Those principles constitute a republican text, to which the legislator should often refer. But, although a people may have too much law, too much public force, too many offices, too much of the machinery of Government, it by no means follows, that therefore they should have none. The question to be considered is, how much is essential, or how much is useful?

Mr. Jefferson furnished a practical commentary on his own principles, relative to the expediency of having an army in time of peace. In the year 1802, when the policy of retrenching the expenditures of the Government was carried to the greatest extremity, he retained in service an army of

H. OF R.

3,300 men, and in the year 1808, after he had tried for some time his system of Government, he increased the Military Establishment to 10,000 men, at a time when there was no war, and when, owing to his extremely pacific temper, there was little probability of a war. It appears, therefore, to have been the mature opinion of Mr. Jefferson, that a nation should, in time of peace, be prepared for war, by having in service, previous to its commencement, a respectable military force.

The honorable Speaker of this House having thought proper to assign to me the situation of chairman of the Military Committee, it has become my duty to offer my opinion as to so much of the resolutions before you as affects the Army. A great question has arisen in this debate highly interesting to this nation. It is this: Can the people of the United States most safely trust their defence in time of war to the militia, or can that defence be more safely confided to regular troops? One having popularity in view might well shrink from the investigation of this question. The duty which I owe to the nation and to the House shall be performed without any regard to the consequences, as they may relate to myself. I will examine this question with the best lights I have been able to obtain, and without favor.

The militia are a portion of the people; and we should remember that the regular troops are also a portion of the people. We are apt to view the latter as if they were strangers. It is the difference of organization that constitutes the difference between the militia and regular troops in the service of the United States; both are composed of citizens; and the same man may alternately serve in both. In the militia, when in service, you have a force composed of men drawn by compulsion into the service, for six months only, and serving under officers appointed by the States, called into service for the same time. In the regular troops you have men who have willingly entered the service for five years; serving under officers appointed by the Government of the United States. The question is, can we, the people, best confide in that portion of ourselves which constitute a militia, as heretofore organized, or in that portion of ourselves which may constitute a regular army, as heretofore organized?

I will contend, and I expect to prove, that the militia, as organized, do not deserve the confidence of the nation for the purpose of carrying on war; that militia are the most expensive force that the nation can employ; that to keep a militia army in the field is most distressing to the people; that the laws for that purpose operate most unequally and unjustly; that the regular troops of the American army have deserved the confidence of the nation, for the purposes of carrying on war; and that the nation ought therefore to have an adequate army of regular troops in time of war.

The first position that I am to maintain is, that the militia, as organized, do not deserve the confidence of the nation, as a means of carrying on war. Let me not be misunderstood. I speak of the militia as now and heretofore organized. It is not to be denied, that an organization might be given to the militia that would produce from them an army of regular troops; but no such organization is likely to be given to the militia. What are the qualities which entitle troops to the confidence of a nation in time of war? I answer—subordination, patience, and fidelity in service; steadiness and firmness in action. Do the militia of the United States, when called into service, possess these qualities? This is a delicate question. I will not take upon myself to answer the question. History shall answer. I will first examine the conduct of the militia during the war of the Revolution; and, secondly, their conduct in the last war; and I will only notice their conduct when serving under commanders of high military reputation.

Judge Marshall, in his Life of Washington, has taught important lessons on this subject. Yet, it would seem as if the members of Congress, during the last war, had forgotten the events of the war of the Revolution. In speaking of the defects in the structure of the American army, the historian says:

"Militia were not merely depended on as auxiliaries, and as covering the country from the sudden irruptions of small parties, for which purposes they ought certainly to be competent, and with a view to which they will always be important; but they were also relied on as constituting the main body and strength of the army. Their absolute incapacity to maintain this station in the military arrangements of any country engaged in war with an enemy of nearly equal strength, employing a permanent force, at all times capable of being used to its utmost extent, was demonstrated to the conviction of scepticism itself; and under the weight of this conviction, every exertion was made by Congress, though almost too late, to remedy the very extensive mischief which this fatal error had already produced."

But, said Mr. S., it is to the letters of General Washington himself that we are to look for evidence, to enable us to determine whether militia are subordinate, patient, and faithful in service. In September, 1776, he says: "The militia, instead of calling forth their utmost efforts to a brave and manly opposition, in order to repair our losses, are dismayed, intractable, and impatient to return. Great numbers of them have gone off—in some instances almost by whole regiments, by half ones, and by companies, at a time." And, in speaking of the militia of Connecticut, who were considered as inferior to none, he says: "The impulse for going home was so irresistible, it answered no purpose to oppose it. Though I would not discharge, I have been obliged to acquiesce; and it affords one more melancholy proof how delusive such dependencies are."

Deeply impressed with the subject, and foreseeing ruin from a reliance on militia, he says, "If I was called to declare, upon oath, whether the militia have been most serviceable or hurtful, upon the whole, I should subscribe to the latter;" and he adds, in the same letter, "no man who regards order, regularity, and economy, or who has any regard for his honor, character, or peace of 'mind, will risk them upon this issue." Again he says, "I plainly foresee an intervention of time between the old and new army, which must be filled up with militia, if to be had; with whom no man who has any regard for his reputation can undertake to be answerable for consequences." Here, said Mr. S., we have the oath of Washington that militia are pernicious. I say, his oath; for his offer to swear is the same to me as if he had done so. Here we discover that, of all the untoward events that happened to him, nothing so distressed him, nothing so preyed upon his mind, as the employment of militia, whom he considered as endangering his honor and the independence of the country.

Such having been the character of the militia in the war of the Revolution, let us inquire if it has undergone any material change. Let us see if they were subordinate, patient, and faithful, in service, during the last war. I will refer you to a historical work, "the Life of General Jackson," for a development of the conduct and character of the militia of Tennessee, a State whose militia is perhaps entitled to the post of honor among the several States. The historian, when relating events which happened in the country of the Creeks, says, "at length revolt began to show itself openly. The officers and soldiers of the militia, collecting in their tents, and talking over their grievances, determined to abandon their camp. In the morning, when they were to carry their intentions into execution, he (Jackson) drew up the volunteers in front of them, with positive commands to prevent their progress, and compel them to return to their former position in camp. The next day, however, presented a singular scene. The volunteers, who, the day before, had been the instruments for compelling the militia to return to their duty, seeing the destruction of those hopes on which they had lately built, in turn began to mutiny themselves." The writer says all must have felt a consciousness "that the privations of which they complained were far less grievous than they had represented them; by no means sufficient to justify revolt, and not greater than a patriot might be expected to bear without a murmur." Such were the difficulties with which General Jackson had to struggle, that scarce was one mutiny quelled until another appears. The historian tells us, "on his (Jackson's) arrival, he found a much more extensive mutiny than that which had just been quelled. Almost the whole brigade had put itself in an attitude to move forcibly off." No sooner have we read the account of this evidence of a want of subordination, than we are presented with another. "At length, on the evening of the 9th, General Hall hastened to the tent of General Jackson, with information that his whole brigade was in a state of mutiny." Soon after, the historian informs us of the disaffection of General Coffee's brigade. "They had proceeded as far as Ditto's Ferry, when the greater part of them, refusing to cross the river, returned in a tumultuous manner, committing, on the route, innumerable irregularities, which there was no 'force sufficient to restrain." Of these men, General Jackson, in an official order, says, "that they are returning home, not only like deserters, but in the real genuine character of such, is, indeed, a lamentable truth." The historian closes this relation by telling us that, "thus, in a tumultuous manner, they broke up, and, committing innumerable extravagancies, regardless alike of law and decency, continued their route to their respective homes."

It appears, said Mr. S., that the character of the militia in the last war, was not materially changed from what it had been during the war of the Revolution. It is not possible to add to this evidence so as to make it more conclusive in proving that the militia are not subordinate, patient, faithful, and persevering, when in service; therefore, they are not to be relied on by the American people, for the purpose of carrying on war.

I find, in a late newspaper, this paragraph: "The session of the supreme court at Utica closed on Saturday last. Among the important causes argued before them, was one involving the validity of the proceedings of the court martial under General Stedford, organized for the purpose of trying those militiamen who 'declined, neglected, or refused,' to go into the service of the United States during the latter part of the last war, in obedience to the orders of the Governor of this State, issued in conformity to the requisitions of the President of the United States. The fines imposed by that body are supposed to exceed $100,000, and the number of delinquents amounted to upwards of nine thousand." Would it be proper, said Mr. S., after this, to place our reliance on militia, when we find them refuse, in such numbers, in one of the most patriotic States, when legally called, to enter the service of the United States? And, until they join your service, you have not, by the existing laws, any command over them. The effect of efforts to raise an army of militia is to produce a multitude of fines; in collecting which, the courts shall be engaged some years after the war is ended. On such a system of defence it would be folly to place our reliance.

I will next inquire of history whether militia are firm and steady in action. We will return to the war of the Revolution, and to the battle of Camden, where Gates commanded about four thousand men, opposed to about two thousand of the enemy. Better troops than the American regulars who fought in that action never appeared in any field. But there, the historian tells us, "the intimidated militia threw down their arms and fled from the field with the utmost precipitation;" (and these were Virginia militia too.) "Except one regiment commanded by Colonel Dixon, an old continental officer, which was posted nearest the continental troops, the whole North Carolina division followed the shameful example. Dixon's regiment maintained its ground for great part of the action. Other parts of the same brigade, which was commanded by Gregory, made a show of fighting, and the whole paused for an instant; but the terror of their brethren was soon commu'nicated to them, and they, also, threw away their arms, and sought safety in flight. Very few of the militia of North Carolina or Virginia discharged a single musket, and a still smaller number brought one off the field."

Thus, said Mr. S., in consequence of the misconduct of the militia, of their utter want of firmness in action, our regular troops were cut to pieces, the enemy with a force greatly inferior in point of numbers triumphed, the Carolinas were lost, the independence of the country brought into jeopardy; and the declaration of Washington again fully justified; that no man, who has any regard for his honor, character, or peace of mind, should risk them on militia.

I will bring you next to the battle of Guilford, where we had more than four thousand men, opposed to less than two thousand of the enemy; and as we had more than one thousand six hundred regular troops, the entire defeat of the enemy must have been the result, had the militia performed their duty in a tolerable manner. The historian having given us the order of battle, says "the British troops advanced to the charge with the cool determined courage which discipline inspires. Notwithstanding the great advantages of their position, and the security afforded by the cover of a thick wood, strong fence, and a second line in their rear, the North Carolina militia fled with the utmost precipitation. At the distance of one hundred and forty yards their fire commenced on an enemy advancing through an open field. Many of them did not once discharge their loaded muskets; and except the small part of one of the battalions in Eaton's brigade, none gave more than a second fire. The exertions of their generals and field officers were entirely unavailing. Terrified at the sight of the enemy, they fled in every direction. Many of them threw away their arms; and dispersing themselves through the woods, made the best of their way to their respective homes. The few who kept their ground gave way, of course, on the first fire that was made upon them."

Thus, said Mr. S., as the misconduct of the militia of Virginia gave the enemy possession of the Carolinas, so the misconduct of the militia of North Carolina, and their equal want of firmness in action, gave the enemy a victory where he should have met with an entire defeat; and this led to the invasion of Virginia. Another confirmation of the declaration of General Washington, that, "To place any dependence upon militia, is assuredly resting upon a broken staff."

Let us inquire if the militia in the late war exhibited a greater degree of firmness and steadiness in action, than they did in the war of the Revolution. I have seen an opinion ascribed to a distinguished friend of the United States, to whom they owe the debt of perpetual gratitude, which inculcates an error that I am laboring to remove. The Marquis La Fayette, to whom I allude, says "the battle which closed this war, that of New Orleans, is one of the curious phenomena of military history, and one of the best arguments in favor of the employment of militia to resist the attacks of regular troops." Let the Marquis think so. Let all Europe think so; it is well: but let us not be deceived; it would be a fatal deception. The victory of New Orleans was owing to the great ability of the American General, the advantages of his position, and the incapacity of his opponent, who neglected to advance until it was too late. But, General Jackson did not command militia alone; and he probably would have failed, had he commanded militia only. It appears, by documents which I hold in my hand, that, in addition to a little more than four thousand militia, General Jackson had under his command nine hundred and three United States' troops, of whom fifty-two were officers, and he was aided by seven hundred and four seamen and marines, of whom sixteen were commissioned officers. General Jackson deserves immortal renown; nor does it detract from the praise justly due to him, that of the force who fought at New Orleans, one thousand six hundred were trained men, commanded by skilful officers.

To assist you in deciding whether the militia in the last war were firm and steady in danger, I will first offer you the testimony of General Cass. In a letter written in January, 1814, from Williams-ville, near Buffalo, he says: "The circumstances attending the destruction of Buffalo, you will have heard before this reaches you; but the force of the enemy has been greatly magnified. From the most careful examination, I am satisfied, that not more than six hundred and fifty men, of regulars, militia, and Indians, landed at Black Rock. To oppose these we had from two thousand five hundred to three thousand militia; all except a very few of them behaved in the most cowardly manner. They fled without discharging a musket." I will next offer the testimony of General Brown, given from Sackett's Harbor, in June, 1813, and containing an account of his first battle. He says, "our strength at this point was now five hundred men, all anxious for battle, as far as profession would go. My orders were that the troops should lie close, and reserve their fire till the enemy had approached so near that every shot might hit its object. It is however, impossible to execute such orders with raw troops, unaccustomed to subordination. My orders were in this case disobeyed. The whole line fired, and not without effect; but in the moment when I was contemplating this, to my utter astonishment, they rose and fled. It was during this last movement that the regulars under Colonel Backus first engaged the enemy; nor was it long before they defeated him. The result of the action, so glorious to the officers and soldiers of the regular army, has already been communicated in my letter of the 29th." It does not, said Mr. S., appear from history that the conduct of the militia in the last war was different in action from what it was in the war of the Revolution. The general testimony of history is, that militia are not to be relied on to oppose regular troops in the field. They have generally fled from regular troops at the first fire. They thus fled at Camden, at Guilford Courthouse, at Sackett's Harbor, at Buffalo, and at Bladensburg. This Capitol burned by incendiaries, will be a monument, as long as it stands, to prove that militia are an unsafe dependence for defence. Militia to oppose regular troops require either the advantage of a rampart, or that they shall be highly irritated. General Washington remarks that, "when men are irritated and the passions inflamed, they fly hastily and cheerfully to arms." At Bunker's Hill and at New Orleans, the militia had a rampart. At Saratoga, and the immediately preceding actions, the minds of the militia were highly inflamed by the cruel and impolitic proceedings of the enemy.

The honorable member from Massachusetts has informed us of a contest seen and reported to him by General Brown, wherein a militia regiment attacked a regiment of regular troops in open space, and put them to flight. I have inquired of the honorable member where this happened, and he says the place was not named to him. As this is a subject on which I have conversed with that distinguished officer, I was somewhat surprised at the information; and apprehend the honorable member must have been mistaken in what he supposed General Brown said to him. In a written paper which I hold in my hand, given to me by General Brown, he says, "It is believed that undisciplined men never did achieve a victory, when opposed by regulars in open space, or by field engagement." This is directly at variance with the information which the honorable member from Massachusetts supposes he received from General Brown.

I will proceed to show that militia are the most expensive defence that a nation can employ. Here, again, I will offer the testimony of the historian of the life of Washington. He says, "The immense loss of arms resulting inevitably from their being placed in the hands of troops who were soon to return home, and who could not be subjected to discipline while in camp, was a very serious mischief." He tells us, "They carried off arms and blankets, which had been unavoidably delivered to them to be used while in camp, and thus wasted in advance the supplies collected for the use of the army, now recruiting for the ensuing campaign." The testimony of General Washington himself is still more full, clear, and conclusive. He says, "Certain I am that it would be cheaper to keep fifty thousand or one hundred men in constant pay than to depend on half the number, and supply the other half occasionally by militia. Again he says, "The saving in the articles of stores, provisions, and a thousand other things, by having nothing to do with militia, unless in cases of extraordinary exigency, would amply support a large army, which, well officered, would be daily improving, instead of continuing a destructive, expensive, and disorderly mob. I am clear in opinion, that, if forty thousand men had been kept in constant pay since the first commencement of hostilities, and the militia had been excused during that period, the continent would have saved money." Equally remarkable, said Mr. S., for profusion and waste was the conduct of the militia during the late war. The writer of the Life of General Jackson, speaking of a brigade of militia, says, "They committed the wildest extravagancies, profusely wasting the public grain, which with much difficulty and labor had been collected there for the purpose of the campaign, and indulging in every species of excess."

I hold in my hand a still more satisfactory piece of evidence of the monstrous expense attending the employment of militia by the United States. It is an abstract, showing, in part, the number of militia who, during the last war, were in the service of the United States, and paid separately. Can you guess, sir, within an hundred of the number of militia generals employed? The number was one hundred and seventy-four. Yes, sir, you had one hundred and seventy-four militia generals in service in the last war; and an aggregate of four hundred and ten thousand men.^(a) The pay of these militia, including the subsistence and forage of officers, amounted to more than twelve million six hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of the subsistence of the men, the quartermasters' supplies, the transportation, ordnance stores, medical stores, and other expenses, which must have amounted to an enormous sum.*

I have said, that to keep a militia army in the field is most distressing to the people. To prove this, I will recur one moment to the Life of Washington. The writer says, "The frequent demands made on the militia were extremely harassing and distressing to the great body of the people. In those States most exposed to these calls, serious apprehensions were entertained for the agriculture of the country." Again he says, "The burden of calling militia from their domestic avocations at every threat of invasion, and of watching the different stations of the enemy with men whose principal pursuit was the cultivation of the soil, began to be so intolerable, that the people cast about for other expedients to relieve themselves from its weight." He adds, "The inconvenience of relying on militia only for security against even sudden invasion, was so strongly felt that the States generally resolved to raise particular corps of regular troops for individual defence." We know that, in the last war, the same cause produced the like effect, and that Virginia determined to raise a regular army of ten thousand men for the defence of the State. The distressing consequences of frequent calls on the militia are also noticed by General Washington, who says, "The militia, who have been harassed and tired by repeated calls upon them, (and farming and manufactures in a manner suspended,) would, upon any pressing emergency, have run with alacrity to arms; whereas the cry now is, they may be as well ruined in one way as another."

It should be recollected, said Mr. S., that the militia are drawn into service by a conscription. You take the unwilling man, you force the father from his family, the stripling from his widowed mother. You produce much private distress, besides injuring agriculture and manufactures. How-many of the youth of Virginia died ingloriously at Norfolk, who were constrained into the service against their will, and never saw an enemy! A regular force, raised by bounties, is composed of willing men—of those least attached to, and least important to society. If we must offer human sacrifices to the Moloch of war, let them be willing sacrifices.

I have said, that keeping up the militia army for the purpose of carrying on war, operates unequally and unjustly on the people. Such an army will be kept up by those States which are near to the seat of war, while those at a distance will be wholly exempted from this distressing service. Thus, in the last war, the militia of New York, Tennessee, and some other States, were called on to make immense sacrifices for the common cause, while those of South Carolina, New Jersey, New Hampshire, and other States, were almost entirely exempted. Not only is the tax on human life made very unequal, but the bounties paid for substitutes amount to an oppressive tax, paid in particular districts, and by particular individuals in those districts. Many persons during the last war paid $300 each, as bounties to keep up the militia army, while thousands of the wealthy paid nothing, and rendered no service. The militia laws have operated unjustly in the same districts. In some cases you have gone half through the militia rolls; one-half have performed tours of duty, or paid $300 each for substitutes, the other half have not done any duty, or paid any thing.

Militia service operates as a capitation tax—the most unjust of all taxes. If an army is raised by bounties, those bounties are paid by the Treasury, and raised by just principles of taxation on the whole wealth of the community.

You should also consider the effect which the bounties given by militiamen for substitutes had on your recruiting service. When you were inclined to make a great exertion to get a regular army in the last war, you gave a bounty of $124 for five years service; but you at the same time continued your calls on the militia, who offered a bounty of $300 for six months service. How could you expect your recruiting service to succeed when you produced such a competition? Let it be observed, too, that if a militia army of fifty thousand men is raised by a bounty of $300 to each man, then fifteen millions of dollars are paid in bounties for six months service; when you would get a regular army of the same number at $100 each, or five millions for five years service; and these five millions will be paid from the Treasury, and raised by an equal tax on the United States, while the fifteen millions given for six months service of militia substitutes will have been paid by particular individuals in particular districts.

I proceed to show that the regular troops of the American Army deserve the confidence of the American people, for the purpose of carrying on war. I have noticed their conduct in the war of the Revolution, at Camden and at Guilford; but it is to the battles of the late war that I will refer, to show that the same men, who in the militia are, as General Washington has observed, "timid, and ready to fly from their own shadows," become in the regular service the best soldiers in the world. In the paper which I received from General Brown, from which I have already read an extract, he states, the American Army at Chippewa, on the 5th July, 1814, was composed of 2,500 regulars, of whom 1,200 were in the action, and of 500 irregulars, who were in the action; he states General Rial's command on the same day as composed of regular 3,350, of whom 1,800 were in action, and of 300 irregulars, who were in the action; thus it appears that 1,700 Americans defeated 2,100 British troops, and of the Americans only 1,200 were regulars. We know that the battle was won by them.* He states the American Army at Bridgewater as composed of 2,850 regulars and 350 volunteers, and that of General Drummond as composed of 3,950 regulars, and 1,000 Indians and militia; thus it appears that 3,200 American troops did defeat 4,950 British troops. He states the American Army at Fort Erie, on the 25th August, at 2,500, and that of General Drummond, all regulars, at 3,550; thus it appears that 2,500 American troops did repulse and defeat 3,550 British troops. He states the American Army, on the 17th September, as composed of 1,300 regular troops, and 1,000 volunteers, and that of General Drummond as composed of 4,157; thus it appears that 2,300 American troops defeated nearly double their number of the enemy.

Courage is confidence. The very same man who in the militia has no courage, and flies at the first shot, because he has no confidence in himself, his comrades, or his officers, becomes a hero in the regular service, because discipline inspires him with confidence in himself, in his companions, and in those by whom he is commanded. Discipline is the principle of victories. Without it you cannot have an armed force on which the nation can rely. You cannot have a militia effective for the purposes of war, without subjecting them to discipline and subordination; and this you cannot do without taking up too much of the time, and taking away too much of the liberties of the people.

This is an old question, whether veterans or undisciplined men are to be preferred for making war? History answers this question uniformly in favor of veterans, from the time of the first wars on record to the present day. We should make war with regular troops; and, with a view to be prepared to raise immediately a considerable army, I would keep in time of peace a regular force to occupy our military posts, and I would provide an immense quantity of the materials for war. I would have in service a number of supernumerary company officers, with a view to increase the Army, when necessary, with facility. I should not have been willing to discharge a single soldier of the present establishment, had not the Secretary of War reported a plan for reduction, in which he seems to acquiesce in the expediency of discharging a part of the soldiers now in service. With regard to the general officers and the staff, I apprehend there may be a partial reduction without injury to the service.

The great object of a militia is to have an armed people, ready to repel every invasion of their liberties. The militia belong essentially to the States. It could not have been the intention of those who formed the Constitution that Congress should make war with the militia, or they would have given to the General Government power to appoint the officers, and to train the militia; which powers are retained by the States, who thus retain the control of the militia. The States may authorize an annual election of militia officers; and how can you confide in a force which is placed essentially beyond your control?

Sir, it is with the most powerful nations of the world that we are most likely to have collisions. We should avail ourselves of the advantages resulting from fortifications and from military skill, as our physical force is inferior to that of the nations who may become our enemies. We cannot be in too much haste to finish our fortifications. It would be better to pay interest on the sum they will cost than to leave our maritime frontier unprotected. If you would maintain your authority in your seaports, you must have cannon and soldiers there. We should secure peace by presenting an iron front to our foes. When we have expended more than one hundred millions of money, and fifty thousand lives, to maintain our rights by war, shall we refuse to expend a few millions annually to preserve those rights in peace?

Before you destroy the Army, you ought to pass an efficient militia law. A bill was drawn and reported, four years ago, which would have given you a militia system much more efficient than you have at present. It proposed to call out the officers for the war, and the privates for two years. Such an army might have acquired discipline, and become respectable; but you did not pass the bill. Will you now enact such a law? I apprehend you will not. And, surely, before you destroy one system of defence you should provide another.

Sir, I would not break down any of the necessary institutions of the Government. It is not necessary to do so. It is singular that the Government should be charged in this House with prodigality and oppression, when no taxes whatever are imposed on the people; and the only complaint made by them is, that the duties imposed are not high enough.

The subsistence of the militia; the Quartermaster's supplies; the transportation, ordnance stores, and all other expenses incident to their service, form no part of the estimate.

(b) Memorandum by General Jesup, Quartermaster General.

In time of peace, when the Army is mostly stationary, and its expenditures rigidly economised, the proportion its pay bears to its other expenses of every description, is estimated as sixty-five is to one hundred and ninety-five, or as one to three. But in time of war, with the same rigid economy, its expenses, from the multiplied movements, and unavoidable waste and expenditures may, without erring much, be estimated as one is to five, so is the pay to the other expenses. This ratio is applicable to the expenses of the regular Army, and, though the militia expenses would not embrace the item of clothing which is included in estimating the ratio above, yet it is believed, from their superior skill in waste and destruction of arms and property generally, that their pay would stand to their other expenses as one is to six. Hence, when the pay amounts to $12,600,000, their other expenses would be $75,600,000.

SATURDAY, January 6.

DEATH OF MR. LINN.

Mr. SOUTHARD announced the death of JOHN LINN, one of the members of this House, from the State of New Jersey. Whereupon,

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of John Linn, deceased, late a representative from the State of New Jersey.

MESSRS. SOUTHARD, BATEMAN, BLOOMFIELD, KINSEY, SMITH, of New Jersey, CULPEPER, and MARCHAND, were appointed the said committee.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of John Linn, late one of their body, by wearing crape on the left arm for one month.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of the late John Linn this day at three o'clock.

Resolved, unanimously, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify them of the death of John Linn, late a member of this House, and that his funeral will take place this day at three o'clock, from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 8.

A new member, to wit, from the State of Pennsylvania, DANIEL UDREE, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Joseph Hiester, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee upon the subject of the Militia, reported a bill to provide an uniform system of organization for the militia of the different States and Territories; and for instructing the officers of the same at the expense of the United States; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROSS, of New York, submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House (if, in his opinion, proper) whether any, and, if any, what, regulations, since the first of January, 1816, have been had with the Six Nations of Indians, or any portion of them; who the commissioners or agents were; the objects of the negotiations; the expenses of the same; the compensation of each commissioner, secretary, and agent, and to whom the moneys were paid.

On motion of Mr. STRONG, of New York,

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into, and report to this House, the number of lotteries which have been instituted in said District, by virtue of an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose, passed the 15th of May, 1820; the purposes for which the moneys are to be raised; the amount of each scheme, and the total nominal value of the tickets offered for sale; the rate of deduction proposed to be made from the prizes, and the gross amount of the proceeds of said lotteries, which will come into the hands of the managers; and, also, whether the condition of the said act of incorporation has been complied with, so far as it respects the authority to raise money by lotteries.

Mr. TRIMBLE submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inform this House when, and why, the agency of the Treasurer of the United States for the War and Navy Departments was first established, and whether the same may not be discontinued without detriment to the public service.

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Purdy," was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolutions moved by Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, calling for information of the amount of money necessary to complete the contracts which have been made for the increase of the navy and for building fortifications, were taken up and agreed to.

REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES.

Mr. COBB having moved again to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

A short debate arose which resulted in a motion by Mr. BEECHER to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the resolutions introduced by Mr. COBB.

In this debate MESSRS. ANDERSON, ARCHER, COBB, LOWNDES, SIMKINS, BEECHER, HARDING, FLOYD, SERGEANT, and BALDWIN, took part.

The question discussed was, simply, whether the subject of a general reduction of the expenses of the Government, with reference to expediency and to the state of the finances, could be more practically and efficiently considered by continuing to debate the declaratory propositions of Mr. COBB, or the bills which have been, and probably will hereafter be, introduced, for the reduction of the expenditures of various branches of the public service.

The debate terminated in agreeing to Mr. BEECHER's motion, by a vote of 82 to 49; and the resolutions, being then before the House, were ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Purdy;" and they have also passed a bill of this House entitled "An act for the relief of Perley Keys and Jason Fairbanks," with an amendment; in which bill and amendment they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said amendment was read, and concurred in by the House.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House, then, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union. And,

On motion of Mr. BEECHER, the Committee proceeded to consider the bill reported by the Military Committee, for reducing the Military Peace Establishment. The first section having been read—

Mr. SIMKINS rose, and spoke substantially as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the same arguments apply to this particular bill which have been used on the general retrenching resolutions offered by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB;) for, however diverse the resolutions may have been in their nature, every one must have seen that the army was mainly in view, and has occupied, principally, the attention of every member who has spoken upon them.

Mr. Chairman, when the present Chief Magistrate came into the administration of the Executive Department of the Union, it was shortly after the late war, in which he acted a most firm, conspicuous, and useful part; and when himself, with the whole nation, had a strong and full view of the commencement, dangers, and events, of that war. It was seen by the President and all enlightened men, (and the impression was too strong to be disregarded,) that the few fortifications for the defence of our whole coast which were then erected were either half finished, in a state of dilapidation, or nearly deserted; that the army had no efficient staff, or arrangement given to it by Congress, and could have, of course, but little organization or efficiency; and, to complete the picture, Congress had failed to pass laws for the "common defence" of the country, so as to make the militia what they always ought to be, more particularly in the absence of an efficient standing army. On the contrary, the state of this main body of defence was, in general, deranged, disorganized, and relaxed.

The war commenced; and, during its two first years, such events did take place as was to be expected from the defenceless state of the country—events, many of which were mortifying and disgraceful beyond measure to every man who had a heart to feel for his country! Your treasure speedily exhausted, your Union interrupted, your moral character and energy fast wasting away, and your country bleeding at every pore!

I have had occasion heretofore to bring those scenes to the view of Congress on this same subject. From the strong current which now seems to be running through this House against the army, there never was such need to present the picture, in strong and vivid colors, as at this time.

In a state of glorious and perfect peace, and with a knowledge of the past, what was the imperious duty of the Chief Magistrate and of the Congress? Can any man who has sagacity to see, or a heart to love his country, doubt about what ought to have been the policy which should have been adopted? The President did distinctly see the necessity of protecting the great outlets on your whole coasts, by fortifications, which should be as lasting as your hills—of an army, which, from its staff, organization, and number, should man your forts and protect your immense frontiers during peace—should defend you efficiently during the first onsets of war, and be the means of infusing discipline and power into much larger bodies of regulars or militia, which would be promptly added. This sound and practical course, so wise in itself, and so loudly and universally called for by the whole nation, has been most happily begun, and has progressed with a pace so steady and energetic that at this time not a single doubt remains of its completion, if persisted in, or of its inestimable importance when completed. The great and exposed points of your coast have been surveyed with the accuracy and skill of engineers inferior perhaps to none in the world, and fortifications already erected thereon, or in a state of rapid advancement. Your army, too, has received an organization in its arrangement, an economy in its management, and an efficiency in its effect, approaching to that perfection which alone the highest energies of the human mind can expect to give it.

But, has this policy, of putting the country in “an armor and an attitude of defence,” for the purposes of war, and the greater purposes of preserving peace, been sanctioned by the people? I answer, emphatically, yes, from one end of the continent to the other. We have not heard even a whisper against it. On the contrary, the highest recommendations of the course, and, what may fairly be considered as conclusive of the question is, the almost unanimous re-election, at this very time, of that Chief Magistrate who has lent the whole force of his distinguished talents and high moral character to the constant progress and completion of this policy. Yet there is, some how or other, a spirit in this body, (and in this body alone, it appears to me to exist,) which, in its loud cry for economy and retrenchment, says, stop your fortifications, diminish the progress of your navy, lessen all your salaries, dismiss your staff, and cut down (or destroy, for destruction will be the consequence of such a measure,) your little army to the command of a single Brigadier General; and these gentlemen bottom themselves upon what they represent an exhausted state of our Treasury and resources. This is an attack upon the whole course and spirit of the present Administration; upon the most clear policy of the country, as sanctioned by the people; and so well aware was the President, at the opening of the present session, that the state of the Treasury might be the ground-work of delaying or pulling down our defensive institutions, that he gave a general, but a candid and fair view of our fiscal concerns, which were by no means in a situation as discouraging as had been supposed.

I acknowledge that a report of the Treasury Department, subsequently made, represents us for 1821, as $7,000,000 worse than nothing; but a mistake or over estimate, of the same Department, has already been acknowledged to the amount of $2,700,000, and when the resolutions submitted by my honorable friend and colleague from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) calling for an account of the balances in the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1821, are answered, we shall see another error or over estimate (if I am not greatly mistaken) of from one and a half to $2,500,000, so that the deficiency to be borrowed for 1821, instead of being $7,000,000, will be little more than $2,000,000; and if the Louisiana stock, to the amount of $2,000,000, shall not be paid this year, the deficiency will not be, perhaps, more than six or $800,000! For the three next years, it is admitted, on all hands, that our deficiency will be very little, if any, taking the estimates as they are now made, and our disbursements as they now stand.

Sir, it is well known that the exhausted state of the Treasury, and a cry about improper disbursements and great extravagance, are fruitful themes of declamation for those who wish to render themselves acceptable, by efforts to save the people's money. The cry of extravagance, retrenchment, and economy, is easily raised, for words cost nothing; but show me the real practical economist; the man who, in the departments of your Government, really saves your money, at the same time that he advances your best interests, and I will pronounce him a person worthy of the highest confidence. I wish not to see him who talks a great deal, but him who acts, and can show you the fruits of his acting.

We have been repeatedly called back to the pure economical times of Mr. Jefferson's administration. Let us for a moment examine it, and candor will constrain us to confess that this Administration, so far as it regarded the army and some other defensive measures, was founded on a reaction of what were conceived to be the high-handed measures of Mr. Adams's administration, and went too far on the other side, and leaving the army too small, disorganized, and inefficient. This was the greatest error into which the then President fell; and this is the precise error into which all your proposed measures of retrenchment directly lead.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

Sir, I suppose no one claims an entire exemption from error. Of Mr. Jefferson's administration it is a fact that some acts have since been found by experience, and so acknowledged by the people, to have been impolitic. I refer to the Army and Navy.*

The number of men retained on the peace establishment by Mr. Jefferson, at the beginning of his administration, was 3,300. Now, small as this number was, it was certainly but little smaller at that period of our history than our ten thousand is at this time; considering the acquisition of Louisiana, and the consequent immense extension of our frontier, the necessary increase of our military posts from twenty-seven to about eighty, the vast augmentation of our fortifications to be manned, the rapid increase of our resources, and the almost doubled number of our population. But, sir, Mr. Jefferson gave us the best commentary on his own administration, in this respect, that we could possibly have wished for.

The army was increased in the year 1808, by Mr. Jefferson himself, to ten thousand men, precisely our present number, and the main reason why it remained comparatively weak and inefficient, till the beginning of the war, was because there never was any thing like a proper staff to arrange, discipline, and organize it. It had nearly sunk by its own weight, for the want of such a staff and such officers as your present bill, at one sweep, strikes from your army. The cardinal error then committed, we are now, in the short space of a few years, about to slide into. The very pit then dug for us, utterly regardless of the past, we are now with a blind fatality about to plunge into! It may be said that the army was then increased because there was a prospect of war. Sir, a wise nation will always adopt the obvious policy of preparing for war in time of peace; not merely to meet its dangers, but to preserve peace.

Mr. Chairman, it has been with utter astonishment that I have seen how clearly the horrors of the late war have been erased from the minds of gentlemen. The present retrenching course of policy, vindicated so strongly by the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSKIS,) the other day, would seem to indicate, that he and others, were out of existence at that time! Was not our treasure then given to the winds—squandered on idle, afflicting, and unavailing efforts? Was it not a murderous waste of the blood of our fellow citizens, our families, our brothers? Have gentlemen calculated how many millions might have been saved by judicious fortifications, an efficient army, and passable roads? I sincerely believe, enough to maintain our little army a quarter of a century. Do gentlemen pretend to calculate the responsibility, the awful responsibility, they should feel for lives lost, by reason of this want of preparation! I tremble for the country when I see gentlemen ready to plunge us into the same dread abyss! We may calculate the loss of dollars and cents, but who can calculate, by what criterion can you calculate the value of union, the waste of our moral character and energies, and the sacrifice of our best blood?

* Justice requires me to state, that I was not a cold, but an ardent admirer of Mr. Jefferson's general course. I approved of that great act, the acquisition of Louisiana, and the spirit of economy and philanthropy of that great and distinguished lover of mankind; his pure love of country, and opposition to all foreign influence among us. I still am of the same opinion. I will, however, not be driven from an independent course, by mere names, to which gentlemen choose to attach odium. I will not fail to confess an error, if I believe it such, although it spring from Mr. Jefferson; nor would I scout a wise measure merely because it sprung from Mr. Adams. I say thus much, because I have been misunderstood on this point.

It has been said, that the people demand retrenchment, and a reduction of the army. Sir, the people always demand economy and retrenchment, whenever and wheresoever their money shall be wasted or misapplied. Fidelity and accountability in the application of your funds, are indissolubly connected with the prosperity of your country, and the duration of your liberties. In this view, the vigilance of members cannot be too great; but I expressly deny that the people have demanded or even resolved upon the reduction of the army. There is not the slightest evidence to prove the truth of such an assertion. When the people require of this body a law to be passed, they instantly express their desire. Have you, then, seen a single petition for the reduction, although the attempt has been made here for two or three succeeding sessions, without success? On the contrary, (and it is fair to collect the public opinion in this way, in the absence of other evidence,) have you not seen by almost every newspaper, from all parts of the continent, and of all political parties, that the reduction of the army is disapproved, as rash and dangerous.

It is said, however, that the militia are our main defence; and that he who is an enemy to the militia is an enemy to his country. To what, sir, could such an observation refer? Who, in this land of freedom, can be an enemy to the militia? Can there be a man in the nation so base as not to wish to give it organization, discipline, and energy? An enemy to the militia! If any man is so, then he is an enemy to his father, his brothers, his sons, for they compose the militia.

Is it not strange that members should continually contend for the militia as our great defence, when they have always failed to pass laws to promote their discipline and strength? Is not this the more strange, when we know that in most of our States they are weak, deranged, and inefficient from this very cause? It is made the duty of Congress, by the charter which we have all sworn to support, to provide for the "common defence" of the country; we fail to pass laws to make the militia this common defence, and yet we diminish, impair, and destroy all other modes of defence.

It is admitted, from the very nature of things, that, in the progress of a war, men drawn from the great body of the people, must furnish the main defence of the country. This must be so, because I admit it to be inconsistent with the nature of our institutions, to maintain large standing armies. But is it not clear, and was it not proved by the chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia,) that, to be powerful and efficient, the militia must be trained and disciplined? All history, from the earliest ages down, all experience, the experience of both our own wars, and even common sense itself, prove that men without discipline can never successfully resist a well trained army. This gentleman (Mr. S.) proved, with the utmost precision and clearness, that the militia were more inefficient, more expensive, and the calling them out, (which was but another name for conscription, for they go against their will,) more unjust, partial, and oppressive, than regulars, who enlist of their own accord. I will not do him the injustice to occupy ground which he occupied before me, with so much greater ability; but I make the appeal to every man's sense, whether, when your divines, your lawyers, and even your tradesmen, require some years of education and practice to fit them for their duties, your officers and soldiers, who have the tenfold arduous duty of defending their country, at the risk of their lives, could be expected to do so successfully, without a week's, or a month's, or a year's education and discipline? In the ruder ages, when science was unknown, all who met in war might be upon something like equality; but in the present improved state of military science, which can, in its higher grades, not be acquired without years of study and discipline, he would justly be esteemed a madman who would lead raw militia in an open field, against a disciplined army! What wise country would rest its fate on such an issue? Turn your attention to Europe, and behold, for many of the first years of Bonaparte's wars, how even regular armies, opposed to him, were cut up, vanquished, and destroyed, by superior military skill? They never could compete with him, till, in a succession of years, he himself taught them the higher arts of war.

H. OF R.

The gentleman from Massachusetts points to Baltimore and New Orleans, as places at which the great strength of the militia was evinced. Did not the gentleman remember Castine, Washington City, and other places, where their failure stained their country with a disgrace which must long remain matter of the deepest mortification to every American? At New Orleans, they were, in part, regulars, and trained militia, (which is the same thing,) besides, General Jackson was judicious enough to throw up ramparts to protect his men. The same reasons, in part, insured the victory of Baltimore; and yet no man can doubt but there were hundreds of as brave, noble spirited men at the capture of this place, as were at New Orleans or Baltimore; but, being raw and undisciplined, they partook of a panic, which, becoming general, dispersed rapidly the whole force.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that I disliked a great noise about economy. The practice of rigid economy is a course which would give us greater pleasure than talking about it. Will the members of this Committee have the goodness to look at the official report of the Secretary of War, and they will find that in 1818, the army proper, cost the nation $3,748,445, and consisted of 7,916 officers and men.

In 1819, $3,351,363; and consisted of 8,941 men.

In 1820, $2,616,516; and consisted of 10,281 officers and privates.

And in 1821, but $2,590,136 as asked for its support, and it contains —, a larger proportion than has filled the ranks, perhaps, since the war.

From this statement it appears that, by the introduction of the Commissariat Department, and a most rigid system of economy, there is saved to the country, in three years, upwards of $1,158,308 in the army, properly so called.

This system of economy, and rapid diminution of expenses, with a staff, too, much larger than formerly, and by which the War Department has been loudly accused of wasting the public money, might be traced, in detail, into various branches or departments of the army; but I have only time to turn your attention to the medical department, as a fair sample of the rest.

The appropriation for that department, for three years in succession, viz: for 1809, 1810, and 1811, $145,600 total, when at that time the average of the army was only 5,581 men.

In 1819, 1820, and 1821, the whole appropriation will be $132,500, when the aggregate of the army is about 10,037.

By this statement it will be seen, that, although you have added considerably to the number of the medical officers, yet that department does not cost half the money it once did.

When then it is considered, (for the facts cannot be too often or too strongly presented,) what an immense sum in money, and how many lives, might be saved by a disciplined army and a well regulated staff, at the beginning of a war; and when to these you add the immense saving exhibited above, in the annual disbursements, and that your regular soldiery, besides their daily discipline, are constantly engaged in erecting fortifications, or in embellishing and improving your whole frontier, by making roads, or are engaged in the cultivation of the earth near your military posts, thereby saving something for their families and themselves from that ruinous idleness and dissipation which almost constantly attend camps—I say, when these incontrovertible facts are considered, we, who oppose the present bill, must be viewed, in the eyes of all mankind, as the true economists. We are not the "penny wise and pound foolish." We are not among those embracing the niggardly policy which would refuse to disburse one million to day, to save ten, twenty, or fifty millions to-morrow. The people, I again repeat, wish not the reduction of your army. Experience enables us to decide that they will ever bear taxes to support what is of importance to their interests; for, in the late war, when it dragged on so heavily for the want of funds, the people of the South, I well know, anticipated Congress in a system of taxation. They were anxious to pay their money freely, as the means of rendering the war vigorous and decisive.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. E.,) has said, it would be the highest injustice to suppose that those officers who have covered themselves with such imperishable glory, would wish to continue in service a single hour after their services ceased to be required. Sir, their services are required. Their talents, their experience, their moral energies, and military skill, are required, to preserve and give reputation and life to your army. They are conscious that their country—the great body of the people, do require their services, or it is certain they would not remain in commission.

The same gentleman also said that, should the time ever arrive when the influence of military chiefs should find its way into the House, so far as to command a single vote, then it might command many more, and the law should be levelled against it.

Sir, I have never heard of such an influence, and I am glad the gentleman does not declare it now to exist, because not a shadow of evidence could be produced to support such an assertion. The gentleman could not, and did not, intend to insinuate it. The unassuming conduct of the officers of the army generally vindicate them against any interference in this House, or in any other legislative body.

There is, on the contrary, such a jealousy of the army, (an unfounded jealousy,) as to keep many of the officers at a greater distance, perhaps, than citizens, alike interested in all matters of legislation, should keep. There is the same prejudice against the army that exists in Europe against standing armies, without the shadow of foundation for it. There the slavery entailed on the people by the dreadful curse of large standing armies, and the intolerable burden of taxes to support them, create a natural and a well founded prejudice. Here our army is so small, scattered over such an immense expanse of territory, stationed at so many different posts, and so identified with the great body of our citizens, that the idea is chimerical and ridiculous in the last degree. It is matter of astonishment that so many, even in this enlightened body, should seem ready to give it currency.

Gentlemen speak of waste, extravagance, and idleness. Let them point it out—let them name the officer, and show the extravagance. It is their solemn duty to do so, if they can. If they do not, what will the world say? If they do, let your law strike at the root of the evil, and I will join in it.

If I understood the gentleman (Mr. EUSTIS) correctly, he did say, that fortifications had been reared at particular points to gratify a particular man or set of men. [Here Mr. EUSTIS rose, and said, he had been misunderstood; that he had only said that fortifications had been made at exposed points, where they could not be defended.]

Mr. S. expressed his pleasure that the gentleman disavowed saying what he had understood him to say. The fortifications have been placed (continued Mr. S.) at those points only which were directed by a survey, made with great labor, by engineers, one of whom was a foreigner, but perhaps as able in his department as any man in the world. The others were able men, all of whom agreed, and have deposited a report and survey of our coast in the proper department, which I am told would do honor to any men, in any age.

But, says the gentleman, our coast cannot be fortified. From its great extent, it is impracticable. I admit that you cannot fortify every little inlet making into every village; but we can fortify, and pretty effectually fortify, certain great and exposed points, which are the vital arteries leading into the great body of our country. I mean at Boston, New York, the Chesapeake, which leads into all the principal towns of the Middle States, Charleston, Mobile, and New Orleans.

It is triumphantly declared, let us get rid of General A. or General B. if not wanted. Sir, your generals are not made in a day. Their talents and renown give strength and reputation to your army. It will be easy to cut off, or in the language of the bill to "dismiss" from the service Jackson, Brown, Scott, Gaines, and others, but with them you greatly prostrate the strength of your little army. Do you, can you hope, that they will serve in the inferior offices you now create, and on the petty theatre you now prescribe?

No, sir, they will not. Can you supply their places? Let the American people answer. It is a light, and it would almost seem a triumphant task to dismiss them now; but remember you thereby destroy the efficiency of your Peace Establishment. A brigadier general's command for such a number of posts, such a population, and such a continent as this, appears to me a burlesque on warlike preparation.

The very names of those generals, whose services it seems now to be so proper to dispense with, would give a union, a firmness, and a moral power to your army in the hour of trial, which would be beyond calculation. Their talents and experience on some great emergency would be worth millions.

And are we sure that this day of trial, this hour of emergency, is never to arrive, or to arrive at some distant day when we may be ready for it? Deceive not yourselves.

Look at the unsettled state of France; the revolution not over, perhaps, in Spain; Germany ready for a change of Government; the great autocrat of Europe, the Emperor of all the Russias, having his eye on the dominions of the Ottoman Porte, and extending onward still further to the vast possessions of the British in the East Indies; revolution in Naples, other revolutions going on in South America; and the agitated state even of England; I say look at all these, and see also our commerce and connexions, ramified and extended into every sea, and with every nation, and who can be hardly enough to pronounce that this commerce will not be cut up, and these pacific connexions not be disturbed! Who is bold enough to say how early or how late it may be, before we may be driven to protect our rights, and to defend our soil? Has the nature of our free institutions ceased to make this Government and these people objects of jealousy and hate to the Holy Alliance; to all the crowned heads of Europe? Sir, the hour of peril will come, and when that shall arrive, overwhelming as the current for retrenchment and cutting down may now be in this House, then will every man here agree with me in wishing that they had sought the preservation of our little army, navy, fortifications, and other defensive institutions, and had given them their greatest practicable strength and efficiency.

At this period of profound peace, and when gentlemen suppose that war will never come, we do disagree most pointedly. The first cannon that shall be fired by an enemy, will be the signal for universal regret, that we had not preserved a more imposing attitude. At such a period as that, and even now I would not give the consolation I shall feel for the vote I am to give against this bill, small as may be the minority in which I may stand, for any other consolation I could derive from my public life. Prostrate, or even weaken your army and navy, and you invite aggression; your enemies will pour upon you with the ferocity of lions, and the strength of Hercules.

Sir, I reiterate again and again, that I am for the practice of true economy, and for making every officer accountable even to the last cent; but I deprecate the present wavering policy of cutting down army, navy, and diminishing almost every salary. I deprecate the policy of unsettling every thing; of rendering all those institutions, which should be held most permanent and sacred, cheap, inefficient and worthless, by the rash and versatile course of this body, to which the people look for wisdom and protection. The very foundation on which the pillars of our Federal fabric is raised is "the common defence and general welfare." Shall we subvert the spirit of the Government by our present course?

Shall we make our officers, of all kinds, poor and dependant? Our own body is changeable enough already; but shall we render it still more so, by a reduction of pay? Shall we send members of Congress here to seek Executive offices and patronage, rather than pursue a wise independent course, calculated to benefit the country?

Mr. Chairman, I have already proved, by a few general suggestions, that there is no such necessity for all this, as was supposed to exist. The situation of the Treasury, which gives the greatest spring to a cry for retrenchment, is not so startling, not so alarming, as was at first represented by the head of that department. Moderation, wisdom, and consistency, cry, forbear. Let us not, by our acts, hastily and rashly attack and prostrate the whole policy of former Congresses and of the present Chief Magistrate, which has been to place every part of this rising nation in such an attitude of defence, as is required, not only by the Constitution, but by the loud and solemn warnings of fatal experience. If we break into these institutions of defence, we do vitally assail that wise policy upon which the future fame of the present Executive must rest.

When Mr. S. had concluded—

Mr. WILLIAMS said that he concurred with the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SIMKINS,) who had just taken his seat, in one sentiment, which was, that the bill now under consideration depends for its support on the exhausted condition of the Treasury. But, although this was at any time a very sufficient reason, he would yet remind the gentleman from South Carolina, that it was not with him (Mr. W.) the only reason. He had other, and he might add still higher motives for supporting the bill, as had been evinced by his conduct on many previous occasions. When there was no deficiency in the Treasury; when there was in fact a surplus of some millions he had been in favor of reducing the Army on account of the essential propriety, or natural adaptation of such a measure to the principle of our Government. Passing, however, for the present this part of the subject, he would subscribe fully to the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERTS,) that we cannot go on with our establishments as they now exist. To the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. W. said, he would seize that opportunity of offering the tribute of his sincere thanks for the very instructive, impressive, and eloquent speech which he delivered the other day on the subject of retrenchment and economy. That gentleman's age indicated the wisdom and the history of his past life, the experience with which he could claim to speak and to be heard in this House; and on no occasion, said Mr. W., was he ever more gratified than he was when attending to the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts; with him, Mr. W. thought the time had arrived when we must resume the practice of economy; when we must return to that path of frugality and prudence from which we had most unwisely departed, or persist in a career of extravagance, profusion, and prodigality, as hostile to the nature of our political institutions, as it is repugnant to the individual prosperity and happiness of our fellow-citizens.

Mr. W. said, if he could hesitate between these alternatives he should deem himself unfit to occupy a seat on this floor. Not that he would condemn any gentleman who entertains a different opinion. "Tot capitum, totidem millia studiorum," is a maxim, the truth of which is every day displayed in the proceedings of this House. I know well that gentlemen will honestly differ in opinion, not only on this subject, but on every other which may be agitated. But it appears to me that this difference would not be so great, so glaring, so irreconcilable, if we all built our systems of reasoning on a proper basis; if we all started from the same point. Some reason from the Government to the people; while others reason from the people to the Government: some appear to think that the good, or, in other words, that the power and amplitude of the Government should alone be consulted, regardless of the effects which any particular measure might have on the people; but others assert that we should, in the first place, look to the circumstances and condition of the people; that their ease, comfort, and happiness, should be the scope, the end, the object of all our laws. It is thus we are made to arrive at different conclusions. For his own part, Mr. W. said, he would look to the people as the proper basis for all our acts; he would examine the consequences, immediate and remote, likely to result to them from the adoption of every measure which might be proposed. Those who start from any other premises must, in my judgment, always arrive at false conclusions. For, sir, who are the people of this country? The very Constitution tells you that they are supreme; that they are the sovereign authority; that all power emanates from them. The President, in his message to Congress at the commencement of the present session, observed, "that this Government is founded by, administered for, and supported by the people." Whatever, then, promotes the happiness of the people must conduce, in an equal degree, to benefit the Government, since it was to promote that happiness that the Government was founded. On the other hand, whatever injures, afflicts, or distresses the people, must, in the same degree, injure, afflict, or distress the Government, since it was to prevent that injury, affliction, and distress, that the Government was formed. And here, Mr. Chairman, suffer me to correct a very erroneous idea, frequently propagated abroad, and which, much to my surprise, has been reiterated within these walls by the member from South Carolina, (Mr. SIMKINS.)

Reduction of the Army.

When an attempt is made to retrench expenditures, we hear loud cries raised against those who think proper to advocate the measure. It is said that we who favor retrenchment "are opposing Government," &c. Now, sir, this idea is full of error; it is false. I do not mean by this to charge the gentleman from South Carolina with falsehood; but I mean to say, and I will say, that he does not rightly judge our motives. No doubt, sir, the gentleman has more intimate acquaintance with some portion of Executive views than I have. But, if this attempt to economise in our expenditures, and to relieve the burdens of the community, should be regarded as an attack on the Executive Government, or any of its branches, I for one will say, that I cannot help it; that it is my duty to pursue what appears to me most conducive to the public good, without reference to any such extraneous considerations.

Suppose, for example, half of the present Army would answer every purpose which this nation could desire. I ask, if an attempt to reduce it would be acting against the people, or, if you please, against the Government? Not at all; but, on the contrary, it would be promoting the just ends of Government to reduce the Army, because, by that reduction, our expenditures would be lessened, and the happiness of the people would be proportionably advanced. There are, indeed, a set of officers, of sinecure placemen, of political grasshoppers, warmed and animated into existence by the sunshine of the Treasury; sustained and supported, not by General Atkinson's turnip patches at Council Bluffs, but by the streams of nourishment which flow from the Treasury, who will, when any attempt is made to reduce expenditures, cry out—"The Government is in danger; the necessary establishments of the country are about to be broken in upon," &c. But, sir, all this is nothing more than false alarm. It is true, you may take from such persons the salaries they do not earn, and which consequently they do not deserve; but you leave in the pockets of the people the money which is thus saved. And I ask again, whether the interest of the people, or of Government, does not require that officers that do nothing, or next to nothing, should be disbanded? I should think it does. But yet these characters swell into factitious importance, and exclaim, when you are about to disband them, that "you are opposing Government." They seem to think that they are the Government; that their individual benefit should alone be considered. But, sir, I think the people at large are the Government, and that their good ought to be promoted, without reference to any particular persons whatsoever.

There are, said Mr. W., two courses of policy: one is a course of economy; the other a course of extravagance. The first employs few officers; gives moderate but sufficient salaries, and conducts the whole machinery of Government with the least possible expense. The effect of this is, that every man in the community is either taxed very lightly, or not at all. He has of course all the benefits and the richest blessings the social state can afford. He has protection to his person and property; he has an abundance of materials for food and raiment, and is never subjected to the severities of cold and hunger. On the other hand, an extravagant course of policy leads to very different results. There many useless officers, with exorbitant salaries, are employed, and the machinery of Government cannot be carried on without large disbursements of public money. The consequence is, that the expenditures surpass the receipts, and the people must be heavily taxed. Of course every man in the community finds himself distressed for money. His means of subsistence become scanty; he is compelled, perhaps, to lie down supperless at night, and to rise in the morning with no better hopes for the ensuing day. Such, sir, are the two courses of policy which this Government may pursue, and which, at different times, it has pursued. Under Mr. Jefferson's Administration economy was the order of the day; but, under another Administration, great extravagance obtained.

The gentleman from South Carolina had said that the American people had renounced their preference for economy, as pursued in 1802, and had now attached themselves to the policy pursued by Mr. Adams. Mr. W. said he would beg leave to differ from the gentleman, and would willingly submit to the decision of the people the point at issue between himself and the member from South Carolina. He was confident the people would decide that, under Mr. Jefferson's Administration, they were as free as air; that little or nothing of the profits of their labor was taken from them by taxation; that the hand of Government was not felt to be upon them, only in the protection it afforded them; that swarms of revenue officers, of domiciliary visitors, of merciless tax gatherers, were banished from their presence; that every man had wherewith to be clothed and fed, and wherewith to be happy. This was exactly that administration of the Government which the people want; it was such an administration as every one must wish to see in a Government founded by, administered for, and supported by, the people. To what other Administration, let me ask the member from South Carolina, can or ought the people to be attached?

If, by the course of policy pursued, you conflict with the interest of the citizen, or mar his happiness, is it not unreasonable to suppose he will be attached to that policy? How can any one of common sense admire the policy which tends to strip his body or starve his stomach? As "this Government is founded by, administered for, and supported by, the people," it will be most strong when the people are most attached to it; and the people will be most attached to it when least oppressed by it; in other words, when they are required to contribute, by taxation, as little as possible of their hard earnings to support Government.

We hear much about national glory. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has dwelt eloquently on this topic. No one has a greater right than he has to speak on such subjects, because he has participated largely in those scenes which have tended to illustrate and dignify the name of his country. Although I bow with deference to whatever that gentleman may be pleased to say, yet, on this occasion, I must differ from him, not because I admire national glory less, but because I love national happiness more. Of what avail is it to talk about the splendid victories of a Decatur, if, in order to obtain those victories, the people had been obliged, by taxation, to give up so much of their own property as would compel them to go superfluous to bed? Indeed, sir, they would be in an ill condition to relish those victories with an empty stomach. But feed them, clothe them, make them, in these respects, contented and happy, which Government can do by the means it employs, or the measures it adopts, and then, with all imaginable zest, they can enter into and realize those fine elevated feelings, inspired by a recollection of our great achievements by sea and land. We have also been referred, said Mr. W., to the glory of other countries, particularly to that of England. No example could be held up to his view which he would imitate with greater caution than that of England. She had paid too dearly for her glory, for her distinction among the nations of the world. To prove this, it would be necessary to advert only to what her people themselves had said; and he would now do so, by asking the attention of the House while he read an extract from the Review of Seybert's Statistical Annals of the United States. The extract is as follows:

"We can inform Jonathan what are the inevitable consequences of being too fond of glory. Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot—taxes upon every thing which it is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste—taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion—taxes on every thing on earth, and the waters under the earth—on every thing that comes from abroad, or is grown at home—taxes on the raw material—taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man—taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite, and the drug that restores him to health—on the ermine which decorates the judge, and the rope which hangs the criminal—on the poor man's salt, and the rich man's spice—on the brass nails of the coffin, and the ribands of the bride—at bed or board, couchant or levant, we must pay. The school-boy whips his taxed top—the beardless youth manages his taxed horse with a taxed bridle, on a taxed road; and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine, which has paid 7 per cent., into a spoon which has paid 15 per cent., flings himself back upon his chintz bed which has paid 22 per cent.—making his will on an eight-pound stamp, and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a license of a hundred pounds for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from 2 to 10 per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble; and he is then gathered to his fathers, to be taxed no more. In addition to all this, the habit of dealing with large sums will make the Government avaricious and profuse; and the system itself will infallibly generate the base vermin of spies and informers, and a still more pestilential race of political tools and retainers of the meanest and most odious description; while the prodigious patronage, which the collecting of this splendid revenue will throw into the hands of Government, will invest it with so vast an influence, and hold out such means and temptations to corruption, as all the virtue and public spirit even of Republicans will be unable to resist."

This, sir, is what the English themselves say as to the effects of that excessive, that blind but eager pursuit of national glory, in which they have been engaged. Surely, then, it is not a fit example for our imitation. On the contrary, I say, let our glory consist in the happiness of our people; let our freedom from such oppressions as those under which the people of England now labor, be our boast. It is then we shall have obtained true glory; it is then we shall have accomplished the great object for which our Government was instituted.

Thus much Mr. W. thought it was necessary to say on the subject of the bill generally, and in reply to the remarks which had fallen from gentlemen. He would not, however, be understood to say, that the extravagant course of policy pursued in Mr. Adams's administration was carried to all those pernicious consequences he had pointed out. He said only, but he said it boldly, that, unless the good sense of the American people had arrested the course, changed the policy, and diverted the tendency of that Administration, we should now be as much oppressed, ceteris paribus, as the people of England. As the voice of the nation could not then, so he hoped it would not now be resisted; and that we should again resume those wholesome habits of economy from which we had departed. He would, therefore, proceed immediately to the consideration of the bill which embraced the principle for which he contended.

Reduction of the Army.

Propositions of this kind, it would be recollected, said Mr. W., had been before Congress for several years, but as yet they have been unsuccessful. He rejoiced, however, in the belief he had, that now the subject would be thoroughly investigated; that it would receive that full and free examination which its importance, both intrinsic and relative, may demand. For, sir, the amount of a military force and the manner of its support are, in every country, questions of the first importance. But, with us, they deserve infinite consideration, because, in proportion as our Government differs from all others, will these questions be found to rise in magnitude, claiming the attention and vigilance of the American people. So important did Congress believe them to be, at the last session, that a resolution was passed, calling upon the Secretary of War to make a report on the subject at the present session. The report, sir, has been received, and what is its aspect? According to my judgment, it is a practical renunciation of the principles upon which our Government is founded, as well as of the principles inculcated at an early period, by that class of politicians to whom the Secretary has heretofore professed to belong. To prove this, the attention of the House is respectfully solicited, while I read some passages from the report. Page 3, the Secretary says—"It will be readily admitted that the organization of the Army ought to have reference to the objects for which it is maintained, and ought to be such as may be best calculated to effect such objects; as it must be obvious, on the slightest reflection, that, on considerations connected herewith, ought to depend not only its numbers, but also the principles on which it ought to be formed."

Again, in the same page, he says, "The objects for which a standing army in peace ought to be maintained, may be comprised under two classes: those which, though they have reference to a state of war, yet are more immediately connected with its duties in peace; and those which relate immediately and solely to war. Under the first class may be enumerated, as the leading objects, the garrisoning the forts along our Atlantic frontier, in order to preserve them, and to cause the sovereignty of the United States to be respected, and the occupying of certain commanding posts in our inland frontier to keep in check our savage neighbors, and to protect our newly formed and feeble settlements in that quarter. These are, doubtless, important objects, but are by no means so essential as those which relate immediately and solely to a state of war; and, though not to be neglected wholly, ought not to have any decided influence in the organization of our Peace Establishment."

From the foregoing, it appears, said Mr. W., to be the opinion of the Secretary, that the duties to be performed by an army in time of peace, ought not to have "any decided influence in the organization of the Peace Establishment." This sentiment, with others which would be noticed hereafter, he deemed a palpable abandonment of the principles of the Government. Whatever he might have previously thought, there was no longer room to entertain a doubt of the fact, since the speeches of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SIMKINS.) The first of these gentlemen, from his official station in this House, as Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, must be supposed to be intimately acquainted with the views and sentiments entertained by the head of the War Department. Whether the latter gentleman has had access to the same source of information was for the House to determine.

Both gentlemen, pursuing what I had believed was the opinion of the Secretary, have discarded the militia as a means of defence for this country. The gentleman from Virginia, in particular, entered into a series of reasoning founded upon what he was pleased to call historical facts, to prove that the militia force was not worthy to be relied on. Mr. W. said he also would rely on history to prove not only that the militia were to be depended on, but that they were the only sort of force to which this Government could safely trust. It was not, indeed, history, in the simple acceptation of the term, such as the member from Virginia had produced, but it was of a higher and more authoritative character. It was not history, written by one individual, containing only the opinions of that individual, and that opinion, too, fraught with all the prejudices of him who expressed it, but it was constitutional history, pronounced by the patriots and sages of the country assembled for the all-important purpose of creating and establishing Governments for the several States in this wide-spread Republic. Examine this history from the earliest periods to the present moment—from the constitution of Massachusetts down to the constitution of Missouri, and the same great fundamental truths are seen to pervade the whole; they are these: "That standing armies are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be allowed; that a well-regulated militia are the only sure and certain defence of a free people." Gentlemen on the other side may give what force and effect they please to their history, but we will rely on constitutional history, which is more solemn, and entitled to infinitely greater weight than any authority they can possibly produce. From it, I hope we shall be able to point out the dangers we are likely to incur or should labor to avoid.

In reply to the gentlemen espousing the opposite side in this debate, Mr. W. said, he would endeavor to show, in the language and spirit of that constitutional history to which he had referred, first, that standing armies are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be allowed; second, "that the militia are the only sure and certain defence of a free people;" that the Army of this country is unnecessarily large at present, and should therefore be reduced.

A government, like an individual person, has certain principles or laws impressed on it at its creation, which are natural to it in every stage of its existence, and from which it can never depart, but at the risk of consequences always hazardous, if not utterly destructive. Nature dictates to man, in his individual capacity, the love of truth and justice, and if he ever disregards the impulse of that sentiment he will incur certain evil. In like manner, whatever appears to be the natural dictate of a government, should be carefully discerned and scrupulously obeyed; for, if not, the body politic will become disorganized, and rendered the subject of every dangerous infection. It would not do for a monarchy to practise upon the principles of a republican government, nor, on the other hand, for a republic to practise upon the principles of monarchy. These two governments are opposites in the various systems of polity, and should go on in the separate spheres in which they have been destined to move. It would be as rational to expect the repeated occurrence of strange anomalies in nature, as to suppose that a republic could occasionally dart into the sphere of monarchy and still preserve its blessings in all their pristine excellence. If, therefore, in the course or revolutions of republican government, it is ever found to be erratic; if it is seen to deviate from those laws impressed on it by the mighty hand of the people who created it; if it courts conjunction with, or solicits indulgence in the costly, the expensive trappings and appendages of monarchy, then I pronounce the time has arrived for arresting its progress and reforming its example.

Of all the principles connatural with the people of these United States, impressed upon them at their political creation, none appears more important, or announced with more solemnity than this—"that standing armies are dangerous to the liberties of a free people, and ought not to be allowed." This truth is distinctly written in constitutions formed contemporaneously with the birth day of our independence, as well as in those ordained and established at different periods. But it is particularly the saying of our ancestors—of the fathers of the freedom and independence of their country. Throughout their works you find the same cautious concern, the same jealous solicitude about the fatal effects resulting from an overgrown, a redundant, and an inactive army in time of peace. Let me ask if their imaginations were distempered; if they were alarmed at an airy phantom; or whether they did not speak the language of soberness and truth, teaching their posterity how to avoid dangers, certain, real, and extremely formidable? The latter conclusion must be adopted, and we should receive these Constitutional provisions, the arguments of gentlemen to the contrary notwithstanding, as so many credenda in the articles of our political faith.

Yes, sir, the champions of our independence and our rights knew well that the laws and rules of an army were, in fact, the laws and rules of absolute despotism; that an army was dangerous to our civil and political institutions, not only on account of its physical force, but also on account of its moral effects, its contaminating influence over our principles, feelings, and habits. In England, the country from which in order to be separated America lavished so prodigiously of her blood and treasure, martial law is considered so much at variance with the small portion of liberty she enjoys, that it is called "in reality not a law, but something indulged rather than allowed as a law." If an army and its rules be thus dangerous to British liberty, how much more so are they to the liberty of American citizens? As citizens we boast of our equality; but in vain do you look for it in the army. Here are all those distinctions of rank—all that slavish submission to the will of a superior which are to be seen in the most absolute governments. If an inferior officer or soldier strikes his superior, the punishment of death is inflicted as the necessary, the only adequate atonement. Monstrous indeed is the punishment for so trivial an offence! The Grand Sultan of Turkey, who vain-gloriously styles himself the "Shadow of God—a God on earth—brother to the sun and moon—disposer of all earthly crowns," could not support his imaginary greatness with more tremendous exactions, with more awful penalties. As citizens we also boast of our liberty; but, as soldiers, a long ascent of ranks and grades rises before us; the command of each is a law, and to disobey is to forfeit our lives. I know well, said Mr. W., the excuse which is generally offered for the continuance of these inexorable rules. It was commonly said they are founded upon necessity, but he hoped he should be able to show how dangerous it was to suffer any system founded upon such necessity to exist in a great or unreasonable degree.

That the military life will corrupt the feelings and habits of those who were engaged in it was, Mr. W. thought, also evident. Suppose two characters, A and B, have acted in the army for ten years—A in the capacity of an officer, B in that of a soldier; that, after their term of service had expired, they both return to the walks of civil life. Now, I ask whether these two characters will associate together upon the terms of their original footing of equality as citizens, or whether they will not be more likely, from their feelings and habits, to preserve that distinctive condition of officer and soldier in which they had been recently placed on the Military Establishment. My word for it, the latter condition will obtain. For no matter how well disposed, how zealously devoted to the cause of liberty and equality, a person might have been before he had become the subject of military discipline, yet, after being inured to it for a while, he will be attached to it; he will forget the blessings which attend the condition of a citizen, or, being himself deprived of those blessings, he will be envious that no others should be permitted to enjoy them. Hence it is that standing armies have always been dangerous to liberty throughout the world. In despotic governments, it is true, there is no difference between the condition of a common subject and that of a soldier; both are equally doomed to the scourge of tyranny, in which perhaps both may delight; nothing is to be gained by a change, which perhaps they are unable to contrive or accomplish. But, in our free country, persons habituated to military life become, as officers, on the one hand, domineering and intolerant, and, as soldiers, on the other, servile and dependent.

In short, sir, our army is subject to the same sort of discipline as the other armies of the world; but is our Government like other Governments? Look to the Sultan of Turkey, the late despot of France, or to the King of England, and you will find nearly the same system in use for the discipline of their armies. Compare it with our system, and there appears no very great or considerable discrepancy. But between their governments and our own you behold an immense difference. If, then, their systems of military discipline are adapted to the nature of their governments, and calculated to support them, our system, being like theirs, cannot be adapted to the nature of our Government, or calculated for its support. As widely, therefore, as the governments of the old world differ from our own, so widely do the rules and discipline of our army differ from the nature of our Government.

JANUARY, 1821.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

I hope, said Mr. W., not to be misunderstood. It is not my purpose to contend that we ought to dispense with the whole Military Establishment, because the system of rules adopted for its government are at variance with the nature of our civil and political institutions. My object has been to show, that all armies are governed upon principles similarly, if not equally, despotic; that, as this is the case, we should be careful how we introduce that system of things into the United States, because our Government, being a Republic of the most liberal kind, will not be able to consociate (if I may use the expression) with that system. It is impossible for two opposite natures to exist in the same being, and I would as soon expect the military despotism of Bonaparte could exist in identity with our Government; that it could flourish at the same time, and be maintained over the same people, as to suppose our own Government could exist under the influence of a very extended Military Establishment, in time of peace. The Army and the Government would inherit different natures, and perpetual warfare must ensue, till the spirit of one had subdued that of the other. In such a contest the civil would fall prostrate before the military power. The constitutions of our governments, the precepts and sayings of our forefathers; the evidence of all mankind, as transmitted to us through the records of history; in short, the very nature of the thing itself, will not permit us to entertain a doubt on this subject.

From this view, it is evident that if the Army is necessary, it is a kind of necessary evil, and it should be the object of the American people to have as little of it as possible. The question for us to decide, at all times, should be, "with how much of this evil can we dispense?" not "with what quantity of it can we be able to subsist?" The rule should be to keep in service as few men as possible, not as many as possible. A patient, laboring with sickness and threatened with death, willingly takes the most disgusting potions of medicine, but by no means does he calculate that these are to become articles for his daily subsistence. It may sometimes be proper for the United States to keep in service forty, fifty, or a hundred thousand troops, but it does not follow from this, that it will always be requisite to have an army of the same size. The Military Establishment ought to be regulated by the necessities of the country. In cases of danger, it may be greater; but at other times, when peace reigns throughout our borders, when not the least aspect of war is to be seen, it should be reduced to the lowest possible standard, regarding it always as an evil necessary to be used occasionally, but to be employed with care, and to be watched with vigilance.

Believing the House will be disposed to concur in the sentiments which have been advanced, I shall proceed immediately to inquire what reduction it would be proper to make in the present Military Establishment, reserving any other remarks I may have to offer in relation to the danger of armies, and the propriety of relying on the militia, for future occasions, as they may arise in the course of my observations.

Whatever difference of opinion may have heretofore existed, as to the number of men, yet all have seemed to think, that the number of officers in the Army was unnecessarily great. The Secretary of War, however, has invariably adhered to this branch of the Army with wonderful tenacity. That he should have done so, in the report made at the present session, is, to me, a matter of perfect surprise. He knew well the condition of the Treasury; he knew there would be a deficiency of several millions; he also knew that the officers materially contributed to the expense of supporting the Army, and, yet, after all this information, he gravely recommends that the officers should be retained. I should have supposed that a very different course would have been pursued; that he would have recommended the retention of a proportion of more men and fewer officers than exists in the present organization of the Army. For, in the report made by the Secretary in 1818, he says, page 5, "it is obvious that, as the officers are much more expensive in proportion to their numbers than the soldiers, that the pay of the Army, in relation to its aggregate numbers, will be increased or diminished with the increase or diminution of the former." It is, then, I say, a matter of surprise, that the Secretary should have recommended the retention of all the officers, when he knew that economy was the object contemplated in the proposed reduction of the Army, and when, from his own statement, the officers were much more expensive, in proportion to their numbers, than the soldiers.

From the same report of 1818, it appears that if the Army were full, there would be, according to the present organization, about four men to each officer, non-commissioned officer, and musician. This disproportion has always been a great objection to the Military Establishment. The people saw, and the Secretary of War himself has said, that the expense of the Army was greatly owing to the number of officers. In this state of things a resolution was passed at the last session, requiring that a report from the Head of the War Department should be made at the present session, containing a plan for the reduction of the Army. Well, sir, the report comes in, and what is proposed? Why, that the organization of the Army shall be a little changed; but it is not proposed to reduce the number of officers. Not only so, but the objections to the proposed organization are much greater than to the present; for, by that which is proposed, there will be something more than two men for each officer, non-commissioned officer, and musician. Yes, sir, it is a fact which no one scarcely could have believed, that this enormous disproportion is recommended to us for our approbation.

I will venture to say, there is not an army in the world, not even in Governments the most profuse and prodigal, where the disproportion of officers to men is so great as it is with us at this time; and, yet, by the plan of the Secretary, this disproportion is to be greatly increased. Military characters say, the staff in particular is now large enough for fifty, some say a hundred thousand men. But yet, we are told, we must not reduce it, when it is admitted, or determined by the resolution of last session, that we shall reduce the number of men nearly one-half. If the staff officers under the old organization have had not much to do; if, on account of their numbers, they have been permitted to idle away their time, how much more will this be the case under the proposed organization!

In 1818, the Secretary reported to us that the staff of the Army, under the existing organization, amounted only to 96. I then objected to the correctness of the statement; I mentioned that the number was upwards of 200, and called upon any gentleman who might see the thing differently to correct me, if I was wrong, or give such explanations as might satisfy the House. To prove now that I was then correct, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to some tabular and other documents contained in the two reports of the Secretary. Document B, of the late or new report, professes to be the same as document A, of the report submitted in 1818; but, yet, the former is quite at variance with the latter in some of its details. In the organization, as proposed in the new report, it is not intimated by the Secretary that the number of the staff will be increased beyond that set forth in the report made in 1818. But the number of the Staff, in the organization proposed in the new report, amounts to 228, and, of the organization reported in 1818, only to 96. Whence, sir, is this difference? Could the Secretary have thought to impose on Congress? I hope not. But, if he did, I trust he will be mistaken. I must, however, say that both these reports have appeared to me more like speeches addressed to the army, than communications made to this House.

I will now proceed to notice more particularly the staff recommended by the Secretary. There are two Major Generals, four Aids de Camp, four Brigadier Generals, four Aids de Camp, one Judge Advocate, six Topographical Engineers, four Assistant Topographical Engineers, one Adjutant and Inspector General, two Adjutant Generals, four Assistant Adjutant Generals, two Inspector Generals, four Assistant Inspector Generals, ten Regimental Adjutants, eight Battalion Adjutants, making, in this department, a total of 56; in the Quartermaster's department there are 37; Paymaster's department 20; Purchasing department 4; Subsistence department 1, with as many Assistants as the service may require; Medical department 75; Engineer Corps 23; Military Academy, 12 Professors and Masters; making an aggregate of 228, exclusive of Cadets; but, if they be added, of 478. At the head of this prodigious staff stand the two Major Generals. No one but the Secretary, or some other person zealously and determinately devoted to the army, could have thought of retaining the Major Generals. The Secretary says, page 8 of the report:

"It is proposed to retain the two Major and four Brigadier Generals. Although it is not probable there will be concentrated, in time of peace, at any point, a force equal to the command of a single Major, or even a Brigadier General, yet, it is conceived important to the service that they should be retained; as two regiments, with a proper proportion of artillery and light troops, constitute, in our service, one brigade, and two brigades a division, the command of a Major General, the number of regiments and battalions under the proposed organization, thus giving a command equal to that of two Major, and four Brigadier Generals."

Here, sir, the Secretary admits that there will be concentrated at no one point a number of men equal to the command of a single Major, nor even a Brigadier General. He would indeed have been equally correct if he had said that the whole Army, under the plan proposed, would, if assembled at one point, scarcely be equal to the command of one Major General and two Brigadiers. But, yet, he recommends the retention of two Major and four Brigadier Generals, thus advising us to keep in service double the number of general officers which, according to this part of his reasoning, he proves to be necessary. I ask if we shall be gravely told this; if we shall assume it as a rule of our conduct, and keep in service the whole of these general officers, when it cannot be denied that there are not men for their command. The most that the Secretary could have done, under such circumstances, would have been to show that there were men for the officers to command, and then to recommend that they should be retained. But he seeks further justification by saying that the number of regiments and battalions give a command for all the generals.

This, sir, is a deception in argument easily exposed and entitled to no weight. For, why did he not show, not that the number of regiments and battalions, but that the number of men in those regiments and battalions, would justify the course proposed? You may call a Captain's company a regiment, and thus give to a Brigadier General the command which ought to belong to two Captains, or to a Major General the command which ought to belong to four Captains. In this way, sir, we might have the greatest plenty of general officers; nay, in such abundance as to satisfy the Secretary of War himself, whose appetite for officers of this rank seems quite insatiable. For my own part, I am unwilling to keep in service, at any time, general officers, when there are not men for their command. But, when there is a deficiency of several millions in the Treasury; when the country is oppressed with debt, I would dispense with officers even if they had men to command; because, by so doing, we get clear of a great expense, whereas, if only the men are discharged from service, and the officers retained, we get clear of a very inconsiderable expense.

Of what use, let it be asked, are the two Major Generals? The Secretary says, page 8 of the report, "But a more weighty and, in my opinion, decisive reason why they should be retained, may be found in the principle already stated, that the organization of the Peace Establishment ought to be such as to induce persons of talent and respectability to enter and continue in the military service." Now, said Mr. W., the argument presented in so much of the report as I have just read, is perfectly illusory. Do the Colonels remain in service because they are satisfied with their condition as Colonels, or from a hope of becoming Brigadier Generals? Do the Brigadiers remain in service because they are satisfied with their condition as Brigadiers, or from a hope that they will become Major Generals? I take it, sir, that the officers, from the highest to the lowest, remain in service because they are satisfied with their present condition, and not from any hope of getting to be Major Generals. It is with them a money-making business, perhaps more profitable than any in which they could engage, and this is the reason they remain in the Army, as I shall hereafter show. Besides this, the argument is defective in another point of view. It is said that, even with the office of Major General, many resignations take place. Assuming, then, the opinion of the Secretary as the fact, in this case, to wit, that the rank and compensation now given to the Generals are not sufficient to prevent resignations, what does it prove? It proves this: that you have not yet done enough; that you must even go further, and institute the office of Lieutenant General, attaching to it the highest honors and emoluments. For, we are told it is necessary to prevent resignations in the Army, and that high offices will have the desired effect. But we are told, again, that the offices of two Major and four Brigadier Generals, already established by law, will not prevent resignations. It follows, then, as a necessary consequence, from the Secretary's own reasoning, that we must create the office of Lieutenant General, in order to prevent resignations. This course of argument proves quite too much.

But I differ from him altogether on the subject of the resignation of officers of the Army. It is to be ascribed to very different causes. Perhaps the most influential cause has been, the belief officers have had that the Army would be reduced; and, rather than wait for this event, they have anticipated it by handing in their resignations; at the same time they have solicited the best civil offices which were to be had; not because they preferred those civil offices, but because they thought them the only alternative. But let it once be understood that the Army is not to be reduced, and my word for it you will hear no more of these voluntary resignations. This would be the case, whether or not you have the office of Major or Brigadier General. If there were no higher rank than a Colonel, then all officers subordinate to that rank would hold on to their commissions just as they do at present. It is not the office so much as the highest office, which is the object of emulous pursuit amongst men. If the rank of Colonel or Brigadier General were the highest office known to our laws, then there would be all that aspiration to attain it; there would be all that complacency and self-satisfaction in having attained it, which are to be observed in the conduct of those who (according to the Secretary's views) may now be in pursuit of the office of Major General. Did the officers of Mr. Jefferson's Peace Establishment think themselves deficient in rank? Not at all. There was then no Major General. But the officers, knowing they filled the highest military stations in the country, were satisfied, and consequently remained in service. Therefore, the reasoning of the Secretary on this head either proves nothing, or it proves too much, which is worse than nothing.

This plan, said Mr. W., of retaining men in service by the hope of receiving the greater rank, pay, and emoluments, attached to the office of Major General, is radically wrong. It costs too much. It is paying too dear for the whistle. We have two Major Generals, with two great divisions—the Northern and Southern. The headquarters are at Brownville, in the North, and at Nashville, in the South. This arrangement was evidently made for the convenience and accommodation of those officers, not for the good of the service; on the contrary, it introduces complexity and confusion into our system of military affairs. We all recollect the strife between the War Department and the Major General of the South, relative to certain rules of etiquette to be observed in the transmission of orders. As matters now stand, an order must travel all the way to Nashville, and then back to Washington, before it can reach an officer stationed at the Marine barracks, not distant more than a mile from this Capitol; that is, an order must travel twelve or fifteen hundred miles before it comes to the officer who is the subject of it, and who has always been distant about one mile from the Department from whence the order issued. The same regulation, I understand, exists in regard to the Northern division; and, if it is thus necessary that orders should pass through the Major Generals, why not direct their headquarters to be at more favorable positions—at Washington and Baltimore for example. Then there could be no delay in the progress of orders to inferior officers, because the Major Generals, through whom we understand they must pass, would be stationed immediately on the lines of direct communication. But, no, this would not do; these officers must be accommodated; and, for their especial benefit, they have been permitted to reside at home; to live on their own farms, and to mind their own business, receiving from the Government, at the same time, as nearly as I can estimate, about seven thousand dollars a year. Some calculate that the amount received is considerably greater, as much perhaps as eight or ten thousand dollars a year. Sir, I think it, if not an abuse, at least a very great grievance, that these officers, while they reside at home, should have received the whole pay and emoluments attached to their office. The allowance for forage, fuel, four servants, seven horses, three rooms and a kitchen, I have believed, was intended for actual service; for a state of war, and not for a state of profound peace to the country and domestic retirement to the officer. When they go abroad, it is said all these paraphernalia accompany them. Forage, fuel, four servants, seven horses, three rooms and a kitchen, and 1,250 pounds of baggage, all adhere to and march on with the Generals! Indeed, sir, they must have great strength to draw after them such a ponderous and heterogeneous load of items. No Eastern Satrap could move with greater pomp.

H. of R.

JANUARY, 1821.

As to preserving and perpetuating a knowledge of the military science, by keeping these Generals in service, the plan, I say, is utterly fallacious. Their situation at home precludes the possibility of learning any thing new, and almost of retaining what they do know. The knowledge to be preserved, or information to be acquired by them, while they reside on their own farms, will qualify them much better for the cornfield than the field of battle, and no doubt they study the operations of the former much more than of the latter. It is true, they come on sometimes to the Seat of Government, but for what purpose nobody knows, unless it be to drill Congress or attend the parties.

Another reason assigned by the Secretary for retaining the Generals is, that it will operate upon the army like the "high prizes in a lottery;" that men of talents will thereby be induced to enter and continue in the service. Of all the figures of speech with which our language abounds, I think this "metaphor" the most unfortunate which could possibly have been selected. For there are two things so little comparable to each other as a lottery and a regular gradation by which officers are advanced in the army. The high prizes in a lottery are distributed, not according to any rule whatever, but entirely by chance, by accident, by the most capricious turns of fortune. Not so in relation to the advancement of officers in the army: there you have certain fixed rules, a perfect scale of gradation, according to which every one must be promoted. Does not every inferior officer know that all his superiors must be promoted in preference to himself? Surely, he does. Then it follows that this inducement proposed by the Secretary operates, not as a lottery, hereafter to be drawn, and in which no one knows how the prizes will be distributed, but rather as a lottery which has already been drawn, and in which the fate of every adventurer is fixed and determined. Many of the remarks which have been made respecting the Major Generals are also applicable to the Brigadiers. I cannot, for my life, determine what use the Secretary intends to make of the four officers of this rank he proposes to keep in service; that is, as I understand it, in the pay of Government. These officers are allowed forage, fuel, three servants, five horses, two rooms and a kitchen. But the Secretary tells us there will not be concentrated at any one point a force equal to the command of a single Brigadier; and why be at the expense of keeping four of them? I call upon gentlemen to tell us what they are to do. It has been suggested that we ought to retain three Brigadiers: one to be stationed here, another in the North, and a third in the South. But, cannot one Colonel in the North, and another in the South, answer the same purpose? Our desire for general officers seems truly inextinguishable. When going abroad, these Brigadiers must also assume the style of Satraps, and draw after them a great load of items: nay, more, I have understood from good authority, that between three and four thousand dollars have been allowed to one Brigadier, as a sort of extra pay (I suppose) for fatigue duty performed in travelling over Europe—or, perhaps the allowance was made out of the fund appropriated for foreign intercourse. But I never heard of any treaties being negotiated by that gentleman, or that he was in any respect to be considered the diplomatic agent of the United States.

By dispensing with the two Major Generals and three Brigadiers, we also get clear of seven Aids-de-Camp.

Next comes the office of Adjutant and Inspector General. This is a pretty decent snug commission, to be held by a clerk in the Department. His duties are entirely those of a clerk, and why is it that he has the rank, pay, and emoluments, of a Brigadier General? I can perceive no reason, unless it be for the purpose of illustrating the Military Establishment. But the better way is to graduate and pay men according to the service they render. If they act as clerks, let them be ranked and paid as such. If I am correctly informed, many officers of the army complain of this anomaly in our Military Establishment. It is said the present incumbent would probably not know how to march a corporal's guard, and yet his rank, pay, and emoluments, advance him quite beyond officers who have seen active, efficient service. Permit me here to say that I have nothing personal against that officer. When I have had occasion to correspond with him, he has answered me promptly. Sometimes I find a little difficulty in reading his communications.

Instead of two Adjutants and four Assistant Adjutant Generals, the whole business of this branch of the army may be transacted by one Adjutant General and one assistant. Thus, we may dispense with one Adjutant General, and three assistants, and thereby save to the nation their pay and emoluments.

Two Inspector Generals and four Assistant Inspectors are also too many for our service. When this subject was considered in the session of 1818-19, I mentioned that the Inspectors, if my information was correct, were young men and not qualified to perform their duties; but, if qualified, they have nevertheless failed to perform their duty, and that a regiment in the northern division had been reviewed only once by an Inspector, since the introduction of this part of the staff, which was three years previous to that time. In reply to this, a gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) whom I now see in his place, mentioned a fact which no doubt he learned from the Inspector General of the Northern division, who was then in this city. The fact was this, "that the officer in question had himself, the Summer preceding, visited every post, examined every musket, and performed every duty which appertained to his office in that division." Now, sir, if the Inspector General performed all these duties in the Northern division, why is it that he has two assistants? I take it for granted, that the Inspector General of the Southern division can likewise perform all the duties of his office; and why is it that he also has two assistants? Here you have six officers to perform duties to which only two are fully competent. Indeed, sir, I must say, that our whole Military Establishment seems to have been built up more from a regard to the men who were to fill offices, than to the service it was expected these men would render.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

The bill provides for as many regimental and battalion adjutants as will be necessary, under the proposed plan of reduction. If gentlemen think otherwise, I should be glad they would point out any deficiency.

The Quartermaster's department is next in order, as reported by the Secretary. He proposes to retain in it thirty-seven officers. I admit, said Mr. W., that if there is any one branch of the Army more ably and faithfully conducted than all others, it is this; and would be willing to let the rank of the officers remain, but would reduce their number. My friend, the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) submitted a resolution the other day, calling upon the Secretary of War for a statement of the rank, number, and distribution of the Army at each post. This statement has been made accordingly, but has not yet been printed, so as to be laid on our table. I must, then, rely, on the information previously possessed, from which it will be seen that, in 1818, two assistant deputy quartermaster generals were in General Jesup's office at this place. At Detroit there were also two, while the whole duties of the sixth regiment, stationed at Plattsburg, were performed by one quartermaster. At Boston, there were two; at New York, two; at West Point, there was a quartermaster, where, also, a lieutenant of engineers received the pay of quartermaster, whether he performed the duties or not. These facts are mentioned to show that the number of officers in this department was unnecessarily great in 1818. As their duties have not increased, but rather decreased since that time, the number of these officers may be proportionably lessened. Instead of sixteen assistant deputy quartermaster generals, I would have only eight; and, instead of eighteen regimental and battalion quartermasters, I would reduce them to the number of regiments and battalions proposed in the bill. This would be my plan. But if it should not meet the views of my friends, I will concede whatever preference I might have, and will vote for the bill, because retrenchment is with me a paramount object.

The medical department requires, I should think, considerable excision. The Secretary proposes to retain seventy-five doctors. If good, they are more than necessary. If bad, they are enough to kill a nation. In 1818, he reported to us there were seventy-three posts. I shall show, hereafter, that it is not necessary to garrison more than one-half, at any rate, not more than two-thirds of the number of posts stated to us. But yet, it is proposed to keep seventy-five doctors, a number more than equal to the whole number of posts. This seems to me very strange, because, if I was correctly informed, the surgeon at Albany, in 1818, performed little or no duty; the surgeon at Watertown practised among the people at large, professing, at the same time, to belong to an arsenal which was not finished, and in which there was no garrison. The surgeon at Boston was stationed there ostensibly for the purpose of inspecting recruits, but as soon as recruits were made, they were sent to the garrison in the harbor, where there were two surgeons. The surgeon at New York was similarly situated. If a like examination could have been had at that time of the position of the surgeons in the Southern division, no doubt they would have been found to be engaged with equal profit to themselves, if not to the Army. The apothecaries I would entirely discharge. How can they, at New York or Philadelphia, tell the medicines necessary to be purchased for the troops who may be sick at Charleston or New Orleans? Would it not be much better to let the surgeon at any particular post purchase such medicines as may be wanted for the sick at that post. Besides, I have been credibly informed, by a gentleman from Tennessee, who is not now, but was then a member, that the apothecaries were very deficient in performing their duties. He mentioned one striking fact as coming within his observation. It was this, that an apothecary stationed at Baltimore had purchased orange peel to send all the way to New Orleans. Now, sir, every body ought to know that oranges grow in the greatest abundance at New Orleans; and that, of all articles of medicine, this was the least wanted at that place. It would, then, seem scarcely possible that any apothecary, however unskilful or injudicious he might be, could think of running Government to the greater cost of the article at Baltimore, and expense of transporting it to New Orleans, where, in the first instance, it could have been had for nothing. If this be the way in which they discharge their other duties, the sooner we get clear of them the better.

The subject of the Engineer Corps, in connexion with the Military Academy, Mr. W. said, he would leave to his friend, the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. CANNON,) who would treat it with much more justice than he should be able to do, by any remarks he might offer.

He had now, he said, taken a cursory review of the staff proposed to be retained. The officers of the line also, in his judgment, appeared too numerous. The Secretary says, page 9, "No position connected with the organization of the peace establishment is susceptible of being more rigidly proved than that the proportion of its officers to

H. OF R.

Reduction of the Army.

JANUARY, 1821.

'the rank and file, ought to be greater than in a 'war establishment." But what these rigid proofs are, or what should be the exact proportion of officers to the rank and file, he has not vouchsafed to tell us. Most of those with whom I have conversed have believed that the duties of an army were more multiplied and laborious in war than in peace, and therefore, that a greater number of officers would be required for the former condition. The Secretary, however, says, "It results immediately from a position, the truth of which cannot be fairly doubted, that the leading object of a 'regular army in time of peace, ought to be, to 'enable the country to meet, with honor and safety, 'particularly at the commencement of war, the 'dangers incident to that state." On no previous occasion have I ever before heard it announced that we should retain in peace officers for a war establishment. It appears to me more rank doctrine than was maintained in Mr. Adams's administration. What, sir, would have been said if he had advocated such opinions—opinions as hostile to the principles of the Government as to the principles of that class of politicians to whom the Secretary has heretofore professed to belong. For, sir, it is a principle inherent in the very nature of the Government, and which, I had believed was almost universally admitted, that a well regulated militia is the only sure and certain defence of this country. But the Secretary, in effect, disclaims this doctrine; he holds out the idea that the militia are not to be relied on, and therefore, you must keep on the peace establishment officers to command your armies in a state of war. I protest against this doctrine with my whole strength; I disclaim it, as anti-republican, as useless, as dangerous, as extravagant.

It is anti-republican, because it is forbidden by the nature and spirit of our Government. It is dangerous, because it cannot be denied that the officers are the persons who originate and carry into effect designs fraught with mischief and ruin to the country in which they live. The disposition of mankind is such that, if not employed in doing good, they will be employed in doing evil. Officers, in peace, having nothing to do, and in the habit of commanding those about them, begin at length to feel impatient under the restraints of Government, and have, in every instance, been the first to meditate the overthrow of liberty. Did Cæsar pass the Rubicon when fighting the enemies of Rome, or after they were subdued, and he had nothing else to do but to make a conquest of the liberties, of his own country? Let us attend to our own history. At what time were written the letters of Newburgh? Examine the conduct of all armies, and you will find, I think, that officers are most dangerous in peace. It is then they have leisure to meditate, and opportunity to execute, such plans as the more wicked and designing among them may wish to accomplish.

Again—it is of no use to keep officers in service when they can render no service; this is the solecism, the contradiction in terms, to which the advocates of the proposed organization must necessarily be driven. They say it is right to retain the officers, but when called upon to point out the service these officers are to perform, they are at a loss for an answer. Some reason, however, is attempted to be given by saying that, although the officers may not now be of any immediate use, yet they will hereafter be useful when the country is engaged in war. The Secretary says we shall certainly be involved in war, and that no one, unless he has the "imagination of a poet," can think otherwise. Now, sir, I readily admit that the Secretary has not the imagination of a poet; and, further, if a sort of tautology and alliteration; if a kind of synonymous repetition are any defects in style, that he has as slender pretension to prose. But, in whatever character he is to be considered, whether of poetry, prose, politics, or prophecy, he has gone equally wide from the mark. He has not, indeed, told us the nation from whom we are to expect war—only an obscure hint is given, a kind of passing allusion is thrown out that we may have war with Spain. But the late news from that quarter, although not official, yet entitled to credit, fully explodes this idea. Without this news I would as soon apprehend invasion from the inhabitants of the moon as to suppose Spain would ever attempt to make incursions into our territory. But it may be supposed we are shortly to have war with England. This will turn out like the apprehension of hostilities with Spain. The points in controversy between us and England are so far removed as to render war with that Power a very improbable event. I ask, whether any man of common sense can seriously apprehend it in any short time? But if it comes it will be confined to the ocean. No one in the possession and exercise of his right mind can suppose Great Britain will ever attempt to wage war effectually against the United States by land. We may be temporarily invaded at different points along our maritime frontier, but whoever thought we should keep a regular army to meet that contingency! The militia were always intended to be used and thought competent for this service. Indeed, the framers of the Constitution provided expressly for this particular case when they gave to the General Government power to call out the militia to repel invasion. But the Secretary says, page 4, "the 'organization of the army ought to be such as to 'enable the Government, at the commencement of 'hostilities, to obtain a regular force adequate to 'the emergencies of the country, properly organized and prepared for actual service." If, sir, the militia are not to be called out at the commencement of hostilities, if they are not to be relied on to repel invasion, when, I pray you, are they to render any service? Certainly not after the war shall have progressed for some time, because then, every one admits, Government will have provided an adequate force of regular troops. It follows, then, according to this plan of the Secretary, that the militia in no instance and at no time are to render any service. If they are to be thus entirely superseded, let us at once know the fact. Let us not hereafter, as we have done heretofore, appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars to arm them; to prepare to repel invasion; to qualify them to sustain that rank in the country which the Constitution assigns to them, and which the policy of our institutions requires them to hold.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

We speak only of a war in which the United States are invaded and act on the defensive, because, in an aggressive war begun by ourselves, we can select our own time, and cannot therefore be taken by surprise. Well, then, I say no one ever had the madness to suppose that we should keep a sufficient regular force to meet the first emergency. Can you, sir, can any other one tell me the number of troops necessary for that purpose? The Secretary says that, should a just precaution growing out of our foreign relations render it necessary, we may, on the basis proposed, augment the Peace Establishment 11,558; and pending hostilities, by adding a few more officers, we may have an aggregate of 19,035. Now, sir, what could this army do in a state of war? The whole of them might be required to defend, for example, the town of Boston, as being the only kind of force, in the language of the Secretary, "able to meet the first shocks of hostilities with unyielding firmness." But, before our troops could have marched fifty miles on the seacoast, the enemy might invade New York, and here again you would want another army of 19,035. But, as no regular troops could be had to meet the enemy, the militia must be called out to defend New York. In this way an enemy could invade your whole maritime frontier, from Passamquoddy to New Orleans, and at every point except one, as in the example of Boston, above supposed, you must rely on the militia for defence. How idle, then, is it for us to talk about keeping a regular force able to meet the first attacks of an invading enemy. It would require perhaps half a million of troops; and the accumulation of debt, the pressure of taxation consequent upon such a measure, would produce greater prostration of our energies, would affect more vitally the prosperity and happiness of our fellow-citizens, than any thing else which could be designed.

Our distance from Europe, said Mr. W., will always allow us one, two, or perhaps three years previous notice, and we can never be invaded without having sufficient time to prepare for the emergency. In Europe powerful nations border upon each other; nothing but a river, a road, or an imaginary line, separates them. Hence it is necessary they should always be ready, because they know not at what moment they may be attacked. But, with us, the state of things is very different, and yet gentlemen discuss this question according to principles of policy derived from Europe, and not by such as are adapted to the situation and circumstances of our own country.

As to war with the Indian tribes it is not necessary to retain a single portion of the regular army for that purpose. Throughout our whole history the militia have been the force to encounter Indian hostilities. Even in the Seminole war, where you had to fight three or four hundred half starved, half naked and miserable Indians, the regular army did no good. The militia of Tennessee and Kentucky were called out to meet the enemy wherever he was met. There is however, no prospect of collision with the Indians, unless it grows out of the expedition ordered up to Council Bluffs, on Missouri river. But, this we can prevent when we please, by withdrawing the troops, who ought never to have been sent upon so wild and chimerical a project.

The gentlemen from Virginia and South Carolina, (Mr. SMYTH, and Mr. SIMKINS,) have said, that the Peace Establishment of 1802, amounting to 3,323, was excessively economical; that it was found to be too small, and afterwards, in 1808, was augmented to 9,996. In saying this, they must have forgotten what was mentioned by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH.) He was in Congress at that time, and told us, in his speech the other day, that in 1802 some were for reducing the army much lower, while others wished to retain a force considerably greater; that, finally, a middle course was pursued, and 3,323 was determined on as a proper Peace Establishment. Those gentlemen then were mistaken in saying that it was "excessively economical," or that it was subsequently augmented, because it was found to be too small. This increase was a measure preparatory for war, and in support of this assertion I can offer those gentlemen authority they will be very much inclined to respect. It is the report of the Secretary of War, made in 1818. In page 4 he says: "It is obvious that the establishment of 1808, compared with the then wealth and population of the country, the number and extent of military posts is larger, in proportion, than the present; but the unsettled state of our relations with France and England, at that time, renders the comparison not entirely just. Passing then that of 1808, let us compare the establishment of 1802 with the present." Here, sir, is evidence which those gentlemen must believe, that our unsettled relations with France and England, caused the augmentation of the army in 1803. I hope then we shall not again be told that it was increased because it had been reduced too low in 1802, for such is not the fact.

Another position assumed by the gentleman from South Carolina, is, that 12,656 is not a greater army now than 3,323 was in 1802, because of the increase, since that time, of our population, of the number of posts, and of the line of frontier. Mr. W. said he knew the Secretary had urged these same arguments in 1818, and he had hoped he should not hear them again, because it appeared to him the report then made was composed of materials entirely too frangible to be relied on as authority in this House. But, as the member from South Carolina had brought it forward, he hoped to be pardoned while he briefly noticed each argument, in the order stated.

First. The Secretary says, (and in this he is followed by the member from South Carolina,) that, because our population is double what it was in 1802, an army of 12,656 is not now greater than 3,323 was in 1802. This is about as conclusive as if any one should undertake to prove that three and three make twelve; for a double population could require only a double army; and as, in 1802, we had an army of 3,323, so we ought now to have only 6,646. But instead of this, it is said we must have 12,656, which, to me at least, is a non sequitur in argument.

H. OF R.

Reduction of the Army.

Second. It was reported to us in 1818, that we then had seventy-three posts, but in 1802 there were only twenty-seven. On the supposition that it was necessary to garrison each post, it would follow, not that you could employ the present establishment of 12,656, but only about 8,000, a little more than the aggregate proposed to be retained in the bill. But I deny that the posts necessary to be garrisoned amount to seventy-three. The Secretary himself told us, in answer to certain inquiries respecting the Yellow Stone expedition, that Indian hostilities had essentially terminated in the southwest, and therefore the troops had been ordered on service up the Missouri. If the troops could be spared, I should think the posts might also be spared. A gentleman who resides in the northwest told me the whole of that line of posts might be demolished. He said the people there did not want them. Admitting, however, that it is necessary to keep some posts both in the northwest and southwest, it still follows that you cannot show a greater number than about fifty, and consequently that you cannot, on the data assumed by the Secretary, find any use for an army larger than that proposed in the bill.

Third. The Secretary says, the line of frontier is greater than it was in 1802, in the proportion of seventy-three to twenty-seven. He has given both the line of frontier and the number of posts for the year 1818; but for 1802, only the number of posts. To enable us to determine fairly, he should have given the frontier at both periods. But, from the materials furnished, scanty as they are, we shall be led to conclude that the frontier has not increased in the proportion stated. Chesapeake Bay, for example, had the same indentations and sinuosities of coast. There were also the same distances from point to point, and the same meanders of rivers at both periods. It is said we have acquired Louisiana since that time. But every one knows the geographical and military frontiers are not always commensurate with each other, or extended precisely in the same degree. The Secretary calculated the acquisition of Florida would not extend our frontier more than about one hundred and twenty miles from point to point, while all agree that our geographical limits would be considerably increased. Indeed, the possession of Louisiana may be said, in several respects, to contract the military frontier. When Spain held it, the Indians were under her control, and were liable to be excited against us at any moment; but now there is no danger from that source. At any rate, then, the necessity for military defence has not increased in the manner stated by the Secretary, and repeated by the member from South Carolina.

The increase of public property, Mr. W. admitted, involved the necessity, correspondingly increased, for a greater number of men to take care of that property. How or in what proportion public property has increased we have not been told. But, taking for the basis of calculation the number of guns and the number of men, reported to us as being at New York in 1818, (and certainly there is not a more important post,) we find that, on the whole seacoast, there could not be employed more than about 1,100. But there were stationed at that time, on the whole coast, 2,408 men, which is more than double the requisite number. The navy is intended to defend our shores. As it increases, I should suppose the army might be diminished. It is now three times as large as it was in 1802, and therefore three times as competent for our defence. But yet gentlemen demand for the seacoast an army much larger than when we had little or no naval strength. They seem to think the army ought to be increased in a direct ratio with the increase of the navy. On the contrary, I think it may be lessened as the navy is increased.

In 1802, when there was no danger of Indian war in that quarter, there were between 500 and 600 men only on the whole northwestern frontier; but in 1818, after the danger had quite subsided, we had between 1,500 and 1,600. It is the first time I have known the rule of inverse proportion applied to the defence of the country; that is, when the danger was greater, a less force was deemed sufficient; but, since the danger has become less, it is now thought expedient to have a greater force. In short, sir, if we view the whole subject with reference to the danger which may threaten us, (and this is certainly the correct criterion,) we can find no use at this time for an army as large as it was in 1802. The great, perhaps the only, object of an army, in time of peace, is to preserve the public works, to keep the guns from rust, and the fortifications from decay. I hold in my hand, sir, a list of the fortifications, and the number of men necessary to be stationed in each. From it it appears that about 4,500 are amply sufficient for the whole frontier, both maritime and inland. I have seen another statement, showing that about 3,150 would answer. If these statements are incorrect, I would thank gentlemen to point out the inaccuracy. But, taking either, we find there is not the least reason for keeping the present establishment of 12,656.

Why, then, shall it not be reduced to 6,000 men, as proposed in the bill? The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) had assigned one reason in opposition to the bill, which Mr. W. said, was particularly surprising. He said, militia endangered the liberties of their country, and, to prove it, mentioned that they lost the battle at Camden, in the Revolution! But can we not prove, by exactly the same kind of argument, that regular troops, when defeated, have endangered the liberties of their country, precisely in the same manner? Examine the history of the wars which have desolated Europe for the last twenty-five years, and you will find abundant evidence of this fact. Who endangered France at the battle of Waterloo? The regular troops of France, who were defeated on that occasion. Was not the Austrian army defeated by Bonaparte at Wagram? Yes, and if my memory serves me, the Archduke Charles ordered his troops to be decimated for their cowardice in that engagement. These were regular soldiers, in whom the member from Virginia so much delights. If he had exerted his talents and industry to find evidence against regular armies, as he did against the militia, he would have been able to produce a much darker catalogue against the former than the latter. Militia, like other troops, are subject to the fortunes of war. They may be defeated; they may not in every instance act with becoming bravery; but the same objections apply to every other description of force. If militia are defeated, and thereby endanger their country, it is a misfortune from which I have shown you regular troops are not exempt. But regular troops, after they have vanquished the public enemy, turn round and subdue their own country, which is an act of great criminality. In a comparison between them, the one may be called unfortunate, while the other is highly criminal. The gentleman from South Carolina says, no danger is to be apprehended from our Army. But I ask him whether he has heard of no instances in which the civil authority has been violated by our Army, harmless as he supposes it to be? If he has not, I shall not put myself to the trouble of pointing them out to him. I will merely remark, however, that an army is dangerous, on account of its moral as well as physical force; that a Government may be destroyed by the gradual prostration of its principles, as well as by a sudden overthrow; that every nation is disposed to admit the danger of all other armies, except its own, which is commonly supposed too good even to think of any mischief; that from this delusion a nation does not often awake till it is too late to profit by the recovery of their senses.

It has been said that this measure for reducing the Army is an attack upon the fame of the Administration. No doubt, said Mr. W., the member from South Carolina has more precise information on this subject than I have. Although one or more members of the Executive department may view it in the light mentioned by the gentleman, yet I shall not believe that it is so regarded by all of them, or by the President himself. But, if it was, shall we, for that reason, be diverted from a measure we believe to be right? Or shall we, before we are at liberty to mature our judgments upon a given proposition, be required to run off to the Executive, to ascertain what is thought of it in that quarter? Sir, I hope not. The Executive knows that this House, in connexion with the Senate, make a constituent part of the Government, and certainly will not attempt to circumscribe the right we have to think and act for ourselves. Let me be convinced that a measure is right, and I shall act upon my own responsibility, without reference to any opinion which may be entertained by the Executive. Take, for example, the case before us. The country is groaning under a weight of debt and pecuniary embarrassment. There is a deficiency in the Treasury of several millions, which the gentleman from South Carolina thinks not at all alarming, although he cannot deny that we are obliged to borrow money. The people are threatened with taxes, and call aloud for help. Now, I ask, if we, their immediate representatives, shall not afford them relief, for fear it may conflict with some views of the Executive or his Cabinet? The system of economy, of which the bill before us is a part, is the best means of relief which can be adopted, and I for one will support it. Gentlemen have offered no arguments against it, which would not have applied, with equal propriety, against the reduction of the Revolutionary army, or the army at the close of the late war. The Army was made for the country, not the country for the Army. No matter how distinguished the individuals who compose it; yet, if the country does not require their service, they ought to return to private life. Thus acted the army of the Revolution. Washington, when it was no longer necessary he should use it, voluntarily surrendered his sword into the hands of Congress, from whom he received it. For this last, but greatest act, historians have ascribed to him more enviable fame, more true glory, more godlike virtue, than for every other act of his illustrious life. Is the Army now any better than it was then? Heaven forbid we should think so! Let us then follow the example of past, but wholesome times. Let us adopt this bill, and afford the people that relief from debt, from the prospect of taxation, which they have so just a right to expect.

TUESDAY, January 9.

Mr. GORHAM presented a memorial of the merchants and others of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, against any increase of the tariff of duties on imports by way of protection to the manufacturing interests of the country; which memorial was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill providing compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys in the courts of the United States, and to repeal parts of former acts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Peggy Mellen; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, who were directed, by a resolution on the 23d of November last, to inquire into the expediency of opening a military and post road from some place on the Penobscot river, in the State of Maine, to the river St. Croix, made a report thereon, adverse to the opening said road; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STORRS, from the same committee, to whom was recommitteed the bill to provide for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road, reported the same with amendment; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting statements showing the amount of expenditures at the Military Academy from the establishment thereof, in the erection of buildings and repairs; also the aggregate amount of expenses, up to the present time, for the pay and emoluments of teachers, officers, and cadets, and the number of cadets educated at said academy, &c., rendered in obedience to a resolution of the 5th ultimo; which letter and accompanying documents were ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House another letter from the Secretary of War, accompanied with a statement, showing the expenditures of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Military Establishment for the year 1820.

Ordered, That the report of the select committee, "appointed to inquire if any, and if any, what, further provision may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of the treaty made at Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan," made on the 12th of May last, be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of William Smith; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

ARREARS OF PAY, &c.—GENERAL DE KALB.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred, on the 4th of December, 1820, the petition of Elie, Baron de Kalb, knight of the royal order of military merit, and Maria Anna Carolina, of Kalb, widow Geymuller, made the following report, which was read and laid on the table:

That on the 10th of December, 1819, the petition of the said petitioners was referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims; that on the 7th of February following that committee made report thereon.

This petition being again referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, the committee have had recourse to the Treasury Department for information relating to the accounts of the Baron de Kalb, and, by a report from that Department, it appears that "the only information on the subject of his accounts during the Revolutionary war is to be found in one of the ledgers of the late office of commissioner of army accounts, preserved from the fire which destroyed the public buildings; a copy of his accounts is extracted therefrom and enclosed. There does not appear, as far as the evidence in this office affords information, that any final settlement was made of the accounts of the Baron de Kalb; and at this period, when the records have so generally been destroyed, it would be impracticable to make one with accuracy." By the account alluded to, it appears that there is a balance standing to the debit of the Baron de Kalb amounting to $234,100 70-90.

The committee further report that the petitioners appear to claim the payment of any arrears of pay which may be due to their late father. On this subject the committee observe that the large balance appearing on the books of the Treasury, and standing debited in the account of the late Baron de Kalb, goes to preclude the expectation of any arrears of pay being due to the Baron de Kalb.

The petitioners appear to claim five years' pay as being due to their late father, the Baron de Kalb. On this subject the committee observe that, on the 15th of

May, 1778, Congress unanimously resolved "that all military officers commissioned by Congress, who now are, or hereafter may be, in the service of the United States, and shall continue therein during the war, and not hold any office of profit under these States, or any of them, shall, after the conclusion of the war, be entitled to receive, annually, for the term of seven years, if they live so long, one-half of the present pay of such officers; provided that no general officer of the cavalry, artillery, or infantry, shall be entitled to receive more than one-half part of the pay of a colonel of such corps, respectively: and provided that this resolution shall not extend to any officer in the service of the United States, unless he shall have taken the oath of allegiance to, and shall actually reside within, some one of the United States." The resolution alluded to appears to be expressly intended for those officers only who, being in the service of the United States, did actually reside within some one of the United States, and did continue in the service of the United States during the war; and to the exclusion of all other officers who, although being in the service of the United States, did not actually reside within some one of the United States, or who did not continue in the service of the United States during the war. The Baron de Kalb, in the resolution of Congress of the 14th of October, 1780, is stated to be a brigadier in the armies of France. The family of the Baron de Kalb is believed to have resided, and continued to reside, in France; hence it is inferred that France was the place of his residence, and therefore that he is included within the proviso of that resolution. The resolution of Congress of the 15th of May, 1778, contains not any provision for the widows or orphans of officers who had died, or thereafter might die, in the service of the United States. On the 16th of August, 1780, the Baron de Kalb, major general in the service of the United States, in the action near Camden, in South Carolina, leading on troops of the Maryland and Delaware lines against superior numbers, and gloriously contending on behalf of the rights of mankind, was mortally wounded, and died on the 19th of that month. On the 24th of August, 1780, Congress resolved "that the resolution of the 15th of May, 1778, granting half-pay for seven years to the officers who should continue in service to the end of the war, be extended to the widows of those officers who have died, or shall hereafter die, in the service, to commence from the time of such officers' death, and continue for the term of seven years; or, if there be no widow, or in case of her death or intermarriage, the said half pay be given to the orphan children of the officer dying as aforesaid, if he shall have left any; and that it be recommended to the Legislatures of the respective States to which such officers belong to make provision for paying the same on account of the United States."

That resolution of the 24th of August, 1780, is explanatory of the resolution of 15th of May, 1778, and manifesting that that resolution was limited and confined to officers who did actually reside in some one of the United States, and not otherwise, and recommending to the several States, respectively, to make provision accordingly for the widows and orphans of officers who did reside within some one of the United States, respectively. On these resolutions of Congress it does not appear that the heirs of the Baron de Kalb can bottom any claim for five years' full pay as mentioned in their petition. By a resolution of Congress of the 21st of October, 1780, half-pay for life was granted to officers in the service of the United States, alluded to in that resolution: that resolution does not include the case of the heirs of the Baron de Kalb. On the 26th of January, 1784, Congress resolved "that half-pay cannot be allowed to any officer, or to any class or denomination of officers, to whom it has not been heretofore expressly promised." The resolutions of Congress of the 21st of October, 1780, of the 23d of March, 1783, and of the 8th of March, 1785, allowing half-pay for life, or commutation thereof for five years' full pay, do not include this case of the petitioners. Their claim for five years' pay does not appear to be included in or provided for by any act or resolution of Congress.

This committee do further report that evidence has not been adduced to prove that any arrears of pay are due to the Baron de Kalb, and that therefore his heirs, the petitioners, have not any just claim against the United States for any arrears of pay said to be due to their late father, the Baron de Kalb; that the claim of the heirs of the Baron de Kalb to the full pay of five years on account of the services of the Baron to the United States is not bottomed on any act or resolution of Congress, and is therefore inadmissible, and ought not to be allowed. By the report from the Department of the Treasury alluded to, it appears that, on reference to the register of officers of the Revolutionary army returned as entitled to land, the name of the Baron de Kalb is entitled to land, for which application is to be made to the Department of War.

This committee, after consideration of this case of the petitioners, and taking into view the circumstances attending it, are of opinion that it does not appear that any arrears of pay are due to the late Baron de Kalb, as intimated by the petitioners in their petition; that it does not appear that the petitioners, heirs of the Baron de Kalb, have any just claim against the United States for five years' pay in consequence of services by him performed to the United States; and therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners, so far as relates to their claim of any arrears of pay supposed to be due to their late father, the Baron de Kalb, and so far as relates to their claim of pay for five years in consequence of services of their late father, the Baron de Kalb, to the United States, be not granted; and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw so much of their said petition as relates to their claim for land as heirs of the Baron de Kalb, so that they may apply to the Department of War for the same.

MISSOURI.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 4th instant, in relation to the judicial condition of the Territory of Missouri.

On the question being taken, Will the House now consider the said resolution? it was determined in the negative—yeas 66, nays 78, as fol-

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. TRIMBLE; and, the same being again read, was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WHITMAN in the chair,) on the bill to reduce the Military Peace Establishment of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS, in an address of about two hours, concluded the speech which he yesterday commenced, in favor of a reduction of the Army; which speech is given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. A. SMYTH, of Virginia, then rose, and moved the following as an amendment to (substitute for) the bill under consideration:

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the first day of May next, the Military Peace Establishment of the United States shall consist of six thousand non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, in such proportions of artillery, light artillery, infantry, and riflemen, as the President of the United States shall direct.

And be it further enacted, That the corps of artillery shall consist of one colonel commandant, four lieutenant colonels, four majors, forty captains, eighty lieutenants, and eighty second lieutenants, divided into four battalions, each to consist of ten companies.

And be it further enacted, That the regiment of light artillery shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, ten captains, ten lieutenants, ten second lieutenants, divided into two battalions,
each to consist of five companies.

And be it further enacted, That the regiment of riflemen shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, ten captains, ten lieutenants, ten second lieutenants, divided into two battalions, each of five companies.

And be it further enacted, That the corps of infantry shall consist of eight colonels, eight lieutenant colonels, eight majors, eighty captains, eighty first lieutenants, eighty second lieutenants, divided into eight regiments, each to consist of ten companies.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be retained in service three brigadier generals, each of whom shall be allowed an aid-de-camp, to be taken from the subalterns of the line.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be a department of order and inspection, to consist of one adjutant and inspector general, who shall have the pay, rank, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry, as heretofore established, and of three assistant adjutants and inspectors general.

And be it further enacted, That the Quartermaster's Department shall consist of a quartermaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, two deputy quartermasters general, and sixteen assistant deputy quartermasters general. The paymaster's department shall consist of one paymaster general, and nineteen paymasters. The purchasing department shall consist of a commissary general of purchases, with a salary of two thousand dollars per annum; and one assistant commissary general of purchases, whose compensation shall not exceed two and a half per centum on the public moneys disbursed by him, nor the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, and two military storekeepers. The Subsistence Department shall consist of a commissary general with as many assistants as the service may require, to be taken from the subalterns of the line. The Medical Department shall consist of one surgeon general, one apothecary general, twenty-five surgeons, and forty-four assistant surgeons, the latter to have the pay and emoluments heretofore allowed to surgeons' mates.

And be it further enacted, That the corps of engineers shall be retained in service, and shall consist of one colonel, one assistant engineer, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, six captains, six lieutenants, and six second lieutenants; that one-half of the officers of the corps of ordnance, and one-half of the topographical engineers and their assistants, shall be retained in service.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed a judge advocate general, who shall have the pay, rank, and emoluments of a colonel of infantry, who shall keep an office in the city of Washington; and, in addition to the duties which may be assigned to him by the President of the United States, he shall keep a record of all trials by general courts martial, and report the decisions, an abridgement of which shall be published from time to time, as the President shall direct.

And be it further enacted, That all officers of the Army, whose continuance in service is not provided for by this act, shall be discharged from the service of the United States; and that, to each commissioned officer who shall be discharged by virtue of this act, there shall be paid, in addition to the pay and emoluments to which he shall be entitled at the time of his discharge, three months' pay.

On motion of Mr. CUTHBERT, the Committee then rose.

WEDNESDAY, January 10.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of James McFarland, Hampton Pankey, and William Frizell, accompanied with a bill for the relief of the said James McFarland; which was read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Pierre Denis De La Rondé, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians," made a report thereon, recommending that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; and the bill and report were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill for the promotion of internal improvements in the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey to any State or States which shall provide by law for the laying out and completion of any canal or canals within such State or States, such part of the public lands of the United States which shall be occupied by the route of any such canal or canals, and the necessary towing paths, ditches, aqueducts, locks, culverts, feeders, dams, waste weirs, or other works connected therewith: Provided, That the plan or plans of every such canal, and the works connected therewith, with its route, and an estimate and survey of such lands through which the same shall pass, shall, before the construction of the same through such lands shall be commenced, be laid before the President of the United States for his approbation, and no conveyance of any such lands shall be made until such proposed canal or canals be entirely completed and navigable for boats.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications, viz:

A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a list of American seamen registered in the several ports of the United States for the three first quarters of the year 1820; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the register of the land office for the district of Edwardsville, upon the claims exhibited under the act of the 15th of May, 1820, for the relief of the inhabitants of the village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois; which letter and report were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied with the annual statements in relation to the Navy pension fund; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the amount of drawback on merchandise exported from the United States during the years 1817, 1818, and 1819, compared with the amount of duties which accrued on the same respectively; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of the expenditure and application of the moneys drawn from the Treasury on account of the Navy, for the year ending on the 30th September, 1820, and of the unexpended balances of former appropriations remaining in the Treasury on the 1st October, 1820; which letter and statement were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the Speaker of this House was requested to inform the Executive of the State of New Jersey of the death of JOHN LINN, late one of the Representatives from said State.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for making an experiment of a machine (a model whereof is now in the office of the Commissioners of the Navy Board) for raising ships of war from the water, and placing them under cover, for repair or protection.

On motion of Mr. MEIGS, the House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Thomas Staniford, late a paymaster in the Army of the United States, praying equitable allowance for certain payments, the vouchers for which were lost by fire in New York; which report recommends that the prayer of the petitioner be rejected. The reading of the papers was going on, when, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the report was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian College in the District of Columbia," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. GROSS, of New York, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him a few days ago, the object of which is to request information from the President whether any negotiations have been made by commissioners of the United States with the Six Nations of Indians in the State of New York, &c.

Some conversation took place on the subject of this motion, between Messrs. STORRS and GROSS.

The former of these gentlemen considered the inquiry as unnecessary; the facts being, as he was informed, that the United States had no land in that State to which the Indian title was unextinguished; that, however, certain individuals had claims on such lands, under pre-emption rights granted by the State of Massachusetts; that, to extinguish the Indian title, the Executive had been requested to authorize commissioners to treat with the Indians—a request which could not reasonably be refused, and the expenses of those commissioners, and all other expenses attending the transaction, had been paid by the individuals claiming the land, &c.

To this Mr. GROSS replied, that if the gentleman had a knowledge of all the circumstances of this transaction, and there was no possibility of his being mistaken, why then, indeed, there would be no occasion for the passage of the resolution. But, as certainty with regard to the facts was the object of this resolution, the answer to which he presumed would furnish it in an official manner, he hoped it would be agreed to.

The resolve was agreed to without a division, though not without dissentient voices.

MISSOURI.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, then moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the resolution moved by him, directing the Judiciary Committee to report certain facts with regard to the present condition of Missouri, and their opinion of what legislative measures may be necessary in regard thereto.

And the question being taken by yeas and nays, on proceeding to the consideration thereof, it was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Earle, Edwards of N. REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House then having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for reducing the Military Peace Establishment—

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest faults of our Government, the best that has ever been framed by the wisdom of man, is its tendency to pursue an unsteady and changeable policy. The causes which produce this defect, at the same time form one of the strong defences of our liberty; and while enjoying the advantage which springs from them, we should guard against the danger to which they expose us. The constant succession of different men to fill the chief offices of Government, especially the incessant changes of this assembly, which springs every two years immediately from the bosom of the people, preserves us from the danger of a long continuance of unwise or corrupt measures; but the same changes subject us too much to the influence of momentary causes. There is reason to apprehend, that, forgetful of the past, and blind to the future, we shall limit our view to the circumstances of the present year. Believing that the anxiety now manifested for the reduction of the Army, has been excited by this contracted view, and that it is not justified either by the experience of the past, or the probabilities of the future, I am opposed to the passage of the bill on the table. In deciding upon it, the answer to two questions should govern us: Is the Military Establishment proposed in this bill, sufficiently large for the wants of our country? If not, are the resources of our country, not for one or for two years, but for a series of years, its average resources, adequate to the support of a larger establishment than that proposed in this bill? I believe that the Army might, with propriety, suffer some partial reduction; I see no need of retaining as many general officers as we now have; and it probably has excrescences elsewhere which might be lopped off without injury to the country; but the proposed reduction I think dangerous, and not required by the state of our finances.

Differing in my opinions from the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) I shall be constrained to take some liberties with his remarks which I hope he will pardon, as I shall do it with no unfriendly feeling. He is much offended at the late report of the Secretary of War, submitted in compliance with a resolution of this House. It is not my part at present to defend that report; and you will recollect that the Secretary does not think that the Army ought to be reduced; and that, in his report he only recommends that organization which he deems proper for a peace establishment of six thousand men. However, I will express my opinion, that the gentleman from North Carolina has not refuted the argument of the Secretary. What is that argument? That your Military Peace Establishment should be so organized as to form a preparation for a state of war. This principle is denied, in words by the gentleman from North Carolina, but it is admitted by his reasonings and conclusions, as I shall attempt to show in the course of my remarks.

In the progress of this discussion, our Government has been accused of an extravagant and wasteful expenditure of public money. I think this charge entirely unjust; and it is impossible that it can be intended by any gentleman to be applied to the present Secretary of the War Department. Under his control, that Department has been administered with a responsibility, an economy, a wisdom, which challenge a comparison with its administration at any former period.

The gentleman from North Carolina has drawn the picture of a wise and virtuous Government, under which the people are protected in their rights and enjoy the fruit of their industry. He has drawn, in like manner, the picture of an extravagant, rapacious, and oppressive Government, under whose tyranny the rights of the people are contemned, and by whose excessive burdens they are reduced to extreme want and misery. Does he design this for a portrait of our Government? Of a Government which sits so lightly on the people, which imposes not one tax, and which leaves to every citizen the entire control of his labor, and the free enjoyment of its profits? You cannot trace the likeness in a single feature: it is a perfect contrast. If he did not design it as a portrait of our Government, why did he insinuate its resemblance, and use this insinuation as an argument for the proposed reduction of our expenditures? Is he willing that his remarks should cross the Atlantic, and be quoted in foreign countries, as conveying a correct description of the character of our Government?

The gentleman from North Carolina says, that the maintenance of a standing army during peace is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution; and, to support his position, he quotes the naked, abstract proposition, that "standing armies are dangerous to liberty," not from the Constitution, but from certain declarations of rights. The framers of the Constitution felt the force of this truth, and they knew, with equal certainty, that standing armies are sometimes necessary for the defence of liberty.

To prohibit the use of this formidable but necessary instrument, would have been madness in them; and to guard against its abuse, they employed, not abstract propositions, but positive enactments. Of this character is that clause of the Constitution which prohibits the raising of armies without the consent of this House, the immediate representatives of the people, and the guardians of their liberty: and that clause which requires that bills, appropriating money, without which an army cannot be maintained, must originate in the same popular branch of the Legislature; and that clause which, distrusting the discretion even of the representatives of the people, forbids that any appropriation for that purpose shall be for more than two years. Then, maintenance of a standing army, within proper limits, is opposed neither by the letter nor the spirit of the Constitution; and is consistent with the practical exposition given to it by that gentleman himself.

He fears that the subordination necessary in an army will be dangerous to liberty; he dreads the contagious example of a soldier returning to the walks of civil life, with habits of degrading subjection to authority. And does he really dread the influence of a few individuals, for the most part ignorant and obscure, over a population of twelve or fourteen millions, spread over vast regions? You may mingle with large societies; you may pass over extensive sections of country, and not see one man who has belonged to the regular army; and does he really believe that a cause, thus trivial and limited, will be found sufficient to undermine the love of liberty, so firmly fixed in the American character?

He has expressed his fear of the physical strength of the army. Will he, on reflection, believe that an army of ten thousand men can enslave the American people? Will he say that he believes this possible? Truly the fears of that gentleman are entirely visionary; it is idle to combat them. As if conscious that the arguments which have been employed, are not sufficient to justify the proposed reduction of the army, the gentlemen who urge it have endeavored to sustain their policy by the authority of Mr. Jefferson's name. If the reputation of this enlightened and virtuous statesman, so dear to the American people, shall be injured, the fault will be attributable to the imprudence of those men who drag in his name to support a system of measures which cannot be sustained by their own merits. Has the Congress of the United States withdrawn itself from the guidance of reason, and surrendered its rights to the empire of authority? We ask not what name sanctions, but what reason justifies any measure which is proposed? If we believe it to be wise and salutary, we adopt it without caring by whom it is recommended. If we believe it to be inexpedient or improper, the authority of no name, however high, is sufficient to remove our objections to it. Then, why introduce into our discussions a name which is not needed in aid of a wise, and which cannot justify an unwise, policy? While censuring such a course of argument, I also deny that they have the authority of Mr. Jefferson for the reduction of the army, which is now under consideration. Will any one venture to say, that after a lapse of twenty years, during which the resources of our country have greatly increased, and during which it has acquired much experience, both in peace and in war, the mind of that great man alone remaining stationary, he would, under so great a change of circumstances, now pursue, in all respects, the same policy which he observed in 1801? Is any one authorized to say, that Mr. Jefferson entertains the same opinion of the administration of Mr. Monroe, which he entertained of the administration of his own predecessor? that it is wasteful, extravagant, and inclining to monarchy? that it everywhere needs retrenchment and reform? No sir; even that authority fails them on which they have sought to lean.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

The supporters of this bill think that we shall not be engaged in war for many years, and that it is unnecessary to prepare for an event which is not expected. If those gentlemen could give us an assurance that we shall not be drawn into war in less than ten or fifteen years, their policy might be safe. But, with Spanish provinces on our southwest, with English provinces on our north, with Russia erecting strong military works on our northwest, with our commerce floating on every sea, they know that we are in constant danger of collisions, which may terminate in war. Most of our military preparations look to a state of war with England; and the present internal condition of that country should not lull us into security. It is well known that the people of Great Britain participate with their Government, in their hatred of the American Republic, and is it not possible that a dexterous ministry, availing themselves of this national feeling, may attempt, by the excitements of an American war, to divert those passions which now threaten them with destruction? Or, may not that country be revolutionized? And, under a more popular and virtuous government, impelled by all the energies of a free people, would it not be more formidable than at any former period?

War is not certain; it may be improbable; but even folly may shun dangers which openly menace it, and it is the part of prudence to guard against those dangers which are more remote and less obvious. A wise statesman, prepared for every contingency, will not carry his plans of economy so far as to leave his country exposed to the hazards of an unequal contest, to the losses of treasure, of honor, and of men, which she must suffer if drawn into a war for which she is unprovided. To a certain extent, the advocates of the bill agree to this proposition; they all acknowledge that we ought to have garrisons of regular soldiers in our fortresses. During the last war, when the fleets of the enemy occupied our harbors, and threatened our wealthy cities, when, for the want of adequate fortifications, we were constrained to call to their defence great numbers of militia, exposing them to the fatal ravages of a sickly climate, to which they were not inured, every one felt the necessity of erecting strong fortresses in situations proper for the defence of these harbors and cities. With universal approbation, this plan was adopted; many of these works are now completed, and others are in progress. If we have fortresses, it is necessary to garrison them with men who know how to defend them. Nations about to engage in hostilities are not restrained by a punctilious sense of justice. Should we, omitting this precaution, have a dispute with a nation disposed to engage in war with us, it might determine to anticipate us, to strike the first blow, to seize our empty fortresses. Remember the attack on Copenhagen! What would then be the fate of our cities? I do not think that our fortresses should have full garrisons during peace; I would keep in them only a sufficient number of disciplined soldiers to defend them against a sudden attack. When the occasion requires, you may reinforce them with militia, who, mingling with the regulars, would be able to make an efficient defence. In like manner, a part of our force must be employed to guard our Indian frontier, and prevent the hostilities of our savage neighbors. In this employment of our troops, the advocates of the bill agree with us. But I go one step further; and, in doing so, I draw on myself the terrible denunciation of the gentleman from North Carolina. We need a body of men who will serve as a depository of military science, and from whom correct discipline may be rapidly infused into a new army. Our troops in garrison cannot perform this service; because, if they are needed in the fortresses during peace, they cannot be withdrawn from them while we are engaged in war. For this purpose, we shall need a distinct force, in addition to the six thousand men who, almost all agree, should be retained in our fortresses. This part of our system is denounced as anti-republican by the gentleman from North Carolina. Why? Because our army would thus, during peace, be employed, as a preparation for a state of war. I ask him, for what purpose does he acknowledge that our garrisons should be retained, unless as a preparation for a state of war? For what other purpose does he consent to retain any portion of the standing army? He is caught in his own denunciation. It comprehends the great man to whose authority he appealed; for he, too, recommended a standing army.

In declaring that those who advocate this system, renounce republican principles, he seems not to have reflected that, under arbitrary government, the Army may be employed during peace for other purposes, to support unjust authority, to enforce oppression, decrees to extort ruinous taxes; and that, in a free Government, the only legitimate use of an army during peace is, to prepare for a state of war. I would retort on him the charge of renouncing republican principles, did I believe that he had understood the character of his own doctrines.

But, it is said, that in future wars, our battles must be fought on the ocean, and that we ought to avoid a contest on the land. Will this be left to our choice? We should most diligently prepare a strong naval force for the defence of our shores and our commerce. But, in a war with England, she will not leave her Canadian provinces without defence, to become an easy conquest to us. She will send an army to Canada. If we are unprepared to encounter this army, will she courteously keep it on her own territory? Will she not prefer making our territory the seat of hostilities, and inflicting on our citizens the calamities of war? This was her policy in the last, and this will be her policy in any future war. If we are not prepared to encounter her army on the Canadian frontier, we shall feel its attacks in the bosom of our country. But, the advocates of this bill believe that the militia may be relied on to fight our battles, and defend our country on the land. Far be it from me to speak contemptuously of the militia; they are the people of our country, our fellow-citizens, and our brethren. I believe that they have an intelligence, a courage, a spirit of enterprise, a sense of honor, and love of country, which, with proper experience and instruction, would make them the best soldiers in the world. But they want this instruction and experience; and all history teaches us that troops wanting these, cannot succeed against disciplined soldiers. Sometimes, from the superior talents of their officers, or the superiority of their numbers, and sometimes from that heroic courage which liberty inspires, they may obtain brilliant victories. But far, very far more frequently they suffer disgrace and defeat when opposed to regulars. I know that some gentlemen in this House presume to censure us for holding such language; but is it not true? And is the fault ours that it is true? And is it wise to close our eyes against the truth? The experience of the past teaches us this painful lesson, and a little reflection would convince us that it always must be so. Suppose that our General, commanding undisciplined soldiers, such as a very large proportion of our militia always have been, and I fear always will be during the first two or three campaigns of a war, is opposed to a General commanding an army of regulars. In our camp all is imperfect, all is to be learnt. The mind of the General is occupied by all the cares of camp-police. There is frequent neglect of the regulations and habits, which are necessary to prevent waste, to preserve the health of the army, to guard it against surprise. In the hostile camp, that military police, so essential to the welfare of the army, is already established, the mind of the General is left at liberty to revolve and prepare his plans of march and of battle; his army is always ready for attack or defence. Is it wise to send our armies to the contest under such disadvantages? Suppose the armies arrayed in the field of battle. The enemy, in manœuvring, exposes a weak point, on which our General determines to make a decisive attack; he orders a column to be formed on a certain point with instructions to advance. His orders are slowly and imperfectly obeyed; the movements of his soldiers are confused and tumultuous; half an hour is occupied in forming a column, which should have been formed in half that time. The enemy perceives the manœuvre, has time to reinforce his weak point, and the precious opportunity of victory is lost by the want of discipline in our army. From the very nature of things the General of our undisciplined troops, whether militia, or new untrained levies, can but seldom gain a victory. And they are as illy prepared to defend themselves.

Suppose the hostile army to make an unexpected movement on our flank. To oppose him, it is necessary rapidly to form a new line. For this purpose our General issues orders. The enemy approaches with a steady line, and on our part all is confusion and tumult. Our soldiers, wanting discipline, here crowd together, and embarrass each other; there they leave an open space for the enemy to penetrate. An army thus assailed will abandon the field; or, if it resists, it must be slaughtered. In the early campaigns of a war we cannot prudently rely on the militia, and it is inhuman to lead them to a contest in which such decisive advantages are found on the side of the enemy. But it is said that, in peace, our regulars cannot learn the art of war, and that at the commencement of hostilities they will not be better prepared for the field than our militia. The gentlemen who expressed this opinion seem not to have remembered that there are two branches of tactics, entirely distinct. The one comprehends those principles which should guide a General in choosing the route of his march, in forming the plans of his campaigns and his battles. The camp of a Peace Establishment furnishes no peculiar advantages for the acquisition of this branch of military science—exhibits no field for its exercise and application. I believe that, retaining only one General on our Peace Establishment, we should be as well prepared for war as with our present complement. The other branch of tactics includes the knowledge and practice of those regulations which form the police of an army, and insure its order and subordination, its health and its vigilance, and of those evolutions which prepare it for every movement on the field, and make it a perfect machine in the hands of the General. This part of military science is as easily acquired and perfected in peace as in war. In this our small army, retained in peace, should be perfect. The principles which I advocate do not require the maintenance, in peace, of an army sufficiently large for a state of war; they demand only a few thousand men in addition to the troops necessary for our garrisons. Then, sir, when we are engaged in war, as at some future time we certainly shall be, when we are compelled to raise a larger army, by mingling our veterans with our new levies, we may engage in an equal contest with older armies. In every subdivision, in every section of the new army, we may place some disciplined soldiers, whose instructions, and example, and guidance, will rapidly perfect its discipline, infusing into it subordination and vigilance in camp, with skill and steadiness in the field. But, by passing the bill under consideration, we shall deprive our country of this resource; by pursuing this rash policy, we will force her, when engaged in war, to rely on undisciplined troops; we will decide that, in the first campaigns, she shall be inferior in military skill; we will expose her to the hazard of the incalculable losses of treasure, of territory, of honor, and of life, which are the consequences of this inferiority. Such is the economy of this bill!

The friends of this bill say, that the deficiency in our revenue imposes on us the necessity of retrenchment, whether that retrenchment be in itself salutary or pernicious. And is this youthful nation already sinking under the decrepitude of old age? Are her resources so exhausted that she can no longer maintain those establishments which are necessary to her welfare? I think that when some documents, expected from the Treasury Department, are received, and the subject shall have been fully examined, it will appear that the deficiency for the present year is but small; and calculations from both sides of the House agree, that, in one or two years, the revenue arising from imposts will be adequate to the maintenance of our establishments on their present scale. But grant, for a moment, that these expectations should be disappointed, have we no other resource? Those gentlemen shrink from the policy of imposing taxes. Why? Out of tenderness for the people? Because they will not take the money of the people? I ask them whose is the money derived from imposts which they are so willing to receive? Is it not drawn from the people? And is it their principle to take the money of the people, in order to defray the expenses of the Government, as long as they can keep the operation concealed from their constituents? They gladly receive, and freely spend, fifteen, eighteen, twenty-five millions annually, when it can be drained from the people by imposts. This is ample proof that their reluctance to impose taxes arises not from any peculiar tenderness for the people. I do not believe that they intend to deceive, but their conduct bears that aspect. I would pursue a more open and candid course. I would say to our fellow-citizens, "we 'will pursue the most rigid economy that is consistent with the public welfare; we will impose on you no unnecessary burdens, but the institutions of our Government cannot with safety be impaired. The revenue derived from customs, by which principally the Government is supported, is furnished by you; but our commerce now languishes, our revenue is diminished; it is necessary that you should supply its deficiency, in order to maintain those establishments which are essential to the prosperity of our country." The people would be gratified by our confidence; their patriotism would be roused by our call; for they are ever ready to maintain their Government, when not misled by timid politicians, or designing candidates for office. To deny this, would be to dishonor them, to believe them devoid of patriotism, lost to honor, the miserable slaves of a blind and sordid avarice.

I repeat it—should our customs be permanently inadequate to the support of the Government, I would make an appeal to the patriotism of the people; and that appeal would be heard. But there is no such permanent deficiency; apply the calculations of all parties to a series of years, and, without any change of system, we shall find our average annual revenue sufficient to maintain all of the establishments of the Government on their present scale, and to progress with the gradual extinction of the public debt.

Then, sir, in our finances there is no such failure as would impose on us the necessity of lopping off a portion of the army, which we cannot safely spare. Prudence admonishes us to keep garrisons in our fortresses, and to preserve an additional corps to be the depository of military science, and to serve as instructors, and examples, and guides, to our militia and new levies, in any future war. For these purposes a peace establishment of 6,000 men is not sufficient.

Mr. FISHER, of North Carolina, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate have taken a wide survey of the subject, discussing it as well in detail as on general principles. Should I be led by their example into the same latitude of remark, I can, nevertheless, promise that I will not harass the Committee with a very long speech. The question for reducing the present Military Establishment is not a new one, but not the less important on that account. My worthy colleague, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) has, on several occasions, brought this subject before Congress, and, heretofore, always without success. The army, some how or other, has grown up under his opposition, and flourished under his speeches; but I hope a season has now come more favorable to its reduction.

The first argument that I shall urge for reducing this establishment will be drawn from the present state of the finances of the country. Sir, we have reached that period in our history, when the ordinary revenues of the country are insufficient to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government. This must arise either from imperfection in the system providing the revenue, or from defects in the system expending it. Be it chargeable to either, it equally merits serious inquiry and speedy correction. I pretend not to be deeply learned in the science of finance; but it does not require much sagacity to discover that the finances of this Government are in a declining and dilapidated condition; and that there are only three alternatives set before us, by which to supply the deficiency in the Treasury. 1st. By loans; 2d. By imposing taxes; and, 3d. By retrenchment and economy. The question is, to which of these alternatives shall we resort? Shall we go on as we have begun, with the borrowing system, making loans after loans, as long as we can obtain them? For one, I think not. The readiness with which capitalists lend their surplus funds to the Government is no inducement why we should borrow them. Sir, the facility of obtaining money on credit is one of the most unfortunate and seductive temptations that can be held out either to individuals or to Governments. If any proof of this position is required, we need only look to the history of this country for the past four or five years. What man of extravagant habits will forego his gratifications, and give over his projects, when he can obtain money on credit merely by asking for it? What set of office-holders will willingly give up their snug berths when they can retain them by borrowing money at five per cent.? But, as the individual who is always borrowing will soon come to bankruptcy and ruin, so the Government that draws its revenues from loans must sooner or later reach the period of taxation and oppression. Loans are but temporary expedients, and should never be resorted to but in cases of extreme emergency, and then only in anticipation of the ordinary revenues of the country. Is this our case? Is there, at this time, any such emergencies pressing upon us? Certainly not. In times of profound peace we resort to loans, and for what purpose? To meet the ordinary, the regular and every day expenses of the Government.

Sir, to what will all this lead? It will lead to a large national debt, and then, as an inevitable consequence, to oppressive taxes. Do gentlemen consider the operation of these loans? That every loan only increases the necessity for another, at least in the ratio of the preceding loan? As an example: for the last year we authorized a loan of three millions of dollars: we are told that a loan of seven millions must be made for this year; and, for aught I can see in our affairs, a loan of five millions at least will be required for each of the remaining years of the present Administration—making in all twenty-five millions. That much for principal; but at the end of that time, it will be found that the debt contracted during the five last years of the present Administration, will be within a fraction of thirty millions. Again: at the last session we directed a loan of three millions of dollars; but, from the Secretary's report, it appears that only two millions five hundred and forty-five thousand four hundred and thirty-one dollars have been received into the Treasury; so that we are actually paying interest on three millions, when only about two millions and a half and a fraction has been received to the use of Government. I only mention this, to show how profitable loans are, even on the favorable terms of five per cent.

Sir, as well might you expect to quench thirst in dropsy, by drinking, as to restore your finances to a sound state by loans: every draught only increases the want of another. There is no end to this borrowing system; it is like the clue of Ariadne, the further you pursue it, the deeper it involves you in the inextricable labyrinth. We have the awful example of England before us, and we ought to profit by that example. What is it but the great national debt that presses down to misery and wretchedness the people of that country? A debt, the bare interest of which swallows up the greater portion of the revenues of that Government: a debt, for the payment of the interest of which, the people are taxed literally from the crowns of their head to the soles of their feet. And, sir, let me here remark, that the national debt of England, as is indeed the debts of all the other States of Europe, were incurred principally by the military establishments of these States, first, from keeping up, in times of peace, standing armies unnecessarily large, and, next, from the wars carried on with those armies. It is not hazardous much, to say, that at least two-thirds of the revenue of every Government in Europe is consumed by the army, or by persons connected either directly or indirectly with the military.

We see, then, the consequence of loans. They only put off the evil day, which, when it does come, we will feel only the heavier, by the previous procrastination. But, sir, the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in his speech the other day, tells us not to be alarmed; that the condition of our finances is not so bad as we fancy; and, he kindly consoled us by promising better times. I always listen with great pleasure to the speeches of that gentleman, for he always speaks good sense; he always gives us facts and reason; but, however much I may value the information he imparts, I cannot think that his calculations are always infallible. Sir, I distinctly recollect that the gentleman at the last session promised us better times; and I leave it to members to say, if his predictions have been verified. But, sir, that gentleman is not the only person that has been deceived in his hopes and mistaken in his calculations. Even the Secretary of the Treasury himself has now and then fallen into an error. Sir, not a year since the present incumbent came into office, he gave his estimates of the revenue come within two millions of the mark; sometimes exceeding, and sometimes falling short by that amount.

In his annual report for 1818, he says that the revenue of that year may be considered as the "average amount which will be annually received;" this amount was about twenty-six millions; but, we find that the revenue of the very next year, (1819,) fell short of that estimate by about two millions of dollars—that the revenue for 1820 fell short by a still larger sum. Even, sir, in ordinary calculations, we find that mistakes may sometimes be made. The Secretary, in his report of fourth

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

December last, informs us that the deficit for the present year will be about seven millions and nearly a half of dollars; but, in his supplemental report of the 20th of the same month, he says that the deficiency is only about four millions six hundred and fifty-eight thousand dollars: thus making a difference between the two reports of two millions seven hundred and ninety-three thousand dollars. But, a worthy gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SIMKINS) gives us to understand that there are a few more errors still behind: and a gentleman from Pennsylvania has dropped a hint more consoling than all the rest. He tells us it will be found that the deficit of the past year is only about six hundred thousand dollars. Which of these ingenious financiers will prove right it is rather difficult to say: but, from the Secretary's report, one thing is plain, viz: that our finances are in a declining state, while the expenditures of the Government remain stationary. Take the years 1819, 1820, and 1821, and there is a falling off of about four millions annually.

Sir, I make these remarks not in disparagement of any gentleman, but merely to show how little reliance ought to be placed upon calculations of the revenue of years yet to come. Our revenue is principally drawn from commerce—our commerce depends upon the state of the world, and who can say what that will be a short time hence? No, sir, there is no dependence to be placed on these calculations for better times: if we sit here waiting for better times we may wait until ruin tumbles about our heads. But, gentlemen may say, if you will not wait for the flowing of the waters, and in the mean time supply our wants by loans, what will you do? Will you resort to the next alternative and lay taxes? Sir, this question of taxation is a very trying one; it comes home to the feelings of gentlemen. Now, although I do not claim to possess more independence than other gentlemen, yet I am bold to say, that if there is no other alternative, I would prefer a gentle system of taxation to this everlasting, still beginning, and never ending business of making loans upon loans until the resources of the country will be absorbed in the payment of bare interest: but, there is another alternative, and until that is tried and found wanting, I for one will not consent to impose taxes. This alternative consists in the reduction of useless establishments, in retrenchments of unnecessary expenditures, and, in a word, in bringing the expenses of the Government within the means of the country. Sir, in making these remarks, I would not be understood as casting the smallest censure on any department of the Executive: the burden of censure must fall upon us and our predecessors. We pass the laws requiring these expenditures, and the Executive only carries into operation what we authorize. The natural tendency of all Governments is to run into extravagance. That our Government runs powerfully in this direction cannot be denied; and that the late war, by requiring many extraordinary exertions, accelerated this tendency, is equally evident; but, the exigencies requiring these efforts have ceased to exist, and the expenses incident thereto should also cease. I do not hesitate to say that at the close of the late war it was right to fix the Peace Establishment upon the present organization. It was right on two considerations; first, because our situation with the Indians was extremely precarious; secondly, our relations with Spain were then unsettled. But, our Indian wars are now over, and we are at peace with every tribe: our relations with Spain are now settled, and we have Florida by the ratification of the treaty. The chief causes for fixing the army on its present basis being removed, I must think that it may with safety be reduced to six thousand men.

Sir, in the course of the debate, several gentlemen have made allusions to Mr. Jefferson's Administration. I will briefly refer to the same period of our history. Let it here be remembered that the second President of the United States, together with his political friends, were ejected from power for certain obnoxious measures; and let it be further remembered that one of those measures was the keeping up a standing army in time of peace. The newspapers of the day were filled with essays against the army; the Legislatures of the States remonstrated and instructed their members to urge its reduction. And, sir, how large was the army that created all this alarm? Only 5,000 men; only half as large as the present Peace Establishment, and yet the people of that day thought it too large; even Mr. Jefferson entertained the same opinion, for, in his first Message to Congress, he tells them that he has supplied all the garrisons with men, and that there is a surplus left for which the Government has no use; and accordingly we see the army cut down from 5,000 to about 3,300 men, thus saving to the nation annually the sum of $522,000. Yes, sir, the Peace Establishment of that day consisted only of 3,300 men, and only cost about one million of dollars annually. Now, sir, contrast that with the present army, consisting of 10,000 men. Two Major Generals, four Brigadier Generals, with aids, Colonels, Lieutenant Colonels, Majors, and inferior officers in the greatest abundance, costing annually more than three millions of dollars.

Let me ask, what wonderful changes have taken place in our affairs, to justify this great increase of the Peace Establishment? The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SIMKINS) tells us, indeed, that our frontiers have considerably enlarged in their extent, and that the number of our posts have multiplied. This is all true, and I will answer the gentleman by simply asking him, have our frontiers enlarged in the proportion of ten to three, and have our posts increased in the same ratio? Surely not. We are at peace with the savages, with the world; and if it is said we shall have Florida to occupy, I will answer that Mr. Jefferson, with his three thousand men, took possession of, and occupied, Louisiana, a country of many times the extent, and a thousand times the value, of Florida, and that, too, where there was much greater disaffection than will be found in Florida. Then, sir, I come to this conclusion: if 3,300 men were sufficient for the purposes of the country in 1803, surely double that number will answer for the present times. By fixing the Peace Establishment at six thousand men, we save to the nation more than one million of dollars annually, and send to the plough four thousand citizens. But I have other, and, to my mind, even weightier reasons than those of economy, in favor of reducing the present large standing army of the country.

Sir, in the early days of our Government, (and I believe the time will come when those days will be celebrated by historians, and sung by poets, as the golden age of this Republic,) in those days it was held that standing armies were dangerous in times of peace; not dangerous, as some gentlemen would suppose us to mean, from their physical force. No, sir; we are not so timid as to fear that the country has any thing to apprehend from the swords and bayonets of the army, were it even much larger than it is; but dangerous from their moral and political tendency to corruption. My colleague, who has gone before me in this debate, has so fully shown the immoral tendency of standing armies, that I shall not dwell long upon this part of the argument.

Sir, the military establishment, in all Governments, and, above all, in our Government, is essentially different from the civil establishment. The army is a body of men separated and removed from the great mass of the people. They are governed by different laws and upon different principles. Blind obedience to the will of their officers is their only principle. On the part of the soldier, this begets a spirit of servility; on the part of the officer, a spirit of overbearing tyranny—both equally averse to the theory and practice of our Government. In this point of view, standing armies are great evils in our country, and, like all other evils, we should have as little of them as possible. The absolute necessity of the case should be the rule by which to regulate the size of the army; if we can garrison our posts with 6,000 men, why have more than that number? I say, garrison our posts; for the idea of defending the country with a standing army is preposterous. The Constitution never contemplated such a defence, nor did it ever enter into the heads of our political forefathers. The militia is the legitimate, the Constitutional defence of the country. Sir, I was shocked to hear the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH) deliver the sentiments he did upon this subject. If ever his notions of the militia become the prevailing ones of this people, good bye to your Republican institutions—they are gone forever. But his argument is entirely fallacious. In speaking of the militia, he has taken them, as they were, at the beginning of the Revolutionary war, and all the extracts that he read from the letters of WASHINGTON and others, describe the militia as they then were—without order or previous discipline. This is unjust, sir. We should consider what the militia are capable of being made, and not what they were before we existed as a nation—before we became an independent people. This is the light in which WASHINGTON viewed the militia when he said, "The militia may be trained to a degree of energy equal to every military exigency of the United States;" and Jefferson says: "A well disciplined militia is our best reliance in peace, and for the first moments in war, till regulars may relieve them."

But, sir, the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia have been so fully refuted by the venerable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) that I shall add nothing further upon that, but proceed to another part of the question.

Sir, standing armies have a political tendency subversive of the principles of our Government. I lay this down as a proposition—in the proportion in which a Government keeps up a large military establishment, in that proportion will the Government neglect the militia of the country. This is a proposition which the history of all free Governments that ever existed fully proves. Let but a Government, let but the people, once place their reliance on standing armies for defence and protection, and the militia, as a natural, as a certain consequence, will fall into neglect, and sink into disrepute. It is plain that, when nothing is expected from them, they will expect to do nothing. Their ability is distrusted, their enterprise is gone. Yes, sir, standing armies weaken the military spirit of a nation. If any illustration of this principle is required, it can be furnished from English history. It was in the reign of the Second James that a standing army was first established in that country. This monarch, under various pretences, formed a standing army of four thousand five hundred men. This was the nucleus of the English standing army; it soon grew larger, and we now see what it is; and, mark it! at the very time at which we date the origin of standing armies in England, at that very time we may also date the decline of the militia; and, sir, it is a striking circumstance, that the very same arguments used by James and his Ministry, to justify their armed force in time of peace, are now urged by gentlemen on this floor in defence of the present establishment, namely, that the militia are inefficient, and that no reliance can be placed upon them. This, then, being the practical tendency of standing armies, I ask, if it is proper, in times of peace, to keep up a single company more than the absolute necessity of the country demands?

But, sir, I have another objection against the present size of the Peace Establishment. We should never enlarge the army beyond what necessity strictly requires, for the reason that it increases the patronage of the Government; it extends the influence of the Executive branch. The patronage of this Government, I admit, is small, compared to that of other Governments, but yet its increase is alarming. Look at the progress of patronage in this Government for the past twelve years; turn over your laws, and examine them, and it will be found that not a year has gone by, not a Congress has passed over, but the powers of the Executive have been enlarged. Indeed, it would seem that all the powers of the States are passing into the hands of Congress, and many of the powers of Congress into the hands of the Executive. The army adds to this patronage. The

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

President is Commander-in-Chief of the Army; he virtually has the appointment of all the officers; he, at pleasure, has the power of removing them. He and the head of the War Department are the only persons seen by the army; Congress is never seen, until first felt by some law.

Patronage is power. See what it does in Great Britain; what a mighty machine in the hands of that Government! And, whenever corruption dims the glory of our institutions, it will enter in at the door of patronage. If, then, we value our republican privileges, guard against the increase of Executive patronage.

Again: I will advance another objection against large military establishments. To keep up a large army necessarily requires to have at the head of the army great military chieftains. Now, these chieftains, commanding the army, may at times have the power to involve the country in difficulties and war. The chiefs of armies are generally men of great influence and popularity in the Government, and it may so happen that they themselves may not only violate the Constitution and laws of the country, but, by their influence, bring the Government to support and protect them in this violation. History furnishes examples to support this view. I think gentlemen will remember what happened a year or two since, when our army, led perhaps by the military science so much talked of, entered into a neighboring province, not only without orders, but plainly contrary to orders, and, what is worse than all, contrary to the Constitution of the country. I need not recall to the minds of gentlemen the excitement produced on the occasion, not only in this House, but in many parts of the country.

There are other cases in point, but I shall only adduce one more, in support of the proposition; and for this one I am indebted to the annals of England—a country from which we draw so many of our good and bad examples. Sir, those anywise conversant with English history will remember the long wars that were waged by that nation against the Continent during the reign of Queen Anne. It is now known that these wars might have been terminated long before they were, but for the intrigues of the Commander-in-Chief of the British forces. Peace would at once have deprived him of his emoluments, and cut short his career of glory. He determined, therefore, to continue the war, though the treasures and blood of his country might flow in torrents. This commander, sir, was the great Duke of Marlborough.

But this is not all. The chiefs of the army are always apt to take a part in the civil disputes of the country; and let it be remembered that the soldiery always take the side espoused by their commanders. Sir, how many civil disputes have been decided by the army? In England, we see Cromwell, with a force not three times as large as our present army, drive the Parliament out of doors, overturn the Constitution, and set himself quietly on the throne. We see Gustavus, of Sweden, with a less army than ours, subvert the Constitution, and establish a new order of things. And, sir, how long is it since a handful of guards in Russia murdered their King, and made Catharine their Empress? In short, look to the seat of an ancient Republic, the master State of the world, and say, from Cæsar down, how many Emperors were made, how many destroyed, by the prætorian bands—the standing army of Rome? All this shows what may be expected of standing armies, what they have done, and always will do.

I will now briefly consider some of the arguments advanced in favor of keeping up the present establishment.

First, it is said to be necessary to preserve the present Army for the purpose of keeping alive the military science of the country. This is a favorite argument of gentlemen, and, I fear, we, who doubt its great force, subject ourselves to the imputation of ignorance and illiberality. Be that as it may, I rejoice that we do not live under a military government, and that it is not our interest to have a great deal of this military science. The best method, in my humble judgment, to preserve this science, is to diffuse it among the militia. Organize them; look to their discipline; put arms in their hands, and let them see that the country relies on them for defence. Do this, sir, and when the voice of the country calls, it will be heard. When military spirits are wanting, they will arise—they will spring from every corner of the country. Sir, I would ask, whence came your best Generals in the late war?—your Jackson and your Brown? They were not educated in a standing army; they issued from the walks of civil life; and, it is worthy of remark, that the first laurels that crowned their brows were won with the bayonets of the militia.

Sir, the Secretary of War has laid before us a very able defence of the present establishment. He certainly has placed the subject in its strongest lights. But, it appears to me, before we yield to the full extent of his reasoning, we must admit two hypotheses—first, that war is not distant; and, secondly, that when it does come, it will come upon us suddenly. Now I apprehend that neither of these suppositions should be taken for granted. We see no immediate prospect of war; our political horizon is without a speck; the only little cloud that appeared in it, has been swept away by the ratification of the treaty. And, in the next place, whenever war does come, it will not come upon the nation suddenly. In other Governments, where the war-making power is lodged in the hands of kings and ministers, war may be declared unexpectedly to the country; but here there must first be a sufficient cause of war; negotiation must fail; the whole nation must see and feel the necessity of war; and surely in this time a wise Government and prudent Congress will have sufficient time to make ample preparations. There are two things that this Government will never do, until impelled to them by the public sense: to declare war, and to impose taxes.

Sir, I have always thought, that one of the best features in our Government is its unfitness for war; this very unfitness for belligerent operations will save the country from many wars and preserve much blood and treasure. It cannot be denied that a nation, combining the political facilities of war, is much easier propelled to that state than one not calculated to carry on wars. It is with Governments as it is with individuals—give them power, and they will soon find pretences for the exercise of that power. Frederick of Prussia has furnished us an illustration in point; he candidly avows that one of his leading inducements for declaring war against Maria Theresa, was the martial appearance of his fine army—for, said he, "I had a mind to play upon the instrument which I found in such excellent tune." This King has written another sentiment, that should be well remembered by every member of this House; which should be inscribed in glaring letters over the doors of the War Office, "Great armies render governments enterprising, but they make the people slaves."

But, as an argument to preserve the present Army, gentlemen have attributed all the disasters of the late war to the reduction of the Peace Establishment in 1802. This is a view of the subject to which I will not consent. I deny that the reduction of the army in 1802 was the cause of these disasters. There are plainer causes, some of which I will name. First, a want of correct knowledge of the resources of the enemy, and of the difficulties of the enterprise against Canada. The Congress declaring the war, if we judge from their speeches, thought the capture of Canada would be a mere frolic; that a few regiments of militia would take it in six weeks; in fact, so misinformed were they of the dispositions of the Canadians, and the resources of the enemy there, as to make disappointment and discomfiture inevitable.

A second cause of these disasters, was owing to treachery, or something very like it, in the commander that moved the first army towards Canada. This failure set the current of fortune against us, and at once gave confidence to the enemy, and cause of accusation to the opposition among ourselves.

But, sir, the great cause of the disasters of the late war was the want of union among ourselves; in our councils, in the nation. A formidable minority in the country doubted the justice and propriety of the war; and they used every means to shackle the powers and energies of the Government, and to prevent its prosecution. No war or great enterprise can ever be successfully conducted by this Government when the nation is divided among themselves. Disunion paralyzes all our energies. To prove that this was the fruitful source of the disasters of the late war, we have only to look to the theatre where they occurred. In the South, where there was no difference of opinion among the people as to the propriety of the war, our failures were few. From the woods of Talladega to the battle of New Orleans success and victory crowned our arms. But come here, in the very focus of discord; go to the North, where treason stalked abroad, and you see defeat and disgrace rise up before you at every turn.

And, sir, another cause of our failures was the treason of our citizens on the frontier, who gave every aid and comfort to the enemy, as well as speedy information of all our movements. Among these may be placed the blue-light traitors. And, let me not forget another class, who by their conduct shackled our efforts and gave hopes to the enemy. I mean, sir, that class of politicians who, about the close of the war, concentrated in the Hartford Convention; a set of men that should never be forgotten; on whom should fall the lasting imprecations of posterity; on whom should rest "the curses of hate, and hisses of scorn" of all who love their country. These, sir, are the causes of the disasters of the late war, and not as gentlemen would suppose the reduction of the Army in 1802, or its bad organization in 1808.

Again, the gentleman from South Carolina has called in, as an argument, the examples and situation of Europe; that our Army is nothing compared to the establishments of the Governments of Europe. Sir, I deny that the examples of Europe, in this particular, should have any influence upon us; because there is no similarity in our situation and that of any Government in Europe.

The Governments of Europe keep up large standing armies for two purposes. First, to keep down their own subjects. What but a standing army prevents the people of England from reforming the abuses of their Government? What but a standing army keeps Louis XVIII on the throne of France? All the legitimates are supported on their thrones but by the bayonets of their armies. But this is not the case in our blessed land. Our rulers hold their seats by the free suffrages of the people, and no army is necessary to keep down the people.

In the second place, the Governments of Europe keep up large standing armies to repel foreign invasion. Every kingdom in Europe has powerful neighbors, separated only by a river, a hill, or an ideal line. They have reason to look at each other with distrust and suspicion, and wisdom and past experience warns them always to be ready. Take for example the kingdom of Prussia, with the immense front of Russia pressing on one side of her frontier, France looking over on another, and the German empire on a third, her natural attitude is that of defence, and her only defence is a standing army. She must keep up a strong military force because her neighbors do so. The same may be said of all the other Governments of Europe, for in reality that continent presents rather the appearances of war than of peace. This is not our case; we have no fears of sudden invasion. If we pursue the true American policy, keeping clear of all foreign entanglements, we will require no standing armies to defend us from invasion. But the gentleman from South Carolina says we know not how soon our foreign commerce may be cut up. Admit, for the sake of argument, that it is cut up to morrow, and I should like to learn from him how he proposes to defend our foreign commerce with a standing army. Our commerce is on the ocean, and if any enemy strikes at it on that element, how will you reach him on the mountain wave? Surely not with the Army, but with our glorious little Navy. And here, by the way, permit me to observe, that the Navy is our proper and only efficient defence against attacks from abroad; and I, for one, will not consent to touch even a cockboat of the Navy, if, by doing so, we weaken the force of that defence. Sir, while your soldiers are demoralizing in camp, the tars of the Navy are exercised on the rough bosom of the ocean, and purified by the winds of Heaven.

Mr. Chairman, I have already detained you longer than I could have wished, but, before I sit down, I must express my dissent from some of the remarks of my coadjutor and colleague, (Mr. WILLIAMS.) Although I do not entirely agree with the results of the report of the Secretary of War, yet I cannot by any means think of that report as lightly, and with the same feelings, as does my colleague. On the contrary, it seems to me that his strictures were very illy bestowed. The report, in my humble opinion, is not only highly creditable to the distinguished gentlemen that produced it, but it is the ablest defence of the present establishment that I have seen, or expect to hear in this House. As for the lameness of any figures of speech used by the Secretary to illustrate his reasoning, I profess no skill in that way, nor do I think that this floor is a proper place for exhibitions in the art of hypercriticism. Notwithstanding I cannot agree with the opinion of the Secretary, as regards the proper organization of the Peace Establishment, I am impelled by feelings of justice to say, that his course, on this occasion, as in the whole of his political career, so far as I am capable of judging, has been that of the fearless politician and the enlightened statesman. How does the case stand? We called upon him for a report upon the subject of reducing the Army, and he has frankly given us his best lights and ablest views. Because we differ from him in opinion, would it be just in him to accuse us of motives other than those for the public good? Because he differs from us, what right have we to suspect his motives to be less pure than our own? Sir, it is uncharitable. He cannot possibly have any selfish views; the reduction of the Army can neither take from his scanty emoluments or lessen his honors. He can have no other feelings on the occasion than those of a public man. I then, sir, extremely regret that my worthy colleague should have betrayed so much feeling in the course of his speech. I regret it on two accounts: First, because it lessens the merits of the speech itself, in other respects very able; and, secondly, it gives to the world, always too censorious, some grounds to attribute his conduct, on this occasion, to other motives than those for the public good.

However we may differ from one another, or from the Executive, on any occasions, surely courtesy, if nothing else, should make us assign to them motives as pure and as disinterested as our own.

When Mr. FISHER concluded—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made some explanatory remarks, and Mr. BALDWIN spoke at large against the bill.

The Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 11.

Mr. LOWNDES presented three memorials of the Senate and House of Representatives of Missouri; one praying that the purchasers of public lands may be permitted to apply the payments already made to such of their entries as the said payments will cover at two dollars per acre, relinquishing the residue of the land to the United States; another, praying that persons entitled to the right of pre-emption, in the purchase of public lands, may be permitted to make payments for said lands within the times heretofore prescribed by law, or prompt payment, at the option of the person holding such pre-emption right; the other praying that the right of pre-emption, in the purchase of public lands, may be extended to certain settlers therein prescribed; which memorials were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of reviving and continuing in force, for a limited time, so much of an act, the provisions of which partially expired on the 1st day of November, 1819, entitled "An act regulating the currency within the United States, of the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain, and the crowns of France, and five franc pieces," as relates to the gold coins of these countries; and Mr. WAITMAN, Mr. SILSBEE, Mr. STREET, Mr. ROGERS, and Mr. LOWNDES, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. TRACY submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to this House a statement, showing the amount and value of goods (estimated at cost) on hand, by the last return, at the different Indian trading houses, and at the depot in Georgetown, designating the amount at each place.

Mr. COBB submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of limiting by law the number of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to be annually employed in the service of the United States; and also into the expediency of reducing the number now in actual service.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the pensions now allowed under the acts of Congress, to certain persons in the land and naval service of the United States, on continental establishment, during the Revolutionary war; [so that hereafter the pension allowed to each officer shall be twelve dollars per month, and to the privates five dollars per month.]

The first of these resolutions was agreed to without a division.

The second met with great objection; in consequence of which Mr. COBB modified it so as to make the inquiry general, by erasing the words in brackets.

On the resolution thus modified, there were ayes 53, noes 59. So the resolution was not agreed to.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, rose and said that, as,

by the notice given yesterday,* by a gentleman from Massachusetts, the condition was realized upon which alone, according to his former declaration, he should refrain from calling up his motion, he should not repeat that call until after Monday next, the day named by the gentleman from Massachusetts for calling up his resolution.

Mr. JACKSON submitted for consideration the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing contractors for transporting the United States' mail to frank way-letters addressed to their mail carriers.

The question being taken on agreeing thereto, without remark, it was decided in the negative without a division.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the consideration of the bill for the reduction of the Military Peace Establishment was resumed.

Mr. CANNON said, the subject under discussion was one of great importance, as it involved in its consideration, either directly or indirectly, the policy and principles of our Government, which, he supposed it would be granted on all sides, was formed by the people for their own safety and benefit; therefore, it never could have been intended by those engaged in its original formation, to elevate too high those officers who were or might be at any time engaged in its administration, its armies, or any where else; nor did he believe it was intended to depress the people who bear all its burdens too low; and while he thought a sufficient compensation ought at all times to be allowed those we retain in our employment, we should at the same time be guarded against paying them too high. Either of the extremes should be avoided. In this, as in other cases of a similar nature, there is a medium which it is proper we should observe.

This Government, we must recollect, does not yet belong to those engaged in its administration, or those employed in its army, or any where else; nor ought it to be administered for their exclusive benefit, but with a view to the general good of the community at large. When administered with that view it had been, and he had no doubt ever would continue to be considered a great blessing, by all who enjoy its benefits. Yet should a change take place, and it should be administered with different views, to gratify the thirst for power or ambition of those to whom power is given, it may assume a very different character in the estimation of the world.

He said it would be found, by reference to the Constitution, that, to the different departments of Government it has given certain powers, and to this body certain powers also, which, if properly exercised, would at all times be found to be amply sufficient to control the great measures of policy of this nation; and this power he believed, it was the duty of the House of Representatives independently to exercise. But the question now is, how are we to do this? He agreed with the gentlemen who opposed the reduction of the Army, that, while acting under this power, amongst other things it is the duty of Congress to prepare for war; also, that this preparation should be made during a state of peace. But he differed with them as regards the manner in which we are to make this important and necessary preparation. They contend that we must prepare for war by keeping up a large regular army during a state of peace. I contend that we should prepare for war by arming, organizing, and diffusing military science among the great body of the people—the militia.

To which of these kinds of force, then, shall we turn our attention for safety and protection when war comes? For it will be conceded on all sides that we are now enjoying a state of profound peace, without the least prospect of war from any quarter whatever. Yet, in one way or the other, we must be prepared for war. Between the two modes of preparation that have been alluded to, it seemed to him no one with a knowledge of the principles and nature of our Government could hesitate. Our attention has been drawn, with great force and ingenuity, to the regular Army, by the Secretary of War, whose report contains a very able argument on this important question, which he would presently notice more fully. It had, however, fell very far short of convincing him that our main reliance for defence, in time of war, should be on a regular army in preference to the militia. This was a doctrine in which he could not be made to believe. He, however, here took occasion to say, that no financial difficulties or deficiency in the revenues of the country had, in the language of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Cobb,) "forced" him into the opinions he now entertained on this subject; they were opinions he had always entertained, and had indicated them to the House on more than one occasion since the termination of the late war. The question was not, nor had it ever been with him, how large a regular army can we support during peace? The true question, he thought, was, what is the smallest number of a regular army that can be made to answer the purposes of the country in a state of peace? for we all know that any army that can be maintained in peace will not answer our purposes in time of war. He thought, then, that a number sufficient to take care of the public arms and munitions of war, when deposited in as few forts as was practicable, and convenient for distribution in the event of war taking place, was the proper number to be retained in service in peace, and he had no doubt but that duty might be performed by a much smaller number than that proposed by the bill under discussion. He thought we had, in some degree, been led into an error by the prosperity of the Treasury immediately after the late war. We have not had a proper regard

* This reference is to a notice, yesterday given by Mr. ELLIS, that on Monday next he should move for the consideration of his resolution for the admission of Missouri into the Union, conditionally that she expunge from her constitution the clause concerning free people of color.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

(in fixing the Military Establishments of our country, consisting of our Army, Navy, and military fortifications) to such times as we now experience; he believed we ought to endeavor to guard against fluctuations in public opinion, in regard to those establishments. This, he thought, could be done to a considerable extent, by limiting those expenditures in the same way as though the money appropriated was taken directly from the people by taxes.

Had this been done heretofore it would have prevented us from running into many useless expenditures. The whole expenses of Government, especially during peace, should be regulated by the principle he had just laid down; then we should not be making so many changes in our policy; for, as long as the people retain their attachment to the Government, they will willingly contribute as much as is really and indispensably necessary for its support either during a state of peace or war. It has been contended that we must not reduce the Army because the situation of the officers disbanded would be worse than at present; but, he said, it must be remembered that the Government has the right to call into its service the whole population of the country should it become necessary; it also had the right to dismiss from service whenever it was thought that their services could be dispensed with; this was done with privates, and he could see no reason why it should not be done also with officers. Whether their condition will be made better or worse by their being dismissed from service, he thought was not a proper inquiry; for his part, he said, he would suppose, until the contrary should appear, that those who had received so much of the favor of the Government as to be made officers, and retained so long on the Peace Establishment, possessed as much patriotism as the common people of the country, who had never murmured at being disbanded from your service, but rejoiced that the situation of the country was such as to require their services no longer; and such, he thought, must be the feelings of the patriotic officer of the regular army, on being dismissed from service; he would, like the honest and patriotic citizen, rejoice that the condition of his country was such as to enable the Government to dispense with his services; though, should there be found some to complain, yet we should look to the great interest of the country in preference to the few, or, indeed, the many, that are officers, or holding appointments. In the view he had here taken of the subject of reducing the Army, he begged leave to state that his opinions were not influenced by any feelings or motives of personal dislike, or personal favor, or partiality, toward any individual holding a commission in it; or any individual in any way employed in the administration of our Government. Such feelings and such motives he might claim the right to indulge in private life; but he denied himself the right to indulge or be influenced by them in public life. He was unconscious of the influence of any such feelings on any part of his course in public; and he hoped he always should remain so while acting, not only as the representative of a part of the people of the State he had the honor to reside in, but as the representative, also, of the whole people of the United States. He trusted his opinions had, at all times, and on all subjects, whether correct or incorrect, been influenced by higher and better motives; for he, at least, endeavored to look while acting as a statesman to the happiness and prosperity of his country; and, while he did not profess to have less sensibility in regard to reflections that were made on his public conduct than other men; yet, neither the humorous play of newspaper scribblers or editors, their satire, nor the severest censure that can be vented by their spleen, ever has, and, he hoped, never would, prevent him from the attempt, at least, to discharge what he might believe to be his duty, on this floor or elsewhere.

He said, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CUTHBERT) had called our attention to the report of the Secretary of War; and says, the arguments contained in it have not been met or answered by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) that the Secretary looks to a state of war, while the gentleman from North Carolina looked to a state of peace; and the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) has told us that this report contains sound political principles. [The gentleman from Maryland explained.] He assured the gentleman from Maryland, he felt no wish to misunderstand him, and he was glad now to find the gentleman and himself did not differ so widely as he had supposed. However, he said, he thought it necessary to examine some of the doctrines contained in the report. The Secretary of War has told us that, "however remote our situation from the great Powers of the world, and however pacific our policy, we are, notwithstanding, liable to be involved in war; and to resist, with success, its calamities and dangers, a standing army in peace, in the present improved state of the military science, is an indispensable preparation. The opposite opinion cannot be adopted without putting to hazard the independence and safety of the country." Now, sir, said Mr. C., I would be as far from doing any thing that would put to hazard the independence of my country as the Secretary of War, or as any other individual in the community, but, that a standing army is indispensably necessary for the safety of the country, I cannot agree. At the same time I am willing to retain as much of this army, in time of peace, as is necessary to occupy as many of our forts or garrisons as may be necessary to take care of our public arms and munitions of war. But I would not look to this army to preserve the independence of our country; for this, sir, I shall look to the great body of the people, the militia. I consider this to be the only safe reliance for the preserving of our liberties. Again, the Secretary of War, speaking of the organization of the army, &c., has told us, "it is thus only that we can be in a condition to meet the first shocks of hostilities with unyielding firmness, and to press on an enemy while our resources are yet unexhausted." He thought the experience of the late war had proved that a regular army could not be so fully relied on in the first outset of a war; for, in the commencement of the last war this kind of force had been relied on to no good purpose. We were not successful until the citizens of the country were called into action. We are also told, from the same source, that, "to give to the officers of the 'army the necessary skill and acquirements, the 'Military Academy is an invaluable part of our 'establishment; but that alone will be inadequate." The conclusion of this sentence I have no doubt is correct. It will be inadequate to fill your army with military science. I am, however, opposed to maintaining this Military Academy at public expense, because it is repugnant to every principle of equality, and fixes a system of favoritism contrary to the principle of a free Government. He should not, however, discuss the merits of this institution now, as he intended to say more about it at some future time. Again, we are told by the Secretary of War, that "the number of resignations has been 'very great, of which, many are among the most 'valuable officers. Should the number of Generals be reduced, the motive for entering or continuing in service must also be greatly reduced; 'for, like the high prizes in a lottery, though they can 'be obtained by a few only, yet they operate on all 'those who adventure." Here it seems to be rather admitted that it is not patriotism that retains these officers in your service, but rather the hope and prospect of future promotion. Again, we are told, that "no Government can, in the present improved 'state of military science, neglect with impunity 'to instruct a sufficient number of its citizens in 'a science indispensable to its independence and 'safety." It seems, said Mr. C., from the whole of this report, that our attention is directed to the regular army for the safety of our independence and the protection of our liberties. He said, for his own part, he could not hold with such doctrine, let it come from whatever quarter it might; but when such doctrines were urged upon the House from such a source, and with so much force and ability, he confessed he almost felt alarmed for the liberties of his country. We must not make the regular Army our principal reliance. Our Army and Navy, with all our extensive fortifications, cannot be relied on.

It is the great body of the American people, the militia, you must and ought to rely on, and it is to them you should extend this military science that is recommended by the Secretary of War; it is to them we must look in the hour of danger, and it is to them we should now turn our attention, in time of peace, to relieve them from unnecessary burdens, and teach them this necessary science of war; for, so long as the Government shall lean on any regular army that may be kept in peace, for safety and protection in war, they will be leaning on a broken staff. The strength of our nation, as I have said on a former occasion, and will repeat again, is in the great body of the people, and their attachment to the Government; and he had no doubt it would be found that, in the same proportion that our attention is drawn to the improvement of a regular army, as a means of defence, in the same proportion will the militia and their improvement be neglected.

Mr. C. said he was glad to find that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) was now willing to dispense with the recruiting service, though he much regretted that that gentleman had not consented to put a stop to this useless expenditure of public money sooner. During the last session he had endeavored to put a stop to the business of recruiting. It would be recollected by the House he had made a motion to strike out of the appropriation bill the $21,000 that were appropriated for that purpose, and he had no doubt, if he had been supported by the gentleman from Maryland, he would have succeeded in preventing not only the expenditure of this amount of $21,000, but a much larger amount, which he found had been expended in that way. He believed an amount of more than $60,000 had been expended, during the last year, in the recruiting service. This whole amount would have been saved, provided the House had refused any appropriation.

The gentleman from Maryland, he said, had told us that he is in favor of economy, so far as we can go without endangering the public safety. For his part, he said, he could hardly see how the public safety could be endangered by economy, though he thought it might be endangered by a useless and extravagant expenditure of the public money. The same gentleman had also drawn our attention again to the Military Academy, from which he seems to think great benefits will result to us. He says it is there that military science is taught and diffused throughout the army, and, also, to the militia. As respects the army, he said, it was possible it might derive some benefit from this institution; but, as respected the militia, he believed very little science was diffused amongst them from this Academy. If a plan was proposed, he said, to teach military science to the militia, he would give it his support; but an institution like the Military Academy, on which we are expending every year large sums of money to give an education to a favorite few, privileged and selected young men of wealthy families, he could not support. What are we doing by this institution but creating a privileged order, who are to take commands in your armies, to the exclusion of all others, no matter what their merits may be? Sir, said he, it is an aristocracy of the rankiest order, and he called on the gentleman from Maryland, and all others who are the advocates of this institution, to show wherein it is not so. He said he was not opposed to military science, or any other useful science, but he was opposed to teaching a few favorites at the expense of the people of the United States. Nor did he believe this institution added much to the general science of the country. Indeed, he believed none was gained by it, for he had no doubt those that were receiving educations there were, with very few exceptions, the sons of men able to educate them at other institutions, and would do so if deprived of this institution, in which it not only costs them nothing, but gives them a large bounty to receive it. They are paid sixteen dollars per month, and allowed two rations per day, which makes it nearly equal to thirty dollars per month, which you are paying out of the Treasury of the United States to the boys of rich men, who may happen to be favorites of the Executive or Secretary of War. Is it not better, he asked, is it not more just, is it not more consistent with the principles of this Government, that this money should be appropriated to the instruction of your militia officers, and thereby diffuse this military science among the people generally, instead of confining it to a few peculiar favorites in this way? He thought none who could feel exempt from partiality could hesitate to say it was.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) in the course of the argument he had made against the reduction of the army, has said that the worst that can happen, in the event we do not reduce the army, is, that "we cannot discharge as much of the public debt as we otherwise could." Now, sir, said Mr. C., although I view a public debt as one of the greatest evils in any country, and although I believe it is the true policy of this country to pay off this public debt, and get rid of it, in these times of peace, in the shortest possible time, yet I believe there are other consequences that may result from a failure to reduce the army still worse, and more to be deprecated. He meant the establishment of the doctrines which had been urged with so much zeal (by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BALDWIN, the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. SIMKINS, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CUTHBERT, as well as the gentleman from Virginia,) in favor of a regular army as the principal reliance of this country in time of war. He said he regretted to have seen these doctrines gaining ground in this country for years past. They have inched along, a little at a time, to avoid being noticed, until they have arrived, as it were, at the line which the gentlemen he had alluded to seem to have overleaped, and think themselves safely landed on the other side. In this way the same doctrines have been imposed on the people of other countries, and in other Governments; but he hoped the people of the United States had too much regard for their liberties to intrust their defence to any regular army. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) thinks an important question is stirred, and one which he thought had long since been settled, "that militia would not answer the purposes of war." I admit this is an important question; but I will not admit that it has yet been settled in the way that it has been supposed to be settled by the gentleman from Virginia, and he hoped the time was far distant when it should be settled in that way. Indeed, he hoped that decision never would be made, and, if made in this House, never would be sanctioned by the people of this country. The gentleman had asked us, if we can intrust the defence of the country to the militia? I answer him in the affirmative. I know no other defence that can safely be relied on in this Government; they are our great bulwark of safety in time of war, in the hour of danger. They have proved themselves, on all occasions, to be the safest and surest reliance for the defence of our Constitution, and the liberties that are enjoyed under it. The gentleman from Virginia has said the regulars are "willing, disciplined men, and the militia unwilling and undisciplined men." This he would presently notice. He had also said, "the militia, during the Revolutionary war, had endangered the liberties of the country;" but that part of the gentleman's argument he would not notice, for he considered it fully and ably answered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS.) Although the gentleman from Virginia had been pleased to say he had as much or more confidence in the militia of the State of Tennessee, as that of any other State, yet his remarks had reflected rather severely on the character of a large part of the people of that State. To this he felt it to be his duty to make a reply. The gentleman had referred to the book he held in his hand as authority to show the "revolt of the militia of Tennessee and volunteers of Coffee's brigade, returning as deserters, committing depredations in the country through which they passed, and discouraging others from entering the service."

Mr. C. said he begged leave distinctly to state to that gentleman, and to the House, that the book referred to (the Life of General Jackson) was not good authority on this subject with him; he was himself in the service at that time, and under General Coffee, as were also two of his colleagues, and he thought he had some knowledge of what took place during the time referred to by the gentleman from Virginia. He said he knew all the facts were not recorded in the book. It gave a very partial history of that part of the Creek war. It was true, he said, that difficulties had occurred during the first campaign of this war, between the commanding General and some of the different corps; but at least some of the difficulties were produced by the conduct of the commanding General himself, by attempting to force them to serve longer than the period for which they had engaged. This attempt, he said, was resisted by the volunteers, who demanded to be discharged at the expiration of the period for which they had engaged, which discharge was refused them, and threats made to them of being published as having disgracefully left the service, in order to force them to continue longer; and the result was what might always be expected from freemen acting under such circumstances. They resisted the despotic power attempted to be exercised over them, and did leave the service without the consent or discharge of the commanding General, who, under that state of feeling produced by being disappointed in the attempt to force them beyond the period they had engaged to serve, had the document published which had been read by the gentleman from Virginia, (in one of the newspapers of Nashville, perhaps the Whig.) But, Mr. C. said, he had himself (as the commanding officer of the regiment of volunteer mounted riflemen which was a part of General Coffee's brigade) felt it to be his duty to reply to the publication alluded to, so far as it related to the regiment he had commanded, and had, in the same newspaper, contradicted and refuted the aspersions that were thus attempted to be thrown on what he considered to be a meritorious, patriotic, and highly respectable class of the people of Tennessee. To which publication no reply was ever made in any public paper whatever, as he knew of or believed.

He said, this part of the volunteers of Tennessee were not ordered into service by the Governor of the State, General Jackson, or anybody else; they had precipitated themselves into the service on the spur of an occasion, on hearing of the horrid massacre at Fort Mims; and had furnished and equipped themselves, marched into the Indian country, and after destroying one of the enemy's towns, formed a junction with the army under the command of General Jackson. When these troops, who had thus entered the service with an express stipulation to serve not exceeding three months, were organized into a regiment, and fought in the first battle at Tallasachee, under the command of General Coffee, where a most decisive victory was obtained over the enemy; an event which he had no doubt had great influence on the whole army, and tended as much towards the elevation of Tennessee towards military fame as any other that had taken place during the whole war. They had again fought in the second battle of Talladega, where the conflict was equally severe, of much longer duration, and the victory equally decisive; in which, it is known by those who shared the dangers of that day, they acted a most conspicuous part. Although it does not appear in this history, which has been referred to, and although he did not hold it as good authority, he would read from it a part of the letters of General Jackson written in relation to those two battles. [Which he read.] He thought it was fair to meet the gentleman from Virginia with the same kind of authority he had used.

In the letters he had just read, General Jackson had spoken in high terms of the conduct of these volunteers, who he afterwards reflected on so unjustly. They had encountered hardships, difficulties, and dangers, that are unpleasant to think of, and he would not attempt a relation of them. They had rendered services to their country, which yeu have some reason to believe are duly appreciated by those persons who are best acquainted with them. He regretted that the remarks and references of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) had made it his duty to say thus much in defence of this meritorious and respectable part of his fellow-citizens.

He said he would next proceed to notice the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia respecting the militia generally during the late war. The gentleman thinks he has shown, from high authority, that no reliance whatever can be placed on them. But, Mr. C. said, he thought he could show, from equally as high authority, that the utmost reliance could be placed in them when engaged in the defence of the country, and that they were equally as much entitled to the confidence of the nation as regular troops were, if not more so. In order to show this, he would call the attention of the Committee to the conduct of the militia in the defence of Fort Erie, by referring to General Gaines's official despatch, dated Fort Erie, August, 1814. He says:

"Brigadier General Porter, commanding the New York and Pennsylvania volunteers, manifested a degree of vigilance and judgment in his preparatory arrangements, as well as military skill and courage in action, which proves him to be worthy the confidence of his country and the brave volunteers who fought under him. Of the volunteers, Captains Boughton and Harding, with their detachments, posted on the right, and attached to the line commanded by Captain F. Foster of the veteran 9th infantry, handsomely contributed to the repulse of the left column of the enemy under Colonel Scott."

Here, said Mr. C., we have the best authority that the militia of New York and Pennsylvania do not deserve the character which has been given to this species of force by the gentleman from Virginia. But let us see what has been said of them on other occasions. I will next see how they acted in the defence of Fort Meigs. In the official despatch of General Harrison, dated at Lower Sandusky, May 13, 1813, he says:

"That American regulars, although they were raw recruits, and such men as compose the Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and Petersburg, Virginia, volunteers, should behave well, is not to be wondered at; but, that a company of militia should maintain its ground against four times its numbers, as did Captain Sebre's, of Kentucky, is truly astonishing. These brave fellows were at length, however, entirely surrounded by Indians, and would have been entirely cut off, but for the gallantry of Lieutenant Gwynne of the 19th regiment, who, with part of Captain Elliott's company, charged the enemy and released the Kentuckians."

Here, said Mr. C., we have evidence again from the highest authority, testifying to the gallantry and good conduct of these "unwilling and undisciplined" militia, who the gentleman from Virginia thinks cannot be trusted. But I will not stop here; I will call the gentleman's attention to another official despatch from the same officer, dated Camp Meigs, the 9th of May, 1813, where, in speaking of the defence of Fort Meigs again, he says:

"The two actions on this side the river on the 5th, were infinitely more important and more honorable to our arms than I had at first conceived. In the sortie made upon the left flank, Captain Waring's company of the 19th regiment, a detachment of twelve months' volunteers under Major Alexander, and three companies of Kentucky militia under Colonel Boswell, defeated at least double the number of Indians and British militia."

And again, in General Harrison's general order, dated at Fort Meigs, 9th of May, 1812, he says:

"Majors Ball of the dragoons, Lodwick, and Major Ritzer of the Ohio militia, and Major Johnson, of the Kentucky militia, rendered the most important services. To each of the above gentlemen, as well as to each captain, subaltern, non-commissioned officer and private of their respective commands, the General gives his thanks and expresses his warmest approbation. To Colonel Boswell and Major Fletcher, for their gallantry and good conduct in leading them in the charge made on the enemy, and to Captains Dudley, Simmon, and Metcalf, the subalterns, non-commissioned officers, and privates, for the distinguished valor with which they defeated the enemy. The General has in the order of the 6th instant expressed his sense of the conduct of the regular troops and volunteers which were engaged in the sorties on the left flank, but he omitted to mention Captain Sebro's company of Kentucky militia, whose gallantry was not surpassed by that of any of the companies which fought by their side. The Pittsburg Blues, led by Lieutenant McGee, in the illness of their gallant Captain, sustained the reputation which they had acquired at Messissancey. The Petersburg volunteers and Lieutenant Drum's detachment discovered equal intrepidity."

Again, in the same, he says:

"It rarely occurs that a General has to complain of the excessive ardor of his men, yet such appears always to be the case, whenever the Kentucky militia are engaged; it is indeed the source of all their misfortunes; they appear to think that valor alone can accomplish any thing. The General is led to make this remark, from the conduct of Captain Dudley's company, of the ——— regiment, as he has understood that that gallant officer was obliged to turn his espoutoon against his own company, to oblige them to desist from the further pursuit of the enemy, in compliance with an order from the General."

Mr. C. said, this was further evidence of the good conduct, valor, and intrepidity, of the militia, he thought, sufficient to contradict the assertion of the gentleman from Virginia, that they were "unwilling, undisciplined, and no dependence ought to be placed in them." He thought the conduct of the militia generally, during the late war, had entitled them to the respect and confidence of the country, and had by no means deserved the very severe reflections of that gentleman. That they had sometimes had to encounter misfortunes, was true, but even under those unpleasant circumstances, it would be found they have borne them with a patience and fortitude becoming a patriot, and one who feels the strongest attachment to the principles of our free Government; as evidence of this, he would refer to the composure and good order of the Kentucky militia, after Winchester's defeat, on their return home. The historian says:

"These men are of the first respectability and intelligence, the flower of Kentucky, and they reflect the highest honor on the State from which they come and on their country. The easy gracefulness of manner, the manly independence of sentiment, the ardent love of country which they have displayed under all the reverses of fortune, entitle them to the first place in the hearts of their countrymen. Notwithstanding the unparalleled fatigues they have undergone in a dreary wilderness, the dangers to which they have been exposed, and the numerous privations they have suffered, still their noble spirits are unbroken, not a murmur has escaped their lips, no imbecile apprehensions are entertained by them for the safety of their brethren in arms, but their honest hearts spring forward with elastic hope, that their wrongs will be avenged, and that the day of retribution is at hand."

verses and misfortunes of defeat. Dangers are met by them willingly, and misfortune borne with composure, while thus engaged in the defence of their own rights and their own liberties. He said he could not leave this part of the subject without reminding the Committee of the very important services that had been rendered by the militia of the State of Kentucky, in the battle of the Thames, when led by the patriotic Shelby and the gallant Johnson. They obtained a victory of not much less importance than any other gained during the whole war. Here, again, he begged the gentleman from Virginia to recollect that the militia had put the most veteran regular forces of our enemy to flight. Six hundred and nine regulars were made prisoners in this battle; also, two colonels, four majors, and seventeen officers of the line, with twelve pieces of cannon and six thousand stand of arms. We have had another demonstration of the efficiency of the militia, of what freemen will do when their rights and liberties are assailed. Indeed, their conduct, during the late war, has shed an imperishable glory on the military character of our nation.

He would next call the attention of the Committee to the services rendered by the militia, in the defence of Baltimore, on the approach of the enemy. The historian tells us, here they were met by General Stricker, with his entire Baltimore brigade; except that he had only one company of the regiment of artillery. Again, he says, the men took deliberate aim, and the carnage was great; the invincibles dodging to the ground and crawling in a bending posture to avoid the militia, the men they were taught so much to despise. Again, he says, Major General Ross, who did not care if it rained militia, the incendiary of the Capitol, paid the forfeit of that act by his death. He was killed in the early part of the action, and there is reason to believe that two or three other officers high in command met the same fate. And, again, we are told by the same historian, that "never was the mortification of an invader more complete than that of our enemy. Beaten by militia and defeated by the fort, he went away in the worst possible humor, and a total loss that may amount to not less than eight hundred men."

He would also beg leave to refer the Committee to the official despatch of his friend from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) who, much to his honor, had acted so conspicuous a part in the affairs of that day, in order to show that the militia of the East have also done their duty, and have been an efficient force when it became necessary to defend the country. In the official despatch of General Smith to the Secretary of War, dated Headquarters, Baltimore, September 19, 1814, he says:

"General Stricker gallantly maintained his ground against a great superiority of numbers during the space of an hour and twenty minutes, when the regiment on his left (the 51st) giving way, he was under the necessity of retiring to the ground in his rear, where he had stationed one regiment as a reserve. He here formed his brigade; but the enemy not thinking it advisable to pursue, he, in compliance with previous arrangements, fell back, and took post on the left of my intrenchments and half a mile in advance of them. In this affair the citizen soldiers of Baltimore (with the exception of the 51st regiment) have maintained the reputation they so deservedly acquired at Bladensburg, and their brave and skilful leader has confirmed the confidence which we had all so justly placed in him. I take the liberty of referring you to his letter for the more particular mention of the individuals, who, new to warfare, have shown the coolness and valor of veterans, and who, by their conduct on this occasion, have given their country and their city an assurance of what may be expected from them when their services are again required. I cannot dismiss the subject without expressing the heartfelt satisfaction I experience in thus bearing testimony to the courage and good conduct of my fellow-townsmen."

Mr. C. said, the authority here given was the highest that could be given, and would not be doubted by any, from which it appears that the militia of Baltimore and Maryland have been competent to their own defence against a regular force, and proves, beyond doubt, that militia are not that "unwilling and undisciplined" kind of force that the gentleman from Virginia seems to suppose. He said he had intended to call the attention of the Committee to a number of other official statements, all going to place, not only the militia of Baltimore city and Maryland on high ground, but also the militia of Pennsylvania and Virginia equally so. But he found, by doing so, he should consume too much of the time of the Committee, and he thought he had already produced sufficient evidence to vindicate the character of the militia of the East and North against what he considered the unjust reproaches of the gentleman from Virginia. He would next inquire how far the gentleman's description of the character of the militia would apply to the people of the West and South, and see whether they were there dragged into the service, "unwilling and undisciplined." What, he said, was the history of that country during this trying period? Why, sir, we are told by the historian (3d vol. Niles's Weekly Register, page 300) that a requisition on the State of Tennessee for her quota of troops had been made from the War Department for the protection and defence of the Southern frontier. The distance of the point to which they could be led, even under the destructive doctrines preached, (of not going out of the limits of the United States' territory,) was not less than 1,500 miles by water, and eight or nine hundred by land, through a wilderness, great part of which was only inhabited by wild beasts and savages. The day appointed for rendezvous was the 10th of December, at Nashville. The State of Tennessee is divided into East and West, the latter of which thirty-one years ago received the first impression of a white man's foot, is now represented by one Representative in Congress, and was called upon to furnish 1,500 men for its part of the quota. On the day appointed, although severely cold, and during a heavy fall of snow, the troops began to arrive, and, before 5 o'clock in the evening, 1,800 men had filed through Nashville, and pitched their tents in its vicinity.

Five companies more, who had not arrived, sent despatches to the commanding officer, apologizing for their absence, as they were on their march and would be there as soon as possible. The troops already arrived, with these five companies, are volunteers, and furnish five hundred more than those called for. So sudden was the impulse that public feeling had marched far beyond the requisite comforts of such an army. Inasmuch that there was not more than one blanket for three men, although the country was bound in icy chains of snowy winter. Such is the fruit of patriotism in the infant section of that infant State. While the efforts of faction on the Atlantic board are directed to the destruction of their liberties, those hardy sons of the West are bereaving themselves of the comforts of domestic life, to sustain a part of the highest value given by God to man, and recovered from tyranny by the toil and suffering of a glorious ancestry.

This shows with what alacrity the people of the West had entered the service of their country, not to repel any invasion about to be made near their own homes, but to repel the threatened invasion of a distant point of the Union. A number far beyond what was required of the militia, had voluntarily assembled, in the severest and most inclement season of the year. Did this, he asked, seem like being dragged into the service "unwillingly?" No, he said: it was the natural impulse given by a good government, in favor of its protection and defence, whenever its invasion is threatened. It is the liberty and safety the people enjoy under our free Government, that inspires those feelings of patriotic devotion we have so often and so eminently seen displayed by the people during the late war; and it is those feelings of devotion to the cause of liberty and free government, that nerves the arm of the patriot citizen soldier, the militiaman, which makes him superior to the mercenary slave, in the hour of battle. This, he said, had been demonstrated on more than one occasion during the late war. In support of this, he begged leave, in pursuance of the example set him by the gentleman from Virginia, to refer to General Jackson's letter dated, Camp, below New Orleans, 26th December 1814, in which he says: "The attack was made on the night of the 23d, since then both armies have remained near the battle ground making preparations for something more decisive. The enemy's force exceeds ours by double, and their loss was proportionally greater."

In his official despatch, dated the 27th December in the morning, he says, "My force at this time consists of parts of the 7th and 44th regiments, not exceeding six hundred, together with the city militia, part of General Coffee's brigade of mounted gunmen, and the detached militia from the western division of Tennessee, under the command of Major General Carroll."

In another part of the same despatch, speaking of the enemy's force, he says, "His forces, amounting at that time on land to about three thousand, extended half a mile on that river, and in the rear nearly to the wood."

In another part of the same despatch, he says,

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

"General Coffee's men, with their usual impetuosity, rushed on the enemy's right, and entered their camp, while our right advanced with equal ardor. There can be but little doubt that we should have succeeded on that occasion, with our inferior force, in destroying or capturing the enemy, had not a thick fog which arose about 8 o'clock, occasioned some confusion among the different corps. Fearing the consequence, under this circumstance, of the further prosecution of a night attack with troops then acting together for the first time, I contented myself with lying on the field that night."

Again, he says, "in this affair the whole of the corps under my command deserve the greatest credit. The best compliment I can pay to General Coffee and his brigade, is, to say they behaved as they have always done while under my command." Again, sir, he remarks, that "Savery's volunteers manifested the greatest bravery, and the company of city riflemen, having penetrated into the midst of the enemy's camp, were surrounded, and fought their way out with the greatest heroism, bringing with them a number of prisoners."

He said that this also proved the practicability of defending the country by militia. On this occasion the volunteer militia of Tennessee, under the command of General Coffee, on the ever memorable night of the 23d, had attacked a British regular force of more than double their number, and defeated them, without the assistance of a regular force, and perhaps thereby the safety of the city of New Orleans was preserved. Here again was displayed an intrepidity, on the part of these citizen soldiers of our country, which is not often to be found recorded in the pages of history. This gallant band were influenced by feelings of attachment for their country, that do not often animate with the same zeal a regular army, and never are found to exist under the old oppressive governments of the world.

Mr. C. said he had intended to call the attention of the Committee to the official statements of all the different battles in which the militia had been engaged, while defending New Orleans, but he knew he would be trespassing too much on their patience, though it would be found by referring to them, as well as to the general order of the commanding General, after the different contests were over, that on all the different corps of militia that had been engaged, with one single exception, the highest praise is bestowed. They had, he believed, during the whole of the contest, proved themselves to be equal to regulars, if not superior. The gentleman from Virginia, had referred to authorities in support of the position he had taken against the reduction of the army, and also in support of the ground he had taken against the militia; and he thought it was proper in opposing the arguments and doctrines which had been advanced by that gentleman, to produce authorities also. This he had done in order to rescue the people of his country, the militia, from the unjust reproaches that were attempted to be heaped upon them. The principal part of the authorities he had relied on were official statements of the officers of the regular army, who, it was not to be supposed, could be influenced by partiality for the militia in the smallest degree. However, he said, if the militia were indeed that "unwilling and undisciplined" kind of force that they were said to be by the gentleman from Virginia, and a reliance on them would "endanger the liberties of his country," he should also be in favor of a regular army, or some other means of defence for the country. But he trusted he had shown, or rather that the militia themselves had shown, that they were fully competent to the defence of the country during a state of war, even in the present unimproved state of their organization and discipline; to improve which the General Government has never, as yet, expended a single dollar. If in this situation they have shown themselves to be competent, how much more so would they be by having even one half the amount expended to teach them military science, that has been expended on the regular army since the late war!

Mr. C. said, however invidious it was to make comparisons between the militia force of the country and the regular army, he would beg leave to call the attention of the Committee a few moments to one or two authorities, in order to show that the regular army had sometimes been unfortunate, during the late war, as well as the militia. It seems that the highest expectations had not been realized by that kind of force, in defence of this place, as we are informed by a part of the history of that day. Speaking of the defence of the District of Columbia, the Common Council of Alexandria says: "The forts erected for the defence of the District, having been blown up by our own men, (United States' regular troops,) and abandoned, without resistance, the town of Alexandria was left without the means of defence." He did not mean to say they had acted incorrectly in this case or any other, for he did not pretend to know whether they had or not. But he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would allow him, however, to refer to his own proclamation for authority against the regular army, dated 12th November, 1812, and addressed to the men of New York. He says:

"For many years you have seen your country oppressed with numerous wrongs. Your Government, although above all others devoted to peace, has been forced to draw the sword, and rely for redress of injuries on the valor of the American people. That valor has been conspicuous, but the nation has been unfortunate in the election of some of those who have directed it. One army has been disgracefully surrendered and lost. Another has been sacrificed by a precipitate attempt to pass over at the strongest point of the enemy's lines, with most incompetent means. The cause of these miscarriages is apparent. The commanders were popular men, destitute alike of theory and experience in the art of war. In a few days the troops under my command will plant the American standard in Canada. They are men accustomed to obedience, silence, and steadiness. They will conquer or they will die."

Mr. C. said he had only called the attention of the Committee to this proclamation, for the purpose of showing that the gentleman from Virginia himself had not at all times, and particularly at that time, entertained this high opinion of regular forces; for here he had made the severest reflections against them, and he thought the authority of the gentleman himself was entitled to great consideration. There were other circumstances which took place in the early part of the late war, that would go very far to show that the main reliance of this country ought never to be placed on a regular army; but he would not longer consume the time of the Committee by referring to them.

The gentleman from Virginia had told us that there were 1,600 regulars engaged in the defence of New Orleans. [Mr. SMYTH here explained by saying, including the naval force.] Mr. C. said the official letter of the commanding officer, which he had previously read, had said the regulars consisted of a part of two regiments, not exceeding in the whole six hundred; however, this did not include the naval force, nor would the admission of a larger regular force make the argument more favorable on his side; for although the gentleman from Virginia had said that if it had not been for the regular force employed there, the victory would not have been achieved, yet, said Mr. C., it unfortunately happens for him that facts are directly against him; for it will be recollected by all who are acquainted with the history and events of the great battle of the 8th of January, that the regulars gave way in the contest, and the part of the line intrusted to their defence was taken possession of by the British forces. They were reinforced by the militia of New Orleans, and the bastions retaken after considerable loss on the part of the enemy at that point. Here it will be seen that the battle, so far as the regular forces were concerned, was lost; while the militia of Tennessee and Kentucky, who defended the other part of the line, encountered a superior force with firmness, not a single man of them was known to give way; therefore, instead of any argument being drawn from this great event in favor of the position of the gentleman from Virginia, it is directly against him. Indeed, if the whole of the events of the late war were taken into view, he believed it would be found that the militia forces that had been called into action had been equally as efficient as the regular forces were. Mr. C. said he had not taken the ground, nor did he intend to say, that the militia were a more efficient force in proportion to numbers than regulars. It was enough for him to show they were as much so; he admitted militia had sometimes been unfortunate, and so had regular troops; they had sometimes wanted bravery and firmness, and so had regulars; at other times the militia had distinguished themselves for their gallant exploits, and so had the regular army. But it must be admitted on all sides, that the defence and preservation of the liberties of the people of this country cannot be entirely intrusted to a regular army, of any size whatever. Then why not, he asked, withdraw from it a part of the public expenditure, and apply it to the discipline of the great body of the people, the militia, on whom at last you are obliged to depend in time of war? The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BALDWIN,) who opposed the reduction of the army with so much zeal, has called on us, who advocate this measure, to go more minutely into detail, and show all the different posts and places where there are too many men. Sir, I shall not do this; it is the business of those who wish to retain these men in service, to show in what way they can employ them beneficially to the Government. This they have not done, nor did he believe it was in their power to show even the number proposed by the bill under discussion, could be usefully and beneficially employed during a state of peace; and until this was shown, he should take it for granted that it was not in the power of the opponents of the bill to do so.

Mr. C. said he himself believed that a much smaller number than was proposed by the bill would be sufficient to take care of the public arms and munitions of war during a state of peace; and he did not think it indispensably necessary that more should be retained than would answer this purpose, for it was all the service they could render during a state of peace; and when war comes the people must fight their own battles. He could not agree to the doctrine of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Virginia, and others who oppose this bill, that a freeman shall depend upon a slave to protect him in the enjoyment of his liberties. This was the doctrine of despots and tyrants. He well knew that in the same proportion that the reliance of the Government of the United States increased in favor of a standing army, as a means of defence in time of war, so in the same proportion would the improvement of the militia be neglected, until they would ultimately be lost sight of altogether. Such, he thought, was now, and had been, the tendency of the Government for many years past. That there was an increasing predilection in favor of this doctrine of standing armies in time of peace, he thought, must be obvious to the most common observer—a doctrine repugnant to the very principle of liberty, and contrary to his most sober judgment; a doctrine which he hoped would now be stopped in its progress, for he feared if it survived the present conflict, it would be in vain hereafter to attempt to resist, and if it prevails will be fatal to the boasted liberty and happiness of the people.

If any thing further should be required to prove that a standing army was not calculated to answer the purposes of this Government, it would be found in the history of what was called the Seminole war. It would be recollected, when this petty war took place, we had a regular standing army of ten thousand at least, but according to the calculation of some gentlemen, an army of twelve or thirteen thousand; and with this army of ten thousand, you could not subdue two or three hundred deluded savages and runaway negroes, who had collected in the wilds of the South, without calling on the militia of the States of Georgia and Tennessee to assist you. This would always be the case with any regular force so widely dispersed. You never can with facility concentrate them at any one point; therefore must always rely on the inhabitants of the most adjacent States to repel invasions. He did not entertain fears that the liberties of the people of this country were about to be subverted immediately by this army of ten or twelve thousand, though, if such doctrines as had been advanced were indulged, we should soon come to that period. The influence of the present military establishment on this body had been seen on almost every subject that had any relation to the army. It had been known to have an influence in the councils of every nation in existence during a state of peace; and that influence was always found to be in proportion to the magnitude of the army. He said, Spain, Italy, and other European countries, had recently given a lesson on the subject of what changes regular standing armies can make in Governments.

Mr. C. said he believed the history of nations furnished us abundant proof, that, as a nation advances in the habit of keeping up standing armies in time of peace, in the same degree are the principles of free government abandoned, until liberty and equality are no longer known to exist; therefore, he felt it to be his duty to guard against the encroachment of such doctrines, however gradually they may be made. He said he had always believed the people were competent to the formation of their own government, and also to the defence of it after it was formed. But let us consider for a moment what this doctrine in favor of standing armies and the reproaches against the militia are calculated to lead us to. Why, sir, they say the free people of the United States are not competent to their own defence. This is the doctrine which has been contended for; and if it obtains the sanction of this House, it is to be considered as settled. They then will have gained the first step towards the great object, and that, too, by far the most important; for they can go but one step further, and that is, to settle the doctrine that the people of the United States are not competent to self-government. The one is just as reasonable as the other; and, let me tell you, sir, that when this first step is gained, the other will shortly follow. He said he hoped such doctrines as these would never prevail in any department of the Government, and, if it should, that they would never meet the sanction of this House, nor the people; and then, indeed, would vanish the last vestige of human liberty.

He said he had not gone through the whole of the arguments he had intended to offer to the Committee; but he had consumed much more time than he had intended; he would therefore decline any further remarks at that time on the subject.

FRIDAY, January 12.

AMENDMENT OF THE JOURNAL.

The first entry in the Journal of yesterday was read, in the following words:

"Mr. Lowndes presented three memorials of the Senate and House of Representatives of Missouri—one praying that the purchasers of public lands may be permitted to apply the payments already made to such of their entries as the said payments will cover, at two dollars per acre, relinquishing the residue of the land to the United States—another praying that persons entitled to the right of pre-emption in the purchase of public lands, may be permitted to make payment for said lands within the times heretofore prescribed by law, or prompt payment, at the option of the persons holding such pre-emption right—the other, praying that the right of pre-emption in the purchase of public lands may be extended to certain settlers therein described; which memorials were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands."

Mr. ROBERTSON, conceiving that Missouri had, in this entry, been styled a territory, objected to her being so styled; but, on examination, finding it was not so, waived a motion he was about to have made to amend it.

Mr. COBB, however, adverting to the terms of the memorial, said, that it appeared to be from the Senate and House of Representatives of "the State of" Missouri, though not so stated in the Journal. Mr. C. moved to amend the Journal in this particular, by inserting the words "the State of," before the word "Missouri."

When the reporter entered the Hall, Mr. BARBOUR was up, arguing in favor of an amendment, which would make the Journal conform to the fact, which, he contended, it did not as it now stood.

Mr. ANDERSON expressed his opinion that the Journal, as it stood, expressed truly the fact of a memorial being presented from Missouri. Though it might have been more distinctly stated, yet the omission of the words proposed to be inserted did not take from Missouri the character of a State, it being a frequent mode of expression in regard to other States, to speak of them without the prefix of "the State of." Mr. A. also suggested a wish that his friends should not press the objection they had set up, by way of obtaining a decision of the Missouri question, on a motion to amend the Journal.

Mr. ROBERTSON made some remarks in favor of the motion. The memorials, he said, professed to be from the Legislature of the State of Missouri. If Missouri had not been considered as a State, of course the memorials in that shape would not have been received. Having been received as memorials from the State, why should not the fact be correctly stated on the Journal?

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, was in favor of the proposed amendment, on the general ground that, if it took place, the Journal would correspond more precisely with the fact, than in its present shape.

Mr. WARFIELD said, that a decision in favor of the proposed amendment would not express the sense of the House, either in one way or the other. Conceiving that the entry on the Journal, as it now stood, was an entry of that description which would explain sufficiently what was the nature of the memorial, he was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, proposed, in order to obviate the difficulty, to insert in the Journal the words "purporting to be," a memorial from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, &c.

Mr. COOK was opposed to the proposed amendment. If made, he said, it would decide no principle. If Missouri was not a State, calling her so would not make her so. It would be an equally appropriate amendment to style her the Republic of Missouri, as her Convention had styled her in the preamble to the constitution which had been formed for her government, &c.

Mr. COBB, in reply to a wish which had been expressed, that he would withdraw his motion, said, that he could not consent to do it. He wished the Journal to conform, as it ought, to the fact. Three memorials had been presented from a body, organized under a constitution of government, formed by virtue of a law of Congress authorizing the people of Missouri to form a State government. In that shape having been presented, in that and in no other shape could the memorials have been received; and the Journal ought to state the fact as it occurred.

Mr. BALDWIN was sorry, he said, that any discussion should have arisen as to the description of any paper presented to the House in the shape of a memorial. It had been the uniform practice, in making up the Journal, to give to memorialists the name which they themselves assumed. By way of illustration, he referred to the memorial presented at the present session from persons styling themselves the National Institution for the protection of domestic industry, from the delegates of Agricultural Societies, from the delegates from various interests at Philadelphia, &c., all of which, without investigating the merits of the pretensions of the respective memorialists, had been announced in the Journal in their own language. We pay that respect to petitioners, said Mr. B., that we designate them as they choose to designate themselves. The announcement on the Journal of their designations, was, properly, a mere recital of what they chose to call themselves. If the principle were now to be introduced, that every person or association of persons were to be held to prove that they really are what they profess to be, it would involve the House in endless difficulties. He was therefore in favor of the amendment proposed by Mr. COBB.

Mr. RANDOLPH, after a preliminary remark or two, not distinctly heard from the pressing of members round him, said, that he rose to introduce a precedent applicable to this occasion, which, he trusted, would be received with all the respect due to so high and transcendental authority. The conduct, said he, which this Government has to this instant pursued towards the State of Missouri, is sanctioned by the conduct which was pursued towards these States when colonies, by His Britannic Majesty and his faithful Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled. What was their language after our independence was declared? What was their conduct which led to the long and bloody war which terminated in the acknowledgment of our independence? The very language which we are holding, and the very conduct we are pursuing towards Missouri. The parallel, said Mr. R., runs on all fours. In our extreme tenderness for the rights and privileges of the colored citizens, we have already brought into jeopardy the rights and privileges of our white fellow-citizens as well as of those colored ones who are the objects of our solicitude. Mr. R. said he had intended to abstain, as he had until now abstained, from taking any part or lot in this affair. But when he saw the Congress of the United States pursuing a course of conduct in servile imitation of the British Parliament, he could no longer refrain. He would stake his salvation, he said, dear to him as that was, that, if the constitution of Missouri had contained an inhibition of slavery, the House would never have heard of the objection now raised to it; and, were he to engage in the discussion of it, he would take that ground. However that might be, he said, it was a more important matter that the Journals of this House should contain the truth. An honorable member behind him had uttered the sentiment, the other day, that it was proper that petitions to this House should contain the truth. It was of infinitely more importance, Mr. R. said, that the Journal should contain the truth; and he pronounced that the Journal for yesterday, in its present mutilated, mangled, and garbled state, did not speak the truth. It holds out that, said he, which we know to be false. And is it a mere matter of form that we should send out to the people, as the record of our proceedings, a paper which contains, on the face of it, a palpable and atrocious falsehood?

Mr. LITTLE called for the reading of the memorial; it was read in part, when Mr. L. expressed himself satisfied, and said he was sorry the Chair had departed from the uniform practice and regular rule in recording the proceedings of the House.

Mr. RHEA was in favor of the proposed amendment. It was the duty of the House, he thought, to see that facts were correctly stated on the Journal. This House had, in its public acts, styled Missouri a State; and why should she not be so called on the Journal? He read the caption of one of the memorials to show that it purported to be from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, in General Assembly, &c. The Journal, he said, ought to describe the memorial as it really was.

The question on Mr. COBB's motion was then taken, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Crowell, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Fisher, Floyd, Foot, Garnett, Gorham, Hackley, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hill, Hooks, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Little, Livermore, Lowndes, McCoy, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLane of Kentucky, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, T. The yeas and nays being equal in number, the SPEAKER declared his vote with the nays. So Mr. COBB's motion was rejected.

On this result being declared—

Mr. PARKER, of Virginia, rose. The vote which had just been taken, he said, was, with a few exceptions, of that geographical character which had marked the whole proceedings in regard to Missouri. For his own part, he said, he did not at first consider this question as involving any matter of principle; but, being a new member, he had referred to the Journal, and he found that, in all cases of memorials from States, they had been stated to be from States; and that the same uniformity of practice prevailed as to memorials from Territorial legislatures. He saw no reason why a deviation from this uniformity of practice should have occurred in this particular instance of Missouri, and not in any other. There was, he said, something in it—he did not say what it was—but he was for consistency, at all events, in the records of the Congress of the Union. He was for the records of this House speaking, in the words of the law, the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Under this impression, as the House had refused to acknowledge Missouri to be a State, and as she must be a Territory if she be not a State, he moved to insert in the Journal, before the word "Missouri," the words "the Territory of."

Mr. BRUSH objected to this amendment, for reasons which he assigned at length. He was of opinion that Missouri was constitutionally and politically a State, and not a Territory. But, as it was the custom of this Government to give to its Territories a first and second grade of government, preparatory to their assuming the rank of a State of the Union, he did not see why it could not give to them a third, fourth, or fifth grade of government. He considered Missouri to be in a grade between territorial dependence and the condition of a member of the Union; which idea he illustrated by reference to the situation of the State of Vermont, before she adopted the Federal Constitution.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, apprehended that this proposition would operate as a trap question, producing embarrassment without benefit, and expressed his hope that the mover would withdraw it.

Mr. LIVERMORE made a few remarks to this effect; that the House ought to regard the substance and not the shadow; that the name was of no importance to the actual condition of Missouri. When the question should present itself in a proper form, he was ready to decide it; but it could not be affected, either in one way or the other, by the appellation which should be given to Missouri on the Journal of this House.

Mr. MERCER was gratified that this motion had been made. As this was the commencement of our intercourse with the people of Missouri he was desirous that every step of it should be marked. Mr. M. made some further remarks, in the course of which he expressed his regret that the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. COOK,) had been, in his view, disrespectful to Missouri.

Mr. COOK disclaimed any intention to speak disrespectfully of the people of Missouri, whom, on the contrary, he said, he held in high respect; and he sincerely hoped that Missouri would be admitted into the Union, and soon.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, said, that, on inspecting the Journal, it appeared that the original entry in it corresponded with the caption of the memorial, in which the word State is employed. As the Journal now reads, moreover, in the part speaking of the public lands, the words "within the said State" had been erased in two instances, to avoid the word State, which made the whole entry absurd, inasmuch as the memorial is made to apply not to purchasers of land "within the said State," which words were erased, but to purchasers of land throughout the United States. Mr. B. said he would therefore ask whether the Clerk had undertaken to make these alterations.

The SPEAKER then stated from the chair, that it was the practice that the Journal should be written by the Clerk. The rules of the House made it the duty of the Speaker to "examine and correct the Journal before it is read." If, being so examined and corrected by the Speaker, it should not, in the opinion of any member, be correct, it was competent for any member to move to amend it, and for the House, should such be its pleasure, to direct it to be amended. In the present instance, the presiding officer had thought proper so to correct the Journal, as that it should not be taken either to affirm or deny that Missouri was a State, that being a question on which the House was greatly divided in opinion.

Mr. TRIMBLE requested the Clerk to state the date of the petition, in order to show that the petition was not posterior to the decision of this House against declaring the admission of Missouri into the Union, and that therefore Missouri had not assumed a name which had been denied to her by Congress. Mr. T. expressed his satisfaction that Mr. COOK had explained his meaning; having believed, until he had made it, that his observations in regard to Missouri had been ironically intended. Mr. T. did not by any means consider the present motion as a trap, but as a serious proposition, which gentlemen would not find it easy to dispose of. There were members of this House who believed that Missouri was yet a territory. Mr. T. said he was not one of them; but those who did believe so would of course vote for the resolution. He was obliged, he said, to the gentleman from Virginia for having suggested what he had done in regard to the parallel between the proceedings of the British Parliament during our Revolution and those of the present Congress. He did remember himself many instances in which the petitions of the people of these States were refused to be received in Parliament because the petitioners did not correctly describe themselves. He remembered the letter of Washington was refused to be received because it purported to come from General Washington. Had not the people of Missouri a right to baptize themselves by such name as they chose? Mr. T. said he regretted that the Chair should have thought itself under the necessity of altering the Journal. The subject, in itself not very important, had been made so by the alteration of the Journal, which alteration it seemed had been made by the Speaker. It appeared to betray an unreasonable jealousy on this subject, to say the least of it. He begged the Speaker's pardon, he said—he did not mean to say that he felt this jealousy; but, in the course which he had taken, there was an overweening caution—an appearance of a jealousy which ought not to have been betrayed towards this people. Mr. T. said he trusted gentlemen would not feel much difficulty in voting on this question. We find, he said, that the question just taken, small as it was, has drawn a line across the United States. Let the Journal stand as it ought to do. Do not tell the people of Missouri, We are so jealous of you, we are fearful of your thrusting yourself into the Union, and partaking at the sacred board and drinking of the cup of wine. Do not say to them, We are so apprehensive you will come to the communion table by the name which you give yourselves, that we will give you no name. Mr. T. said he should vote against the proposed amendment, because, in his opinion, Missouri was a State, and not a Territory. Those who held the other opinion must be compelled to vote in favor of this proposition, or acknowledge that their ground was untenable.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, said, in regard to this motion, he did not, when up before, mean to insinuate that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PARKER) had meant to set a trap for others. He might have laid a snare without designing it. For himself, Mr. E. said, he believed Missouri was a State. He feared that the motion of the gentleman might be adopted, and that the misnomer would be entered on the Journal. For no other reason had he wished the motion to be withdrawn. He should vote against the motion with pleasure, because he believed Missouri had lost her territorial character and could not be otherwise than a State.

Mr. PARKER said he was placed in a difficult situation, by the application to him to withdraw his motion. Other friends were opposed to his withdrawing it. He had concluded to persist in it. It was not intended as a trap for any one. Had it been so intended, he did not know but that he might have found illustrious examples. It was not a question of mere form. The state of the vote just taken proved that it was not. The question in fact, as voted upon, had been, is Missouri a State or a Territory? If she was a Territory, as she had been voted not to be a State, why reject this proposition so to designate her? I say, said he, she is a State; and were I a citizen of that State I would never, at your suggestion, strike out that clause in the constitution to which objection has been made. If I found it convenient to myself to do so, I would; but I would not do it on your recommendation, even for the important boon of being admitted in the Union. I would rather be trodden down by the armies from the North and East, and, if you could get them, from the South, than yield this point; and I avow it in the face of the world. If ever on earth a people has been maltreated it is this people. There seemed, Mr. P. said, to be a suppression of something on that journal; because the very words which had been stricken out of it were to be found in the caption of the memorials. Why are they suppressed? For the purpose, evidently, of implying the other way. He was not for this mode of dealing; he was for having the facts stated in plain English, that all might understand them. Mr. P. said he wanted to hear no more of precedents here—he had heard more than enough of them; but if a matter was to stand for precedent, even as to the form of the Journal, he wished it should be a precedent either one way or other, and not a mere equivocation.

Mr. ROSS said, he was aware that the House had involved itself in some difficulty by the reception of the petitions in the form in which they were presented, as being from a State. They ought not to have been received in that form. Missouri, Mr. R. said, was either a Territory or a State. If she be a State, she is a State known to the Constitution of the United States. She is not one of the old original thirteen States. Has she ever been received into the Federal family as a State? She has not. Does she assume the character of a State without being so received? Does she tell you, we were once a Territory, but we have thrown off our territorial character, and assumed that of a State without your authority? If this doctrine is to be tolerated, said Mr. R., away with your forms of territorial government at once. Let your Territories at once assume the character of States. If Missouri be a State, she must be a lawful State. By what law is she made a State? It was sound orthodoxy in politics, that there cannot be a State within the territorial limits of the United States, without the authority of the Congress of the United States. Missouri was not a State by that authority, and he was perfectly ready to vote and declare his opinion that Missouri is now a Territory.

Mr. RHEA referred to the act of the last session

JANUARY, 1821.

Amendment of the Journal.

H. OF R.

of Congress, to show that Congress had authorized the people of Missouri to form a State government, and assume such name as they might think proper. They had assumed a name accordingly, and Mr. R. said it could not be taken from them except by law. This House, then, had given them the name, which was now refused to them on the Journal. Nay, at this very session a joint committee of the House, appointed to consider the subject, had reported a resolution, declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union. With respect to the Journal, Mr. R. said, the Speaker had a power over it analogous to that which a court has over the presentment of a jury—a power to alter it in manner or form, but not in substance. Mr. R. here required the Clerk to read the Journal, as it was before it was altered by the Speaker this morning.

The SPEAKER pronounced that it was not in order to read any Journal, as the Journal of the House, but that which had been corrected by its presiding officer.

After a few further remarks, to the same effect as the preceding, Mr. RHEA took his seat.

Mr. PLUMER said he had voted against the motion to insert the word "State," and he should vote against this, because he considered it not advisable or proper to decide incidentally a main question, and one which was much contested. To avoid affording precedents, for precedents had been already quoted from the Journal, he thought it proper to leave the Journal in its present shape, neither affirming nor denying any thing. He should, therefore, vote against the amendment now under consideration, as he had against that first proposed.

Mr. LOWNDES rose, in consequence of a suggestion from Mr. ROSS, to say, that when he yesterday presented these memorials, he distinctly stated, in audible words, that they were from the State of Missouri. He did not mean to enter into this question; but, he said, in the anxiety to escape one difficulty, the object of one of the memorials, at least, was presented on the Journal differently from what that object was. It was necessary that the object of each petition should be stated on the Journal of the day on which it was presented. By the erasure of the words "within the State" twice, where it ought to have occurred on the Journal, the objects of the memorialists were perverted. But he did not mean to enter into the discussion, having only risen to state the fact which occurred yesterday.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said, the House had decided one-half of the question respecting Missouri. They had decided what she is not, and must now say what she is. He put the question to gentlemen of the majority, whether they could, after their former votes, hazard the assertion that Missouri is not a Territory, which they must do by voting against this amendment? If they did not now declare her a Territory, the course they had hitherto pursued stood condemned by their own votes, because every man knows that Missouri is either a Territory or a State. He hoped, he said, that gentlemen would not shrink from the consequences of their own vote. He called upon them to stand to it. If they refused to do so, he should consider their refusal, as he did their refusal the other day to consider the resolution offered by him, as a proof that they were not willing to meet the consequences of the votes which they had given. He appealed to the pride of gentlemen to meet this question. One word more—who are the memorialists? In what light must we consider them? In the character which they profess—in that which they assume. Can you, said Mr. A., receive a paper which these people present to you, and fashion it according to your conceptions, and not according to theirs? Must you not pursue the course, if you do not receive it as offered, of rejecting it altogether, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio? His honorable colleague had said that the conduct of this House towards Missouri equalled the tyrannous proceedings of the British Parliament towards this country. Mr. A. said, it not only equalled, but went beyond it. If, said he, you can change the character of the memorialists, I should like to know whether you cannot likewise alter their prayer, and make it unlike the prayer they intended? And would any man say that this House could receive a petition from any quarter, and make it what it was not intended to be?

Mr. ANDERSON said his friends, he apprehended, would, in the course they were now pursuing, find themselves in the situation in which men are very apt to be when they act under the influence of passion rather than of reason—in the wrong. It is always wrong to fight where you cannot but sustain defeat. It is always wrong for a minority to irritate a majority; and this motion could have no other effect but to irritate. It is the essence of determination that it prove something. But the vote on this motion would prove nothing. Nothing would be gained by it, and nothing would be lost. How can that be substance, which, whether lost or won, means nothing? No ingenuity could make of it any thing but a matter of words.

As to the subject of the main question, not now presented, no man could feel more anxiety than he; no man's mind was more excited, by day and by night, on that subject. By conciliation, said he, we may succeed in ultimately procuring what I consider a correct decision on it; by exasperation we are sure to fail. I deny, said he, that the vote which has just been taken proves that Missouri is not a State. It proved nothing else but that, in the opinion of those who voted against the amendment, the description in the Journal is sufficient and intelligible. Mr. A. deprecated all attempts to exasperate the majority as injudicious and impolitic; it was not by such a course that the object of the friends of Missouri could be attained.

Mr. BARBOUR assured the gentleman from Kentucky, that, as far as he had any thing to do with this subject, he was not acting under the influence of exasperation, but of an earnest wish to do what was right. If gentlemen were not disposed to express any opinion on this subject, the proper course would be to propose an indefinite postponement. But, if a direct vote were taken on the proposed amendment, no reason satisfactory to him could be assigned for voting against it, except that Missouri is not in fact a "Territory." Gentlemen called it by different names; but, call it by what name they would, a memorial had been presented from two organized branches of what he called the Legislature of the State of Missouri. For what purpose? Did the Representatives of the people of that State mean to intrude into the councils of the nation in regard to all the public lands within our almost illimitable bounds? Certainly not; and yet, by the erasure of the words "within the said State," their memorial was made to bear that construction. This observation Mr. B. made to show that this was not a mere dispute about words. With regard to the question before the House, he thought it one of considerable importance. If nothing had been done to the Journal; if it had followed the recital of the memorial, there would have been some plausibility in the remark that it was unimportant. But, by the alterations which had been made, a new description had been given to the memorial; and the decision of the House had the effect of expressing a determination to get rid of the description which the memorialists gave to themselves and to their memorial, &c. With regard to the precedent, Mr. B. said, if the Journal were permitted to stand in its present shape, it would afford a much stronger precedent than many which are introduced to influence the decisions of this House. In conclusion, Mr. B. made some remark, which caused the Speaker to repeat his decision, that "there is no Journal but that which is before the House as corrected by the presiding officer, and read by the Clerk."

Mr. COBB said, as he was desirous to hear the Journal read as originally written, he must appeal from the decision of the Chair on this point.

The question on the appeal having been stated from the Chair—

Mr. LOWNDES expressed his regret that his friend from Georgia had made this appeal, and his hope that it would not be pressed to a question. If it were determined that the Journal should be read as first written, the principle would apply to the whole detail of composing the Journal, and thence to the minutest particulars of it, which would show that the Journal, as presented to the House in form, was the only Journal of which the House properly had cognizance, &c.

Mr. COBB withdrew his appeal.

Mr. MERCER was called up by what had fallen from Mr. ANDERSON. In the course which he had taken, Mr. M. said, the last sentiment of his heart was disrespect to the majority of the House. It was awful anxiety, and not passion, which he felt on this subject. Much less did he wish to draw the House into a discussion whether Missouri is a State or not, on a motion to amend the Journal. Mr. M. said he was sorry that any question had arisen involving the Chair; he thought, with the Speaker, that what had passed out of the House in regard to this Journal ought not to be known in it, and that the corrected form of the Journal only ought to be considered as before the House. He deprecated any thing like irritation as much as any one. Nothing but a sentiment of mutual forbearance, of good-will to each other, of high respect and confidence, could lead the House to correct decisions on so difficult a subject as the main question respecting Missouri. That was, he said, a subject of great importance. If Missouri was not a State, all her present proceedings were contrary to law. If it were so, and under her laws a man was convicted of a crime, and punished with death, it was murder! Every sentence of a court was void, and every verdict of a jury. Every act of her Legislature, superseding the regular course of the laws of the United States, was treason! He implored of gentlemen to pause before they finally pronounced a decision which would be crowned with such terrible results.

Mr. WARFIELD said he should of course vote against this motion, on the same grounds as he had voted against the preceding one, viz: that the alleged and proposed alteration of the Journal was neither important nor material; that the alteration objected to had been made by the competent authority, and that there was nothing in it which required the interposition of this House; that, if it could be made to touch the main question with regard to the actual relation of Missouri to the Union, that was a question which it would not be proper to decide in the manner in which this question had been submitted to the House.

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland, said he should not have risen, were it not that he was one of those who believed that Missouri is now a Territory of the United States, and yet should vote against the proposition. His object was that the Journal should conform to the fact. In his opinion, it does so at present. It was in vain to tell the House that this was a matter of importance. It was a mere dispute between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. It was impossible, by any mode of argument, to make that important which is of no importance. By voting on the motion, as had been well observed, the House would decide nothing. With all deference and respect to gentlemen, it appeared to him that this course of proceeding was idle. In my estimation, said he, Missouri is a Territory of the Union, and will so remain until she is Constitutionally admitted into the Union. He would not present his whole view of this question. It was enough to say, that Congress has no power in regard to States, but the power to admit new States into the Union. Have we said that Missouri is admitted into the Union? No. She is not then a State of this Union. Is she independent? I say not; because, first, she is not in rebellion against the General Government; she has not set our authority at defiance; and, because, secondly, Congress could not make her an independent State, inasmuch as the power of Congress is to admit new States into the Union, and not to make States of any other description.

The question being then taken on the motion to insert the words "the Territory of" before the word "Missouri," in the clause of the Journal first above recited, it was decided by yeas and nays. The yeas were MESSRS. MALLARY, ROSS, STRONG, of Vermont, and UPHAM. All the other votes, 150 in number, were in the negative.

Amendment of the Journal.

H. OF R.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR then moved to amend the entry in the Journals by inserting, after the words "public lands," the words "in the late Territory of Missouri."

Mr. ROSS moved to amend the amendment by striking out of it the word "late."

Mr. BARBOUR showed that this motion presented precisely the same question just decided in the negative by a vote of 150 to 4. His object was merely to give a correct recital of the memorial. Suppose it were a memorial from the late Bank of the United States, and it were proposed to strike out the word "late," the House would see how essentially the fact would be varied by such an alteration, &c.

Mr. STORRS, on inspecting the Journal and memorial, expressed his impression that the entry, as it stood, was not incompatible with the contents of the memorial.

Mr. WARFIELD considered this again as a mere matter of form, and thought it perfectly immaterial whether it was inserted or not, as he thought of the first proposition. As, however, the House appeared to be in no manner relieved from difficulty by the decisions already made, he moved, in order to get rid at once of any difficulty on the subject, to reconsider the vote on the first motion, which was, to insert the words "the State of," before Missouri.

The question on reconsideration having been stated—

Mr. BROWN spoke in expression of his satisfaction at the question being again presented, and in support of the principle, that, where there was an attempt to violate personal or political rights, resistance was a duty, not to be departed from for any views of conciliation.

Mr. ROSS expressed his astonishment at this motion for reconsideration, and, without accusing any one of inconsistency, said he should consider himself extremely inconsistent had he voted against the motion at first, and then moved to reconsider it.

Mr. ROBERTSON expressed his pleasure that there was again a prospect that the Journal would be made to conform to the fact, which he argued to show that it did not at present.

Mr. FOOR said, that the last vote showed that the insertion of these words would decide nothing, and need therefore not be objected to, inasmuch as only four members of the House had voted Missouri to be a Territory, though so many were known to believe her to be a Territory.

Mr. WARFIELD defended himself from the insinuation of inconsistency. He considered it the right of every man to change and to retract his opinions on conviction. With regard to his legislative proceedings, he said he held himself amenable to those who did him the honor of giving him a seat here, and he held himself responsible no where else. He assigned reasons why he had made his motion, arising from the maze of perplexing questions in which, by disagreeing to the first motion, the House seemed to be getting deeper and deeper involved.

The question on Mr. WARFIELD's motion for reconsideration of the first vote was then decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Fisher, Floyd, Foot, Garnett, Gray, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hill, Hooks, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Little, Lowndes, McCoy, McCrary, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, T. L. Moore, Neale, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parker of Virginia, Pinckney, Randolph, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Robertson, Settle, Shaw, Simkins, Smith of Maryland, A. Smyth of Virginia, Stevens, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Walker, Warfield, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Anderson, Baker, Beecher, Boden, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Clagett, Clark, Cook, Crafts, Cushman, Dane, Darlington, Dennison, Dickinson, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Fay, Folger, Fuller, Gorham, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of Delaware, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hishman, Hobart, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Maclay, McCullough, Mallary, Marchand, Moneli, R. Moore, S. Moore, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Nelson of Massachusetts, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Philson, Plumer, Rich, Richards, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sergeant, Silsbee, Sloan, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Tarr, Tomlinson, Tracy, Udree, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Wendover, Whitman, and Wood—77.

So the House refused to reconsider the first vote of to-day.

Mr. BARBOUR, who had withdrawn his motion, to make way for that of Mr. WARFIELD, now renewed it, as stated above; and

Mr. ROSS renewed his motion to amend it, by striking out the word "late." The House, he said, had just solemnly decided, the second time, that the memorials were not from the State of Missouri—yet this amendment proposed to describe it as being from the late Territory, &c., meaning from the State of Missouri.

Mr. BARBOUR asked of the gentleman whether the House had not, with equal solemnity, and by a vote of 150 to 4, decided that Missouri is not a Territory; and whether his amendment, if it succeeded, would not be in the teeth of that decision?

The question was then taken on Mr. ROSS's motion, and negatively by a large majority.

Mr. STORRS moved to amend Mr. BARBOUR's amendment, so as to read, "in the United States," instead of "in the late Territory of Missouri."

Mr. RANDOLPH in rising said, that the errors of the wisest men are not the least. The House had just refused to strike out the word "late" from the amendment under consideration, and had of course decided that it should be retained; so that, if the amendment of the gentleman from New York prevailed, it would read, "in the late United States!" How was it competent for the gentleman from New York to move, as a substitute for the amendment of his colleague, a recital not according to the words of the petition, but such as he wished the words of the petition had been? If the recital was to correspond with the fact, the House should reinstate the words of the memorial, the erasure of which had led to all this—he would not say what; but, if he were anywhere else, he would say—shuffling and cutting.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, made a point of order, whether the motion of Mr. STORRS was not a substitute for that of Mr. BARBOUR, and therefore out of order.

The SPEAKER decided that the word "late," though the House had refused to strike it out by itself, might be stricken out in connexion with other words, as now proposed. He also decided that the motion of Mr. STORRS, to strike out a part, but not the whole, of Mr. BARBOUR's amendment, was not a substitute so as to bring it within the rule; illustrating it by a reference to the common practice of moving to strike out the whole of a bill, except the enacting clause, in order to introduce a bill in a different form. He, therefore, pronounced Mr. STORRS's motion to be in order.

The question was then taken on Mr. STORRS's motion, and decided in the negative.

During the past and following proceedings, various ineffectual attempts were made to procure an adjournment.

Mr. COOK moved, in order to get rid of this question altogether, to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of this subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, in a speech of some length, protested against the postponement. The Journals, he said, were distorted, and not made up as they ought to be, because the word Missouri occurred in them. What is Missouri? said he; is it a river? Is it a tribe of Indians? Why should we shrink from reciting her proper title on the Journal, when we find she has presented us a constitution of State government? Will we suffer it to be said, that sectional feelings have operated to prevent us from correcting our Journals so as to make them what they ought to be? If this question was not connected with Missouri, would there be any hesitation in making the proposed amendment? Mr. J. went on to say, that he trusted the House would go on and vote, that the Journals should declare the truth. I wish, said he, the Journal to show why we are opposed to correcting the Journals, and who we are that oppose it, and not to give these questions the go-by, as now proposed.

Mr. BRUSH demanded, whether it was in order to move to postpone indefinitely a motion to amend the Journal.

The SPEAKER decided that it is in order. There were, he said, certain forms of questions prescribed by the Rules of the House, and their relative rank assigned them. It was not for the Chair, but for the House, to judge of the propriety of those questions, when proposed. Being proposed, it became his duty to propound them to the House.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, objected to this decision; and demanded whether, as a proposition to amend could not be postponed without postponing the main question, which, in the present case, was the Journal, it was in order thus to postpone the Journal?

Mr. EUSTIS suggested for consideration whether every difficulty could not be avoided by directing the whole of the memorials from Missouri to be inserted on the Journal, instead of a description of them.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion to postpone a question to amend the Journal is in order. The Journal, he said, is a subject on which no question is to be put, until a question is made by a proposition to amend it. A motion to postpone that question, therefore, it being the only question, was evidently in order.

Mr. COOK disclaimed any intention to evade the question. He had made the motion to postpone, in order to get rid of irritating and unnecessary debate. As he had failed in this object, he withdrew the motion for postponement.

The question recurring on Mr. BARBOUR's motion to amend the Journal—

Mr. ANDERSON called for the reading of the memorial, to show that the amendment was not necessary, and might be dispensed with.

Mr. CULBRETH said he had been accidentally absent, this morning, on the vote to insert the word State as applied to Missouri, and he wished he could have an opportunity to record his vote on that principle. At first he had thought that the present question would afford him that opportunity; but, during the discussion, he had examined the Journal and the memorial, and he was convinced that the amendment, if agreed to, would make the prayer of the memorial what it is not. He should therefore vote against it.

The question was taken on agreeing to Mr. BARBOUR's motion to insert "the late Territory of" before the word "Missouri," and decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 79, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Anderson, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Crowell, Cuthbert, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Garnett, Gray, Hall of North Carolina, Hooks, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Little, Lowndes, McCoy, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, T. So the motion was rejected.

As soon as this decision was pronounced, several persons addressing the Chair at once, a motion to adjourn obtained the preference.

Before the question was put, a member inquired whether an adjournment now would preclude any amendment of the Journal of yesterday on tomorrow?

The SPEAKER decided that it would, unless a motion to amend it were the unfinished business at the time of adjournment on this day.

The question on the motion to adjourn being decided affirmatively, here ended the controversy respecting the Journal.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the military service of the United States for the year 1821," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

SATURDAY, January 13.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Holmes, of Alabama," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the same committee, made a report on the petition of Francis B. Languille, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice and committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill for the relief of John Rodriguez.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of Matthew Dockery, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice and committed.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian College, in the District of Columbia," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Gabriel Berzat, deceased," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the decision of cases arising within States in which there is no circuit court, and where the district Judge, from any cause, may decline to adjudicate.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting the number of French vessels which have arrived, and are expected to arrive in the present year, in the river St. Mary's, since the first of July last, and whether their cargoes are intended to be illicitly introduced into the United States, &c., made in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 20th ultimo; which report was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the military service of the United States for the year 1821," was read, and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. STREET, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing in force the act, entitled "An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war," and the several acts amending and extending the same, which acts will expire on the 15th day of May next.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. TRACY on the 11th instant, and, the same being again read, was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, after a few remarks on the propriety of the inquiry which he was about to propose, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, offices in the civil department of Government may be abolished without prejudice to the public interest; and also whether any of the salaries or compensations now allowed by law to the officers and other persons employed in the said civil department, and, if any, what, and to what extent, may be, consistently with justice and sound policy, reduced.

Mr. CULBRETH, after observing that it had been his intention to offer a similar motion himself, if no other gentleman had done so, moved to amend the resolution so as to refer the inquiry to a special committee instead of the Committee of Ways and Means, deeming the latter committee not competent, consistently with a due attention to its numerous ordinary duties, to bestow on this subject the necessary attention.

This motion to amend the resolution, brought on a discussion of more than an hour's continuance, on the question whether it was better to refer the inquiry to the Committee of Ways and Means, a select committee, or to the committees severally appointed on the expenditures of the different departments, (which last course was suggested by Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia.) Messrs. CULBRETH, ROBERTSON, SMITH, of Maryland, STORRS, SMYTH, of Virginia, FOOT, GROSS, of New York, TRIMBLE, and LOWNDES, joined in the debate, which referred principally to the duties of different committees of the House, their nature, &c., and the possibility of discharging fully and properly the duty proposed by this resolution. After two unsuccessful motions to lay the resolution on the table, the debate ended by adopting Mr. CULBRETH'S amendment. Being thus amended,

The resolution was agreed to; and Messrs. CULBRETH, ROBERTSON, FOOT, STORRS, HEMPHILL, TRIMBLE, and ALLEN, of New York, were appointed the committee.

JOURNAL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. REID, of Georgia, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The resolutions which I hold in my hand were prepared yesterday, and should have been then submitted, but for the anxiety of the House to adjourn, and the lateness of the hour. They are now presented, not with any view to promote or prolong excitement, because I believe excitement to be unfavorable to correct legislation; nor do I intend any remark which I may offer to be disrespectful to the officer chosen to preside over the deliberations of this House. Self-respect, if there were no other reason, would not permit me to pursue such a course; but I desire to mark, by an expression of the opinion of the House, an event which, were I more conversant with legislative proceedings, I would say, is the most extraordinary of its kind to be found in parliamentary annals.

The Constitution of the United States requires both Houses of Congress to keep a Journal of their proceedings, and, for the purpose of giving effect to this provision, the usage of the House and the acts of government have made it the duty of the Clerk to keep a correct account of the daily proceedings, while, by the rules of the House, it is made the duty of the Speaker to "examine and correct the Journal" of the Clerk. But, that no error may escape unnoticed, and that the history of our transactions may be entirely faithful, the Journal of the preceding day is read daily, in the face of the House. Is this a mere ceremony, a form, which, adopted without object, may be suspended without injury? It appears to me to be altogether of substance, because both the Speaker and the Clerk are mere agents in the compilation of the Journal, and, consequently, the House is entitled to the supervision of their conduct. Every member, having sworn to support the Constitution, which requires the House to keep a Journal of its proceedings, is deeply interested—as much so as the obligation of an oath can make him—in the proper performance of the duties, which, in this respect, devolve upon the Clerk and the Speaker. If then an error be produced, whether by the negligence of the Clerk or the supposed corrections of the Speaker, the House surely possesses the power to apply the corrective by amending the Journal—restoring it to its original shape, or in such other manner as its wisdom may devise.

What shall be done upon the present occasion will best be known by a resort to the facts as they exist. They are these: a member presents, in his place, a memorial from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Missouri; he announces, as is his duty, the purport and the character of the petition; the document is received by the House, referred to one of its committees, and the Clerk, as he is bound to do, minutes the transaction among the occurrences of the day. The Speaker, when he comes to perform his duty, erases the words "State of," and, when the corrected Journal is presented to the House, it recites, that the member presented the memorial of Missouri. Now, the question is—has the Speaker performed his duty, under the rule of the House, or has he acted without the pale of the authority which that rule conveys to him? If the erasure be within the rule, there is an end of the matter, and I am trespassing unnecessarily upon your patience, and doing injustice to the Speaker. But, if the Speaker has altered without correcting your Journal, his act is void, because it is beyond his authority, and is itself an error, which demands the correction of the House. Did the Speaker, when he applied his pen to the Journal, describe the fact as it had taken place more truly than it had been described by the Clerk? No, sir. The Clerk stated what had happened exactly as it did happen. Now, the rule is—the Speaker shall "examine and correct" the Journal. The power to correct implies the existence of error. There was no error, not even the slightest mistake. The Speaker had, then, no duty to perform, and any other journal than that in which the Clerk had truly recorded the proceedings of the House is not the true, but a spurious journal. The act of the Speaker was gratuitous and without warrant.

But it may be said, as I think it was yesterday, that the Speaker is to be justified, because he had stated the actual fact. That is to say, he has refused to designate Missouri as a State, because she is not a State. I know that there are varying opinions; that some gentlemen consider Missouri a State; others, quasi a State; others, a Territory; while there are some some who do not clearly express what their opinions are. With this subject, I have at present no concern. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. The question is not, whether the true quality of Missouri should appear upon the Journals; but whether it shall appear as represented in her memorial, in the announcement of the member presenting that memorial, and in the act of the House receiving it. If an individual, arrogating a title to which he has no claim, present his petition to the House, and it be determined to listen to his plaint, no one will contend that the Clerk or the Speaker, in making up or correcting the Journal, has a right to inquire into the legitimacy of the dignity assumed. It is not their duty to ingraft the fact upon the Journal, contrary to the representation of the petitioner, and the determination of the House to hear him in the character he has chosen to adopt; but it is their duty to detail events as they actually occurred, although these may involve falsehoods, and misrepresentations.

Sir, if Missouri had presented herself in borrowed feathers, it was the duty of this House, by plucking them from her, to have exposed her in the nakedness of her deformity. If she assumed a rank incompatible with your dignity, or a tone and a style too lofty, you should at once have taught her language more humble, and admonished her, that she was not yet fitted to occupy the station to which she aspired. But, did you do this? No, sir. Whatever may be the matter or the manner of her memorial, you received it. That it was received, was noted by the proper officer, under your order; and you referred it for investigation to a committee. Now, these are solemn measures adopted by the House, and, I ask, have they been rescinded by the same authority? No; not by the alteration of your Journal; an alteration not governed by any known rule prescribed by this body. Is it come to this? Shall the officers of this House frame the Journals of the House according to any vague notions of propriety which they may entertain? If, indeed, they have this power, they may mould and alter, and garble, and destroy, until your diary shall wear the semblance of romance, rather than of history. If we yield them such a power, we are apostates from the true faith; we are no longer the representatives of freemen; we are ourselves slaves, and, what is worse, willing slaves.

It may certainly happen that the House, from inadvertence, or some other cause, may be led into mistake, and may order that to be recorded which should not of right have a place. It may then be the duty of the Speaker to point out the impropriety, leaving it to be corrected at the will of the House. He cannot go further; he cannot alter the solemn acts of the House, upon the presumption that they were irregularly or unadvisedly done.

I have heard it suggested that this is a little matter; which does not deserve our consideration. If it be so, why were words so harmless and unimportant stricken from the Journal? Their very insignificance should have protected them; the more especially as they corresponded with the fact as it transpired. But it is not a good reason against resisting any innovation, to say that it is so slight nothing is to be feared from it. A delegated authority should be jealously watched, or it will rapidly extend itself beyond its prescribed boundaries. We are told in Arabian story that a mist, rising from the bosom of the ocean, which the gentlest breeze might have dissipated, took to itself consistency and form, and became a monstrous and a fearful giant. It is thus with the encroachments of power—at first scarcely perceived, at last not to be opposed. Constant attrition will waste even the rock of ages!

Before I sit down, I would controvert a doctrine which has received the sanction of high authority. It is, that the House has no authority to ask the reading of the original draught of the Journal, because none other can be read than that corrected by the Speaker. Sir, it may be shown—I think it has been shown—that the House is the ultimate judge of the correctness of its own Journal, and it has a right to inquire, whether the Speaker has corrected it, as he has the power to do, or altered it without authority. How, then, is the House to exercise this right, if you withhold the data upon which its decision must be founded? Shall members inquire among themselves for the facts, with a view to the correction of mistakes or faults? One will answer, he was absent; another, he was engaged; a third, he was inattentive.

Apply to the Clerk, and he will say his duties are so numerous, and so many the subjects he is forced to record, that, if he must shut his eyes to the Journal, he can give you no account of the matter; but, if you will allow him to read from the Journal itself, he can divest it of interlineations and erasures, and tell you how it originally stood. It is only by a comparison of the Journal, after it has received the correction of the Speaker, with what it was in the hands of the Clerk, that you can be prepared to decide upon the propriety or impropriety of their corrections. Suppose a mischievous or malignant individual were, covertly, to find access to your records, and should vitiate them by blots and scrawls. When you sought to restore them to their true shape, would you not call upon the Clerk to decipher to you their original reading? The case is perfectly parallel, if an officer of the House have so altered the Journal that it no longer retains its true form.

I have considered it a duty to say thus much, by way of preface to the resolutions I offer. I will only add, if the Speaker has done that which he ought not to have done, it comports with the dignity of the House to assert its own rights. Let us ever cling to truth and justice, and resist even their slightest violation with the utmost pertinacity.

Mr. R. then handed the following resolutions to the Chair:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Speaker, under the rules of the House, to examine and correct the Journals of the House.

Resolved, That the House possesses the right to inquire into and decide upon the propriety of any correction which may be made by the Speaker.

Resolved, That the erasures made by the Speaker in the Journal of the 11th January are alterations, and not corrections, inasmuch as the Journal, in its original form, corresponds with the fact intended to be described, viz: that a petition from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Missouri was presented by a member from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER having propounded the question, Will the House now proceed to consider these resolutions? it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Archer of Virginia, Barbour, Bayly, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Cobb, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Davidson, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Garnett, Gray, Hall of North Carolina, Johnson, Little, McCoy, McLean of Kentucky, Meigs, Metcalf, T. So the House refused now to consider the resolutions.

MONDAY, January 15.

On the Journal of Saturday being read—

Mr. REID, stated that, in speaking of the petition from the Legislature of Missouri, he meant to have styled it a memorial and not a petition, moved that the Journal be amended by substituting, in the third resolution moved by him, the word "memorial" for the word "petition." And the question thereon being taken, it was decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of John Thomas, a Major General of the militia of Kentucky, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS also made a report on the case of Henry Cain, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill giving further time for the redemption of lands sold for taxes under the act of August 2, 1813, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer certain balances of appropriations to the surplus fund; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported a bill to regulate the duties on imports and for other purposes, accompanied by a detailed report on the subject. The bill having been twice read, Mr. BALDWIN moved to refer it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed this course, as giving it a preference over ordinary business. Mr. BALDWIN replied, that the same direction had been given, at this session, to several bills, that for the reduction of the army, &c., not more important than this. The motion of Mr. BALDWIN prevailed, by a vote of 65 to 61. The ordinary number of copies of the bill and report were ordered to be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. BEECHER moved to print three thousand copies of the report. On this motion there were some remarks made. The printing of an extra number was opposed by Messrs. CULBRETH, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, FOOT, and TYLER, on the ground that the subject had been so much discussed for two or three years past, that the report, however able, could hardly be expected to shed much additional light on the subject; that the distribution of these documents, among the people, must always be partial and limited, though the number were larger than proposed; that the expense of the printing proposed would be greater than the benefit to accrue from it. To this Mr. BEECHER opposed the importance of the subject, the great interest the people felt in it, and the propriety of making generally known the views of the committee of this House on the subject. The motion of Mr. BEECHER was, in the end, negatived by a vote of 73 to 61.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the same committee, to whom have also been referred, during the present session, sundry petitions and memorials in relation to the imposition of duties on sales at auction, reported a bill laying duties on sales of merchandise at auction; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of James Brady, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army.

Mr. RUSS submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement of the precise amount of special deposits to the credit of the Treasury of the United States, which is referred to in his supplementary report of the 28th ultimo, as not being available the current year; stating particularly of what such deposits consist; if, of depreciated bank paper, the bank or banks which issued the same, with the amount by each, and the present current specie value thereof, and the year or years, respectively, when the same was received.

On motion of Mr. EUSTIS, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him, for the conditional admission of Missouri into the Union; and, on his motion, in order that it might not interrupt the discussion of the Army bill, it was referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the House then took up the resolve from the Senate, for the admission of Missouri into the Union; and it was read a second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill from the Senate "to incorporate the Columbia College of the District of Columbia," was about to be read a third time, when

Mr. CAMPBELL objected to this bill taking a course different from the ordinary practice in regard to bills, which was, to refer them to a Committee of the Whole for discussion.

Mr. MERCER earnestly pressed the bill to a decision without commitment, and expressed great satisfaction in having it in his power to vote on a bill of this description, having for its object the encouragement of learning, &c., in the District.

After considerable conversation on the subject between Messrs. MERCER, STORRS, and CAMPBELL—

The bill was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed for the use of members.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting certain documents in relation to correspondence with foreign Governments on the subject of the slave trade, accidentally omitted to be transmitted from the Department of State, when the documents were sent which have been already published.

The documents now sent are the following :

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated 19th November, 1819.

Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Rush, 11th of November, 1819.

Address from House of Commons, 7th July, 1819, to the Prince Regent.

Mr. Rush to Lord Castlereagh, 16th of November, 1819.

The Message was read, and referred to the committee having that subject under consideration.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce the Military Peace Establishment.

Mr. SIMKINS's motion to strike out the first section of the bill being yet under consideration—

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, said, at the commencement of the debate he had no intention of taking any part in the discussion on this question; it was his choice, and he would have been content to have given a silent vote; but the course it had taken, and the manner in which it had been agitated, had given it additional importance, and, like all other subjects of a national character, had a tendency to excite the interest and feelings of members, and diffuse its influence throughout the nation, and, as iron sharpens iron, he felt a participation of public feeling, as it passed along, and the few remarks he had to make, although they might not shed much light or have much influence, he felt himself bound to offer.

Sir, by the provisions of this bill we are about to embark in the important business of retrenchment, and he fondly hoped that the Representatives of the people, on this proposition, would prove themselves the guardians of their interest; and, although he was disposed to believe there were favorable symptoms, an impulse of public feeling in this House, to correspond with the principle in reducing our national expenditures within the provisions of our revenue, yet, in the progress of this inquiry, our prospects are not so promising as could be wished or expected; as the diversity of opinions which appears to be entertained, relative to the measures that should be adopted, seems to be the only impediment in our way, the greatest obstacle which can prevent us from arriving at the object we all wish to accomplish. If there is an inherent weakness, an inefficiency in republics, it must be in a division of their councils, in the want of unanimity in their national policy. From the views taken on this question, it is clearly discovered that our opinions are various. Different directions of policy are pointed out to arrive at the principle. Some gentlemen have strong objections to a reduction of the Army, as if it would leave our country defenceless, without physical strength, and liable to be assailed from every quarter. Others are zealously devoted to the establishment of the Navy. It must stand unimpaired, not to be touched by unskilful hands. Not one ship or vessel ought to be diminished or spared from the service. Our flag must float on the ocean, not a sail to be taken down. A favorite system seems to prevail with all. We cannot unite in measures to effect a change of so much importance, in which our country is so deeply interested. It is incumbent and indispensably necessary, that some concessions of policy be made—some relinquishment of political opinion on all sides. What is legislation but the surrender of private sentiment for public good? It is peculiarly necessary that, in this redeeming principle, we make some sacrifice—must part with our Delilahs, or we shall not be able to return to the narrow path of economy from which we have deviated. For, unless this course be adopted, all our efforts will be unavailing.

Sir, there are three alternatives presented to our view, which must be the result of our deliberation, and one of them we must adopt, to rescue our country from the present state of embarrassment. To borrow money, to tax our citizens, or retrench; to borrow money in the sunshine of peace and tranquillity, when the desert blossoms as the rose, no foreign wars to encounter, no enemy to contend with, is at variance, and almost irreconcilable with wise and economical legislation. To tax our citizens at such a time, and under auspices so favorable, is a measure that would present an odious and frightful prospect, the people would not bear with it, nor with us in pursuing such a policy. They would hold us accountable for our legislative conduct—our responsibility is pledged. They have confided to us their best interest, and we must return and submit to the tribunal of public opinion.

Sir, we believe to retrench is practicable, and within the reach of the present inquiry. The exhausted state of our Treasury points out the necessity of a radical change in the system of our finances, to provide for the national exigencies without oppressing our citizens, and demands our unremitting endeavors to remedy the evil. But, sir, on this principle I have no prepossessions to gratify, no personalities in view, no anxious solicitude for any department in preference to another. Let the denunciation be equal and general. If justice is to be the standard by which we are to exercise our judgment in correcting the excesses of Government, let it be administered with equal hands. If your Army is too large, and exceeds the proper number necessary for the Peace Establishment, reduce it to such proportion as may be adequate to the present day. If your Navy be too extensive or expensive, lessen it, leaving only so many vessels as are necessary for our maritime protection. If there are any or many supernumerary officers created for the purpose of emolument, abolish them; take a skirt from every garment, in order to attempt the principle of reduction. We have made our first approach towards the Army, as the most formidable branch of our expenditures, consisting of ten thousand men, a number considered at the end of the war barely sufficient to guard our posts, and protect the nation from danger.

The present bill proposes a reduction of that army to six thousand; and from the view I have taken, I am bound to believe it will safely admit of that reduction without danger or inconvenience to Government. In the remarks I am about to make in favor of reducing the Army, I trust I shall not be misunderstood as to calculate I entertain any hostile propensities or unfriendly feelings towards the Military Department. No, sir; I am one of the last men who would attempt to prostrate its honors, or put down military science. I know the sufferings and privations of military men; I venerate the character of a soldier, in the exercise of his profession; in the performance of his duty in defence of his country; but, Mr. Chairman, I have a most high and unqualified respect for the militiaman, the citizen, and the soldier, employed in the humble occupations of domestic life, cultivating his farm, and reaping the fruits of the soil, contributing in his place both to the support and defence of his country; nor do I entertain any fearful apprehensions of the danger of military power from military men, or from any army that could be raised or concentrated in this nation; the people, in their aggregate capacity, having the supreme power wisely placed in their hands, are feelingly alive to all their interests, and will ever, with a watchful and vigilant eye, hold a jealous control over their liberties, and will not suffer any excess in the different establishments of Government. Nor do I believe it has ever entered into the speculative view of any of the commanders of our armies, since the commencement of our Government, to attempt such an innovation on the liberties of the people. Such an enterprise would be as romantic and disastrous as Don Quixotte buffeting his wind-mill. I believe we have always had the purest military on earth, with the solitary exception of one general officer of the Revolutionary war whose name is too disgraceful and too well known to mention in this place. A Cæsar, a Scylla, a Kouli Khan, could have no place here. Tyrants could not long breathe in our Republican atmosphere; but, Mr. Chairman, as much as I venerate and esteem the well disciplined soldiery of my country, it must be confessed they are only the minute-hand to government, auxiliaries called to our assistance and defence in time of war and invasion. It is then, and not till then, they are wanted, and really necessary; and could my vision penetrate so far as to discriminate and discern the exact number necessary to be retained in service, was it six, ten, or twenty thousand, that number should have my support, were I convinced they were required for the safety and protection of the nation. But, from what has been presented to our view in the peaceful and tranquil situation of our country, it must be believed that six thousand men are competent to all the purposes of the present Peace Establishment, and the best guess we can make. Gentlemen opposed to the reduction of the Army, advocate the doctrine of maintaining a strong military force in order to be prepared for the event of war. This would be going beyond the bounds of Constitutional prescription, which declares that standing armies ought not to be kept up in time of peace, and would only be preparing to be prepared for such a crisis. Should war come as it has come, your regulars will commence hostilities, and begin the conflict.

But, as it has been in the old war of the Revolution and in the late war, the militia will have to end the contest, and give the last blow. Sir, the militia is our stronghold and sure pledge; they are recognised as such by all the States: and upon the faith and reliance of the yeomanry of our country, our Government was founded, as our support in peace and defence in war; and experience has assured us that our confidence has not been misplaced. It has been said, in very emphatical language, that the militia will not stand the fire of the cannon, or the point of the bayonet; be it so—in some instances,

He that in battle runs away,
Will live to fight another day.

But, to where do they retreat? not to the enemy, but to their homes—to the bosom of their country, there to renew their courage, and to recruit their strength, and return to the conflict with renewed vigor and enthusiasm. The art of war is a science that must be learned, as well as a mechanic his trade, or a lawyer or a physician his profession. Sir, towards the latter period of the Revolutionary war, in the Southern section of the Union, the courage and patriotism of the militia were almost unparalleled and proverbial. It was said of them as of the ancient Parthians who defeated the Roman legions, that when advancing to the attack they were invincible and not to be resisted; and when they retreated, in their flight were not to be overtaken. Sir, the valor and heroism of the militia, both in the old and new war, is covered and attested by a cloud of witnesses; and had I not heard an odium cast on the courage and patriotism of that class of our citizens, my voice should not have been heard on this occasion, nor should I have taken any part in this debate. But, sir, it is with no small sensations of gratitude that I find myself at this time placed in a situation so as to become the humble advocate of the militia of my country, whose valor, courage, and skill, in military science, has been witnessed throughout the continent. To sanction the position, I am under no necessity of recourse to history or far-fetched testimony. The facts are within my reach and personal recollection. At a late period in the Revolutionary war, when times were gloomy, and desperation stared us in the face, and was thought by some all was lost, at the memorable battle of King's Mountain, where Major Ferguson, a celebrated British officer, with a force of veterans detached from Cornwallis's army, having penetrated to the mountains to the extreme parts on the frontiers of North Carolina; and on his return, as he believed from a triumph over the rebels, was pursued by the militia of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee, commanded by Colonels Campbell, Shelby, and Sevier, officers whose memory will be perpetuated, and live in their country while their country lives; and overtaken at King's Mountain, South Carolina, was beaten, defeated, and totally routed; none escaped to carry the news; and let it be ever remembered that no one officer who commanded, not one soldier who was engaged in the action and obtained the victory, were of the regular army, but all militia.

And, at the celebrated battle of the Cowpens, South Carolina, which terminated so favorable and triumphant, and shed such lustre on the American arms, where Colonel Tarlton, with his legion of cavalry, and the flower of the British army, advanced up the country flushed with the assurance of victory, was met by the militia commanded by Generals Pickens and McDowell, with a few regulars under the command of General Morgan, and was there totally defeated, routed, and dispersed; and so decisive was the victory, that the number of prisoners exceeded the number of the army who guarded them after the battle. Such was the bravery of the militia in the old war, which is conclusive evidence, that when they become acquainted with the art of war, and brought into action, they are the best soldiers in the world.

The battle of the Hanging Rock was also gained by the militia. It is beyond the bounds of my inquiry to relate the many skirmishes and engagements wherein the militia were always victorious to the South. But, Mr. Chairman, I must differ in opinion from the relation given by some gentlemen, as it relates to the battle of Camden, where General Gates was met, surprised, and defeated by the British. It has been said that the militia fled and deserted from the battle, and was the cause of the defeat. Sir, they fled when they were beaten, with the other troops; but it must be remembered that General Gates brought to the South an army of the best disciplined troops in the United States, with able officers, was met and surprised by the British army, commanded by Lord Cornwallis, near Camden, South Carolina, where neither the shame nor disgrace of that defeat should or ought to be attached to the militia or regulars, but to the lack of vigilance in the commanding officer, in suffering himself to be surprised in so critical a moment. Let history or report relate what it may, I am authorized to say this is a correct statement of facts relative to the action, from officers of high standing, and from the general impression made on the public mind of the people in the South. I do not pretend to affirm it by my own testimony, for I was neither in the battle nor in the race.

Sir, in the Revolutionary war, when our rights were invaded, our liberties assailed, and our country in jeopardy, the militia were the only and the best defence on which we could rely. Although unaccustomed to the art of war, they wanted not courage to defend their rights; no monitor but one; no mercenary views to prompt or induce them. Inspired by the love of liberty and hopes of independence, with the rifle in one hand and their country in the other, they marched to the field of battle, without money and without price, determined to die or be free. But, Mr. Chairman, those days of heroism appear to have passed away and descended with our ancestors to the tomb. In the present period of modern refinement, in this polite age, when the morning star of peace and prosperity has risen in our hemisphere, which gladdens every scene and cheers every heart, we are seized with an epidemic; the fever of national importance, and national and individual wealth and precedence, prevails throughout the continent. It is caught from breast to breast; few escape the contagion. This prevailing principle is fully verified in the late war. When the necessity occurred to enlist men to fill the ranks of the army, for the defence of the nation, we were compelled to give large premiums; give much, and promise more, to raise a regular force sufficient for the purposes of the war.

The purse and the sword then were together; nay, sir, more; the purse must go before the sword, and whet it for the day of battle.

But, sir, I must not be misunderstood in these remarks, so as to suppose I intend to give any unfriendly insinuations, or cast a shade, or the least imputation, on the army of the late war and the present day. We owe them gratitude for their valor and services; but I must be permitted to bring into view, and discover, the unparalleled difference between them and their fathers of the Revolution, who, with empty pockets, suffering the extremes of every climate, the privation of every comfort, conflicting with all the horrors of war, by their valor and courage obtained the liberty we now enjoy. While the late army and them of the present day, receives a full compensation and good reward from Government for their military services. The prevailing passion for national and individual wealth, manifests the principle in strong colors, in the various moneyed institutions disseminated throughout the United States, in the banking system, until it appears that some of them are almost suffocated by their own excess. This stimulus, this same overwhelming principle, has had a sensible operation on the measures of the Government, and has led us into the same temptation. A few years past, from the prosperous state of our commerce and products of the agricultural interest, we were rich, and increased in wealth; had a flowing Treasury and flowing hearts; made large appropriations; turned none empty away, and even created means to exhaust our finances: but now, sir, our condition is in a measure reversed, and we begin to feel the effects of our own indiscretion. It is high time to retrace our steps, and return to that happy medium of administration between the extremes of parsimony on the one hand, and profusion on the other; and the bill on your table is one of those effective measures, calculated to accomplish that object.

Mr. W. said he was not gratified with all he heard from gentlemen on the same side with himself. His friend and colleague (Mr. WILLIAMS) had taken an able and comprehensive view of the subject, and had brought conviction to his mind that a reduction of the army was not only practical, but compatible with the safety and interest of the nation; but, sir, his strictures on the report of the Secretary of War are calculated to make an unfavorable impression on the public mind relative to the official conduct of that officer. The Secretary of War partakes of the fallibility of human nature, and, as a man, was liable to involuntary error; but, Mr. W. said, he could not bring his mind to such unfavorable conclusions, respecting the report alluded to, as that to which the mind of his colleague had come; on the contrary, he had thought himself justified in saying that the Secretary of War was considered an intelligent and vigilant officer, and had administered the duties of his department with diligence and ability. He would state one fact in support of this opinion. The land lying in the chartered boundary of North Carolina was acquired, he believed, chiefly by the exertions made by the Secretary of War in the late treaty held with the Cherokee nation. Whatever difficulty was involved in the negotiation—and he (Mr. W.) knew there was much difficulty—the Secretary succeeded in obtaining the purchase, without any specific charge on that State. Mr. W. said, it had not been his course to pass encomiums on men in office; but he thought it decorous, and, in common justice, felt it his duty to offer these remarks on a transaction that came within his own knowledge, of which he was occasionally made acquainted, and in which he took a deep interest, in behalf of that section of the State he represented.

And had his other friend and colleague (Mr. FISHER) been so fortunate as to have passed by, and not given a resurrection to the Seminole war, a subject long since approved and laid to rest, and inscribed in the annals of fame, recorded in your Journals, wherein he stated that the commanding officer of that expedition had exceeded his authority, acted contrary to orders, and violated the Constitution; had the gentleman, where he came to that point, turned aside some other way, or on the one side or the other evaded these remarks, his speech would have been highly acceptable and conclusive in his favor, and saved his friend from being compelled to make this reluctant reply. Sir, the three preceding Administrations have been brought into view, and argued with ability; gentlemen have given them as vouchers for the political ground which they have taken; some in favor, and some against standing armies in time of peace. I admit, sir, that every respect is due to the wisdom and policy of those who have gone before us; but, sir, it is the happy privilege of our Government for every generation to legislate for themselves. The lapse of time always brings with it a revolution of politics; and that which was proper and consistent with the interests of the nation twenty or thirty years past, may not be applicable to us in the present period; and, therefore, it is necessary we should look out for ourselves, and pursue such measures of policy as we believe to be best adapted and most suitable for us in our situation, and at the present day.

Although, Mr. Chairman, the situation of our finances is not so favorable as could be wished, and our agricultural interest greatly depressed, our commerce measurably diminished, our resources of national wealth impeded, and, for want of a due proportion of circulating medium, the individual interest of many of our citizens much embarrassed; yet, amidst all these unfavorable appearances, our country presents a pleasing prospect of better times: the blessings of peace are yet ours, we have none to contend with, none to provide for but our own households; and, could we arrive at the true policy of governing ourselves with temperance and moderation, that course would lead us to individual happiness and national prosperity, unparalleled by any other nation on earth. Our resources are great; we have the means, and the duty devolves on us to make the application. And, sir, the bill on your table contains one of the leading features of that policy. I therefore feel bound to give it my support.

When Mr. W. had concluded,

Mr. SERGEANT took the floor in favor of the motion. When he concluded, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 16.

Another member, to wit: from Kentucky, HENRY CLAY, appeared, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing a report of the Commissioners of the Navy, containing information as to the sums of money requisite to complete existing contracts, entered into in pursuance of the act for the gradual increase of the Navy, made in obedience to the resolution of this House of the 9th instant; which letter and report were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. Russ, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, and, the same being again read, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement, showing the balance of each distinct appropriation for the Navy remaining in the Treasury, and in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent for the Navy Department, on the 1st of January, 1821, and other information required by the resolution of the 4th instant; which letter and statement were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the reduction of the Army of the United States; the motion of Mr. SIMKINS to strike out the first section yet depending—

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, said, that he was in favor of reducing the Army to six thousand rank and file. He knew that there were some well-founded objections to the bill as reported by the Military Committee; but these would be removed by amendments, in case the motion to strike out the first section should not prevail. He hoped that those who were opposed to reduction would not urge objections to the details of the bill, and, to be candid, he thought they had no right to do so, because, by the rules of the House, the friends of the bill had a right to make it as perfect as possible, by amendments, before a motion to strike out the first section could be offered; and, as this privilege on their part had been waived to allow the present motion, the courtesy of Parliamentary concession would be violated if the bill should be assailed in its details. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he should, on his part, confine the discussion to the principles involved in the measure, and to the necessity and expediency of reduction.

Some of the friends of reduction had allowed their zeal to carry them from the main question into a comparative view of the militia and the regular Army; while others, alarmed at the arbitrary propensities of military power, had rambled over the pages of history, ancient and modern, in search of examples to prove that standing armies are dangerous to civil liberty. He did not wish to impugn the reasoning of his friends, but he was fearful that their arguments had more of theory, and less of substantial fact, than was proper on a subject of this kind. Perhaps, in fairness, the friends of the present Peace Establishment ought to show that the public service requires an Army of ten thousand, but they had very adroitly thrown the onus probandi upon the friends of reduction, and then challenged them to go into the details of the service, and designate the places where troops are uselessly employed, and show that six thousand is sufficient. Two or three members have pressed the attack in that quarter, supposing it, no doubt, to be the weakest part of our line of defence. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) broke ground, and opened his battery upon that point, and it was but just to say that he had occupied the best position which the field afforded. Another gentleman, from the same State, (Mr. BALDWIN,) called for facts as triumphantly as if the victory was gained, and he had only come in to claim a portion of the spoils of argument. Mr. T. said he would meet the call; he would engage to dig up some ore, if the gentleman would promise to manufacture it into ploughshares and spindles. The gentleman himself had stated some facts which might be useful, if properly applied. He had stated that one of the Major Generals was at his farm in New York, attending to the concerns of agriculture; and another near Nashville in Tennessee, equally well employed. And this was stated to prove that the militia of the Union, being about eight hundred thousand, are not likely to be destroyed by those two officers of the regular Army. And so it does prove it; and what of it? But it proves another thing: that the operations of the Army were going on without the personal attendance or assistance of those two Generals; and that, consequently, they could be disbanded without much detriment to the public service. The same gentleman insisted that the disbursements of the Government were controlled by a liberal economy, and, to prove this, he drew a contrast between the expenditures of the nation and some city corporations. Baltimore, he said, expended annually about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars upon the local service of that city. This, Mr. T. said, was quite probable. He had been in that city more than once, and had some knowledge of the public works and public spirit of the place. Its citizens, said he, are a generous, liberal, open-handed, high-minded people; they have some splendid monuments, surpassing in magnitude every thing of the kind in the Republic. One is the Washington Monument, proudly ascending one hundred and forty feet above the plane of its horizon, erected, by a grateful people, to immortalize the glory of the "Father of his Country." Another is in progress to perpetuate the fame of those who fell in defence of the city; in defence of their wives, and families, and sacred homes. It is a monument of generous sympathy and noble feeling, consecrated by orphans' sobs and widows' tears. And another yet, of vast dimensions, the base of which is upwards, and the cone pointing downward, piercing the earth—the plan is yet on paper. No part of the Union can show a parallel, and centuries may elapse before one of equal magnitude and like materials will be seen. A gentleman asks me for its name. Here it is—Bankruptcy—to the amount of millions.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SIMKINS) had informed the Committee that the Executive departments were opposed to reduction, especially the War Department, and contended that we ought not to act hastily in disbanding the present Army against their better judgment and more deliberate opinion. Mr. T. thought it would be as well to leave their opinions out of the argument. For his part, he was not hostile to any of them—State, Treasury, War, or Navy. He had no grievances to complain of, no disfavours to resent. He would support any of them when he believed them right, and he would follow his own opinion when it tells him they are wrong. In doing this, he had no fears of giving umbrage to any one; and, if he did, what of it? Must he pine himself to death, and be buried at the public charge, or "fork his fingers in their faces hale and hearty," and try to be, what every member of a legislative body ought to be—free and independent? The same gentleman (Mr. SIMKINS) had asserted that there were no petitions against the army, and insisted that Congress ought not to reduce it, unless the people should petition for reduction and retrenchment. Mr. T. would tell his friend, that when the people send petitions for reduction of expenses, they usually turn out old members, and send new ones in their places. That was the way in 1798. He would tell his friend another thing: the people had already walked forth into the field of expenditure; they had found the Army a barren fig tree, and had said, "Cut it down, why cumbereth it the vineyard of the Treasury?" But the husbandmen of the Army, those who expect to gather its fruits, implore you to spare it yet another year. They promise to dig about, and water it, and if next year it bring not forth fruit of utility, then, say they, ye may lay the axe to the root and hew it down. In his opinion the day of retrenchment had come. No one ventures to advocate loans after this year, and we must retrench expenses, or find new means of raising revenue. The present condition of the country forbids the adoption of any system of taxation, and the existing state of the Treasury, and the barren prospect before it, would enforce a rigid system of economy.

He did not intend, however, to rest the argument for reduction upon the want of means in the Treasury. If the principles he intended to rely upon should be found correct, and fairly applicable to the subject, a deficit of five thousand or five millions would not change the conclusion which would follow. To be better understood, he would state that there are three questions involved in the inquiry before the Committee:

1st. Is the present Army necessary for the peace service of the country?

2d. Is the Treasury able to support it?

3d. Will its reduction lessen the strength of the nation—diminish its capacity to meet the emergencies of future wars?

The argument in favor of reduction would be conclusive, if it could be shown that a force of six thousand is adequate to the peace service of the Republic, and that the money saved by reduction could be more usefully employed. He had the temerity to believe that he should be able to show this in the view he would take of the three questions just propounded. But, said he, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) says, that a part of the peace service consists in preparing for war; that standing armies have been established by all Governments; that they make a part of the police of nations; and that we invite aggression when we weaken that arm of our national defence. Yes, sir, said Mr. T., and an iron-handed system of arbitrary power, supported by those armies, makes a part also of the police of nations; and the occlusion of the body of the people from the rights of self-government makes another part of the police of nations; and public debts, to a fearful amount, created in supporting these armies, make another part of the police of nations; and vast loans, made for the purpose of marching these armies to the field of battle, where they can slay and be slain, makes another part of the police of nations; and ponderous systems of taxation make another part of the police of nations—until all Europe is stoop-shouldered under the tremendous pressure of these onerous systems of police. And what has Europe gained by these sacrifices? He would not insult misery and wretchedness by asking if she is prosperous or happy? He would only ask, if she had purchased peace and tranquility? Will any statesman have the hardihood to assert, with the history of the last two centuries before him, that the augmentation of the armies of Europe has promoted forbearance and good fellowship among the sovereigns, or forestalled aggression, or diminished the number of their desolating wars? And why should the people of this continent make haste to naturalize the false maxims and mad policy of Europe, and follow her along the road to ruin? We are warned, said he, by the agonies she has suffered, and is now suffering, and is destined to suffer, to eschew her systems of military police.

Is the present Army necessary for the peace service of the country? What are its peace duties? To garrison our posts and fortifications, and control and overawe the Indians. What quantum of force is necessary for these purposes? Gentlemen opposed to us talk about the Peace Establishment of 1802 and 1808, but carefully omit the comparison between the peace service of that period and the peace service of the present. From 1802 to 1808, the Peace Establishment was fixed at three thousand rank and file, and that Army performed the service which we are now told requires ten thousand. The contrast stares gentlemen in the face like sunshine, and, to escape the painful conclusion, they tell us that the peace service has greatly increased. They say—

1st. That our population is nearly doubled.

2d. That we have nearly doubled our posts and forts.

3d. That our frontiers are greatly extended.

Let us examine these facts, and see how far they justify the argument. If the gentlemen from South Carolina and Pennsylvania (Messrs. SIMKINS and SERGEANT) mean to say, that an increase of population implies an increase of facility in filling the ranks, agreed. If they mean that it implies an increase of means to support an army, he would frankly admit it. But if they intend to affirm that an increase of population enlarges the peace service of the Army, or makes it necessary to augment the Army in time of peace, he must boldly deny it. Do they mean to say that faction and discontent increases with population, and calls for an augmentation of military force to quell its bold audacity? Such a sentiment is not to be endured. Can the census of any nation be the standard of its Peace Establishment? The argument, he said, was surely used as a make-weight; it came across his pride and feeling, and he would not trust himself to speak further of it. It would refute itself.

The posts and forts are increased in number; and, in the same proportion, he admitted it was necessary to have more troops than we had at 1802 and 1808. At 1803 and 1804 we had 34, and at 1808 we occupied 47 posts and fortifications. At this time we occupy 54, or at most 69. The returns laid upon our tables show 124 posts, 54 of which have garrisons of not less than ten rank and file; fifteen others of them have one, and three, and five, and eight, officers and men at them; just enough to lock the gates, and the rest, 53 in number, are abandoned as useless. In fact some of them had no existence, and he could not perceive why they were reported. We offer an army of 6,000; and it is clear that this army, when properly distributed among the posts and forts now occupied, would give each a force superior to the average of that which they had from 1802 to 1808. Separately considered, therefore, the argument upon posts and forts was against the opposers of reduction. But as it was his intention to meet the argument fairly, in all its force, he would proceed to inquire into the alleged enlargement of our frontiers, and would treat the subject as if the arguments of populations, and forts, and posts, was consolidated with the other. Are our frontiers extended since 1802, so as to require an additional force for the peace service? To avoid all complexity of ideas on the subject, he said he would divide the frontiers of the Union into four parts.

1st. Our maritime frontier, extending along the seaboard, from Eastport, in Maine, to the mouth of St. Mary's, in Georgia.

2d. Our left flank, resting upon Nova Scotia, and the Canadas, and extending from Eastport, in Maine, to Fort Mackinac.

3d. Our right flank, resting upon the Floridas, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Spanish provinces; and,

4th. Our rear, or Western settlements, along the valley of the Mississippi, and which are protected by a cordon of posts from Fort Mackinac, head of Lake Huron, to Fort Smith, in the Arkansas.

Two or three general remarks, he said, would shorten the argument. He was proceeding upon the tacit admission that the front and flanks of the Union require a force at this time, double that which was distributed upon the same lines from 1802 to 1808. But this was conceding more than he was bound to grant. It is admitted that the forts and fortifications have been doubled on the front and flanks since 1804. And, as the natural defences are the same now as then, it follows that the artificial strength of those lines has been doubled; and, therefore, he could assert, without fear of denial, that the same military force, distributed upon those lines, would make them stronger now than they were at 1802 and 1808. Would this be contradicted? Do fortifications weaken the country? If so, why construct them? Do they not increase its strength? Does not every fort increase the strength of its line of defence? Will you not double the strength of a given line (all other things being equal) by doubling the number of forts upon that line? Surely you do. And it follows of course that, as you increase the defensive strength of a line, by erecting fortresses, you may diminish its military force. Now, therefore, as the bill proposes an army double that of 1802, and, as it is certain that the front and flanks of the country will receive their due proportion of the six thousand, it is fair to contend that the military, as well as the permanent artificial strength of the front and flanks, will be double that of 1802 and 1808. How, then, stands the argument, in reference to our maritime front? It was as far from Eastport, in Maine, to St. Mary's, in 1802 and 1808, as it is at this day, and the same harbors and estuaries along the coast to be defended. There is, therefore, no extension of territory upon our seaboard. But its natural defences are the same, and its fortifications are doubled, and the bill proposes to give it double the number of troops to garrison those fortresses. And will it still be said, that a reduction of the army to six thousand, will reduce the strength of our maritime front to below the standard of 1802 and 1808. Would it not be fair to say, at once, that we shall leave the seaboard twice as strong as it was at that period? These remarks, he said, were equally applicable to the peace service of our left flank, beginning at Eastport, in Maine, and extending along our boundary line westward, to the St. Lawrence and the lakes, and up the lakes to Detroit, and from thence to Mackinac; and also to our right flank, beginning at St. Mary's, in Georgia, and extending westward and south west as far as Fort Smith, on the Arkansas. There is no extension upon either of those lines since 1802 and 1808; nor is there any demand for additional troops, save that which is created by the erection of forts; to garrison which, a fair proportion of the six thousand is fully adequate. Where, then, said he, is this vast extension of territory, which makes an increase of the army necessary? On the west, say gentlemen, the defensive line of our rear has been extended. Let us refer to facts. The Committee would recollect that he left them at Mackinac on the left flank, and at Fort Smith on the right. The space between those two points is our military rear. On the 20th of November, 1803, the province of Louisiana was surrendered, at New Orleans, to the United States, under the Treaty of St. Ildefonso. The fort of St. Louis, and the intermediate posts, were transferred on the 10th of March following. At and before this acquisition, we had a cordon of posts from Mackinac to Fort Adams, on the Mississippi six miles above the Spanish line. But, to make the contrast free from all color of inequality, he would omit Fort Adams, and stop at the old Spanish post of Arkansas. To avoid mistake he would enumerate the posts upon the cordon, and give the strength of each at several periods. They were as follow:

	Aggregate force.
	1802.	1806.	1809.
1. Fort Mackinac - - -	125	104	90
2. Chicago, i. e. Fort Dearborn - - -		66	77
3. Fort Wayne - - -	64	76	53
4. Post St. Vincennes - - -	75		14
5. Belle Fontaine, Mississippi - - -		89	51
6. Kaskaskias, same river - - -	78
7. Fort Massac - - -	71	84	32
8. Fort Pickering, Chick'w Bluffs - - -	78
9. Post Arkansas, Arkansas river - - -		17
Total - - -	491	436	318

The total, as here given, is not exactly correct, because there were some changes in the posts; as, for instance, the troops were withdrawn from Fort Pickering after the acquisition of Louisiana, and the garrison at Kaskaskias was discontinued, and the troops sent to Fort Osage, in the Missouri Territory. But it is positively true, he said, that the aggregate force on that frontier did not exceed five hundred rank and file at any time between 1802 and 1811. And this force, during that period, maintained the posts, overawed the Indians, protected the frontier, and were found to be adequate to the peace service in that quarter. At present we have the following cordon of posts; the force at each of which, is taken from the last returns, viz:

1. Fort Mackinac, head of Lake Huron	-	115
2. Fort Howard, Green Bay, mouth of Fox river	-	524
3. Chicago, Fort Dearborn, Lake Erie	-	134
4. St. Peter's, mouth of river St. Peter's, Cantonment Leveuworth	-	354
5. Fort Crawford, Prairie du Chien, mouth of Wisconsin	-	101
6. Fort Armstrong, Rock Island, Mississippi	-	80
7. Council Bluffs, 720 miles up the Missouri	-	861
8. Fort Smith, — miles up the Arkansas	-	76
Total	-	2,235

Formerly the cordon terminated at the Chickasaw Bluffs, and then again at Post Arkansas, after its surrender to us, but at this time both of these posts are discontinued, and Fort Smith established in lieu of them.

Now, said Mr. T., contrast this and that, and then tell us what has become of the argument of extension. In the former period, you had one post more than at present; and although you have changed the location of forts and posts, as the frontier settlements advanced, yet the line from Fort Mackinac to Post Arkansas, was as long, or nearly so, as the line from Mackinac to Fort Smith, on the Arkansas. You have only thrown out the centre of the line; and in this alone consists the prodigious elongation of which we hear so much. But the frontier settlements are stronger now than they were in 1803-6-9—have better rifles, and more of them, and are in every respect better able to defend themselves. Are the Indians more numerous, or more warlike, or more hostile now than they were then? The fact is well known, that the number of warriors are greatly diminished since 1802. Some of the tribes are almost extinct; others are our avowed friends or allies, or quasi subjects. Their proud spirit has been quailed. Their warlike habits and intrepidity of character are on the wane. In short, the tribes immediately upon our border, are less warlike and more drunken and worthless, than at any former period. Besides, our control over them has been extended quite as much as our posts. The British traders are entirely excluded from some of the tribes, and their influence is everywhere diminished, and constantly diminishing; and what is of more consequence, the Indians must, for the future, look to us for supplies, especially arms and munitions of war, which would always be withheld the moment they manifested indications of hostility; and then, in addition to the military force on that frontier, we have an army of traders, and factors, and military agents, all of whom assist in smoking the pipe of peace.

Hence, it appears, that we have quadrupled our force on that line of frontier, although the actual demand there for troops has not increased; has, in fact, greatly diminished since 1802. And thus it is manifest, that the argument of extension is a mere exaggeration, a phantom of the forest, which vanishes the moment you break up the margin of the Union into lines, and apply the standard of 1802-6-8, to the present peace service of the country. Will the reduction of the Army make it necessary to withdraw a part of this force from the West? In this he was unwilling to control the Departments. But, it was his decided opinion, that at this time the Army was unequally and improperly distributed. New York, for instance, has a force of one thousand seven hundred, with one Major General and one Brigadier; and Kentucky has a force of one officer and servant. It was true, that Kentucky had rifles enough to defend it; but surely the great State of New York ought not to be degraded by treating it as a conquered country, to be held only by a strong force in garrison. If the battalions or regiments are kept entire for the purpose of drill and manœuvre, let them be sent to the West, where subsistence is cheap. New York has a force of one thousand seven hundred, and the whole Western frontier only two thousand three hundred and sixty-three. He would not complain of these things, but he would say, after reducing the Army to six thousand, a reinforcement could be sent to the West equal to the whole force with which that frontier had been protected, from 1802 up to 1809.

It was possible, he said, that he might be incorrect in some of the facts he had stated. The Army report, as printed, had only been laid on the tables yesterday, and from the hasty glance he had given it, he could not assure the House that he was exactly correct in all the details he had given, but he would confidently assert, that he was substantially correct in all the leading facts. And if so, it was now his turn, he said, to call upon gentlemen for information. He demanded of them to show that the state of our relations, interior or exterior, foreign or domestic, requires at this time a stronger military force upon the flanks of our country, or on our rear, or maritime front, than we had there from 1802 to 1808. The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SIMKINS,) aided by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) had given a catalogue of reasons. They say we shall presently occupy Florida; have they forgotten that the Army of 1802, occupied the great province of Louisiana in 1803-4, without any increase of force? Must we retain the forts along the present line, and establish new posts in Florida, to defend it against ourselves? Or may we not do as we did in 1803-4, break up the useless posts on that flank and order the troops down into Florida, as we then did into Louisiana? Again, they say we must keep up the Army to defend Florida, and garrison its posts and forts, and overawe the Indians. But, if a part of the Army of three thousand defended Louisiana and garrisoned its forts, and overawed the Indians, surely a due proportion of six thousand can perform that service in Florida. How many troops do you want there? Three hundred at St. Augustine, two hundred at Pensacola, fifty at St. Marks, and one hundred at the mouth of the Apalachicola, to aid the gunboats in seizing those who attempt to smuggle negroes or goods into that part of the Union. Does the acquisition of Florida make that frontier stronger or weaker than it was before? If stronger, why do you want more troops there now, than we had there in 1803-4-8? If weaker, why did we make the treaty? Is it really true that we shall weaken the Union by this arrondissement of our territory? Must we entail upon ourselves and upon posterity an increase of the Army, with all its concomitant expenses, for the purpose of occupying a country which, being acquired, makes us weaker than we were without it? Are we to pay $5,000,000 for an encumbrance? Must we pay that sum for Florida, and surrender a great fine dukedom beyond the Sabine, to make ourselves more defenceless than we were before? Where are the friends of the treaty? Let them stand forth and defend it. Bad as it was, and hostile to it as he always had been, he would still do justice to all sides. He was ready to admit, he was prepared to prove, that the Floridas would add greatly to the strength of our Southern frontier; and for that very reason, said he, we want no increase of the Army to defend it.

JANUARY, 1821.

But, again; they say our dispute with Spain is not yet settled. He would ask, if we had no dispute with Spain in 1802? Was not the right of deposit withheld? Had they forgotten that Federal gentlemen on this floor called loudly for war, and demanded that the nation should prepare for hostilities? But the Army was not increased, the affair with Spain blew over, and the Peace Establishment was reduced, and fixed at three thousand.

Again; we must look, it is said, to our foreign relations. Do we not see, say they, that the materials for revolution are prepared throughout Europe, and that dreadful convulsions may be apprehended? And what then? Only this—Europe will be fully employed at home, and will find no leisure to wage war in our hemisphere. Spain is named. What can she do? Can she find means to assail us at a moment when she cannot reduce the weakest of her revolted colonies? But, she must finish her self-renovation; her undivided attention is employed in her domestic concerns; in the re-establishment of order and the constitutional system; and in creating ways and means to pay the public debt. From that Power we have nothing to fear; Mexico is our hostage with her. Have a little patience, said he, until the allied sovereigns can persuade Ferdinand that he is strong enough to reclaim the ancient prerogatives of the Crown, and re-establish arbitrary power, and you will cease to speak of her as an argument against reduction. Austria—and what of her? The vanguard of free government approaches her dominions; to repel it, she is preparing a crusade upon the kingdom of Naples. Free principles have entered her territories, and missionaries of the new political Testament—a work published in Europe, under the title Constitution—representative government, and equal rights. Russia—the enlightened head of that empire can feed ambition nearer home; Europe and Asia spread their feasts before him, and bid him come and sate his appetite for glory. France—we got an army up for her in '98; let us remember the consequences, and grow wiser. England—when had we less to fear from her? The Throne has exhausted its power in a wrangle with a woman. The nobility are scandalized by the trial of the Queen. Public opinion has put the Crown in Coventry; the quiverings of commotion are felt from the centre to the extremities of the Kingdom. Disaffection rages; the cloud of discontent rolls on, increasing as it goes, and gathering electric fires by the attritions of resistance; where it will burst none know; but burst it will, upon the lordly palace or lowly cottage.

Last, and least of all, comes the argument of manufactures. You were told by the member from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) that if you turn four thousand laborers loose upon the country, you will discourage manufactures. He suggested this, as worthy of attention, but would not urge it. Perhaps, said Mr. T., it may have some weight among the friends of manufactures, and if so, he would suggest a set-off, for those who oppose the tariff. Congress will refuse loans after this year. If the revenue fails, you must reduce the army or levy direct taxes, or impose an excise, or increase the tariff; but the moment you come to these dilemmas, the friends of manufactures will vote to raise the tariff, while those who oppose it, will divide upon a system of excise and direct taxation; and the tariff will be carried. Those, therefore, who wish to avoid the painful operation of increasing the tariff, will recollect that they can only do so by seasonable reductions and rigid economy. He was surprised, he said, to hear the army spoken of as the basis of national prosperity. He had always supposed that productive labor and economy was that basis, and that armies were great consumers, and not producers, hanging like mill-stones upon the spindles of productive labor, and taking a heavy toll for grinding. He would not trouble them further, he said, upon this branch of the subject. Every view which he had been able to give it, in the gross or in detail, brought him to the conclusion that the peace service of the country did not require an army of ten thousand. In his opinion, six thousand was fully adequate to that service.

The ability of the Treasury to support the army had been maintained by some and denied by others. He would not volunteer his services as umpire between them.

One gentleman gave a flattering account of the prospect before us, and asserted that we had paid off the national debt too fast. Another had dissected the Treasury report, and found balances enough to bring both ends of the year together. It would be cruel to dissipate these consoling delusions. Another thought the army so essential to the service of the country, that he was willing on the part of his constituents to sustain it by loans. Another agreed that the army was indispensably necessary, and insisted that taxes should be levied to supply the Treasury with means : and thus their arguments are made to terminate in loans and taxes. Mr. T. was tempted to engage in the fiscal discussion, but he would forego it until the loan bill should come up. One thing was agreed on all sides—that the hand of pressure lies heavy on the country, and he for one would not increase the weight ; he would reduce it if possible ; and to make sure work of it, he would search diligently for the causes. And what, said he, are the causes of this pressure, and these fiscal embarrassments ? Is it want of means or want of economy in their application ? Is any thing withheld from us which fertility of soil and manual labor can procure ? Has Heaven pronounced a malediction against the Republic ? Has the earth become sterile ? Has hungry famine and pale pestilence swept away the people, and desolated the country ? No, sir. Everywhere the eye is filled with abundance, and the heart made glad with the richness of the harvest. Plenty has spread her ample means in prodigal profusion. But we have no market. The surplus of our labor perishes upon our hands. We cease to purchase foreign labor, because our labor is not taken in exchange. We import less than formerly. The revenue from customs sinks apace, and while all things are falling to a common level, the Government mounts upwards to its maximum of expenditure. Our fault is this : We live beyond our income. Our schemes are too magnificent. We must season our disbursements with economy. Our friend (Mr. SERGEANT) says that this pressure arises from two permanent causes. The loss of the carrying trade, and the fall in the price of our produce in foreign markets, both of which events, he says, are owing to the peace in Europe. But, if this is the result of peace, will it not last as long as peace continues ? Most surely ; and yet our friend made it appear that a reaction was about to begin, which would relieve the Treasury and the country from all embarrassment. He made a comparison between nations and individuals ; the contrast was rather unfortunate. He said that a private citizen, who borrows a sum and pays a debt with it, is nothing poorer than he was ; and just so with a nation. Yes, said Mr. T., such people take loans to keep themselves afloat, hoping as we do for better times, and praying for it quite as ardently. They count upon reaction as we do, predicting every year that it will begin the next ; ever consoling themselves with brighter prospects, until bankruptcy and ruin ends the delusive scene, and leaves them in a dungeon with nothing but despair to comfort misery. Such, also, is the fate of nations when they live on loans, and feast on capitals instead of income. And such, if we hold on our course in these hard times, may be the end and termination of our Treasury. It is a maxim, asserted by Mr. Hamilton, that a nation's wants are always equal to its means ; and, if so, to live upon loans is treason against posterity. The means of every nation has its limits, and you have found those limits when you take loans to pay the current service of the year. He who seeks to organize the army upon a basis which requires more money than the country can afford, is the deadliest of enemies to the army and the nation. But, said he, let us waive the fiscal argument. Let us agree that the Treasury is full-handed ; and with that admission proceed to discuss the third proposition, viz : Will the reduction of the army lessen the strength of the nation ; diminish its capacity to meet the emergencies of future wars ?

We are told that we have jealous neighbors, and that a reduction of the army will invite aggression. We are reminded of the maxim, "that peace is the time to prepare for war." But there is another maxim equally true and equally well known to military men : that the basis of preparation varies in every nation ; nay, that it varies at different times in the same nation. Shall the war be offensive or defensive ? If the latter, then you must know the force of the Powers who are likely to assail you ; the kind and quantity of strength with which they may annoy you, and whether by land or water, or by both. Then you must carefully examine the natural barriers of your country, its positions, and defences, their relative influence upon each other, their action and reaction ; and then, and not till then, are you prepared to make estimates for the kind and quantity of artificial means to complete your system of defence. Then you may begin to construct a basis for our army. But we must always remember that a proper basis for our peace establishment will not be found in books, or in Europe ; we must search for it upon the profile of our country ; in the customs, and habits, and occupations, of our people ; in the genius of our Government, and in the resources of the nation. At this time, happy for us, we have no prospects of war with any Power, and all that prudence can ask—all that the most vigilant caution can require is, that the nation shall augment its strength by all the means within its reach. But there is at present no specific object claiming the application of military means : general preparation is all that we can make, because the object is general and specific. We are called upon to congregate the materials of national defence, and stand prepared for war. A statesman, before he begins the work, would ask himself what is the best preparation ? The answer is obvious : that preparation which will make the nation strongest, and give the greatest facility to its active powers. And what constitutes the strength of a nation ? Its moral energy, its purse, and its sword. Mind is power, the purse is power, and the sword is power. But what are their relative values ? In a Republic moral energy has the first rank, the purse next, and the sword last : in a despotism the sword ranks first, but the primary object of a free people is, to foster and preserve its moral energy and its purse. This is its best and most efficient preparation. We have lectures upon military skill and experience, as if that was the only means of defence, as if it was the only needful preparation. But we must recollect that the sum total of means is composed of various items of which the military arm is only one, and that one of a secondary grade. Moral energy is national defence, and therefore we should create it and preserve it. Money is national defence, and therefore we should preserve the purse. Public credit is national defence, and therefore let us pay up the debt, and clear the Treasury decks for action. Roads and canals are national defence; they give facility to military operations, and peace is the proper period to construct them. Productive labor is national defence; encourage that and you are preparing for hostilities. Economy is preparation for defence. How long do nations prosper? Just so long as industry and frugality are in advance of idleness and prodigality. The nation that increases and preserves its purse will be more powerful than the nation that exhausts its means in "creating and perpetuating military skill." It is a maxim among statesmen that the purse is more available than the sword, and is most dreaded by rival nations. Marshal Saxe considers it the sinews of war, and so the great Turenne. Was it the purse of England, or the sword of the allies, that congregated all Europe into one military body, and precipitated the whole mass upon disloyal and disunited France? Let us bethink ourselves, said Mr. T., lest, in our haste for preparation, we omit that which should be first done—lest our mistaken zeal may expose us to defeat, by leaving too much space between the columns of defence. Like his opposers, he was in favor of preparing for war in time of peace, but he differed from them in the mode. Suppose, said he, that every other preparation was completed, and that Congress was now called on to finish the system by forming a nucleus for the military arm. A question would arise, what basis of preparation will embody the greatest quantity of military strength? How shall the raw material of the country be manufactured into its maximum of "military power?" By reducing the army we save one million of dollars; but suppose we resolve to expend that sum in military preparation. That mode of disbursement should be preferred which will secure the largest quantum of military skill and experience. Shall we expend the money upon the militia or the standing army? In compliment to the militia, they were called the "great bulwark of liberty;" but they had been totally neglected, as unsafe and useless in the hour of danger. Mr. T. held a different opinion, and he would suggest a mode by which they could be made as effective as the standing army, or nearly so.

Reduction of the Army.

If, said he, we form a class of from twenty-one to twenty-eight years of age, we shall have about two hundred and fifty thousand militia. The proportion of officers and non-commissioned officers for that body of militia would be about forty thousand, or perhaps less, (but that is not material,) and making in the aggregate a force of two hundred and ninety thousand. The officers would of course be distributed among the States upon the ratio of their militia, or upon any equitable ratio. Let the Government cause this body of militia to be instructed in the military science. Several modes may be adopted. For example: Let the General Government establish arsenals in the several States, and deposit a proper quantity of arms at each. Let cantonments or camps of instruction and discipline be formed at places convenient to those arsenals. Let the officers and non-commissioned officers of each State, belonging to the class of militia just mentioned, be ordered to these camps, and be kept in service one month in each year. Let them be armed and equipped at the arsenals, and let the most skilful officers of your army be ordered to the camps to conduct the drills and manœuvres. The cadets who have returned from West Point, after passing through the several classes of the Military Academy, could also assist at these drills, and thus become practically useful to the country. This process would form excellent officers, and, as they would be ordered to command in rotation, each would have an opportunity of displaying his military genius, and the War Department could possess itself of the names of the most promising military men in each State. At the expiration of the month, this army of officers would return home, and proceed to instruct their respective companies and regiments, until the next annual camp, and so on from year to year. So much, said he, for the mode of instruction, and now a word or two upon the application of the money. By reducing the army to 6,000 you save one million of dollars, which sum, divided equally among the forty thousand officers and non-commissioned officers, would pay them $25 per month each. You could distribute the pay in equal or unequal portions, as should be thought best; but, as this should not be made a money-making business, that principle of distribution should be adopted which would create least jealousy, and give most satisfaction. He could easily make out details, but it was sufficient for his present purpose to show that one million of dollars would keep forty thousand in the field for one month. He knew very well that the sum mentioned could be made to call out 60,000 upon the same plan, but he had selected 40,000, because that number would officer a body of 250,000 militia, which would be as large a force as this nation would want for centuries. It was easy, however, to change the calculation; as, for instance, if you wish to make the officers more efficient, you can, with the same sum, keep 20,000 at the camps of instruction for two months in each year; or, if you wish to save money, half that sum will keep 20,000 at the camps one month, and this number would officer a class of 125,000 militia. The present average price of the ration is ten cents, and upon that basis every member could amuse himself by making calculations, and exercise his liberality by making the pay six, eight, ten, or twenty dollars per month—always keeping this in view, that he is forming a system to instruct officers, who are to instruct the men, and that the system should be as effective as possible, at the smallest possible expense.

Here, said Mr. T., are two modes of preparing for war in time of peace; each is to cost the same sum, and the choice must be determined by superior efficiency. A brief contrast will show which has the "vantage ground." The Secretary of War tells us, "that the great object of a military peace establishment is to create and perpetuate military skill and experience." These are his own words, and what are the facts? We offer you an army of six thousand, and you ask ten. This additional 4,000 will cost the Treasury one million of dollars, and this is your nucleus of military science; this is your dispensatory of military skill; this is your repository of the art of war. In lieu of this, we propose to disburse the same sum in establishing camps or schools of instruction and discipline for the officers of 250,000 militia, who are to instruct that body of militia from year to year. And can any man hesitate between these two modes of "creating and perpetuating military skill and experience?" Will any one doubt that the latter is the better preparation for the emergencies of future wars? He that gives preference to the first must labor under strange delusions. For himself, he had no doubt that, upon experiment, the system suggested would be found most useful to the Republic. He was sure it was more in unison with national policy and national feeling, and the true spirit of the Constitution. The sound judgment of the country would one day decide between the modes, and to them it must be left. But he would implore the friends of freedom and free government to reflect before they abandon the military, as unworthy of their fostering care; as unfit to defend the body of the nation; as unsafe repositories of the art of war. Who are the militia? The great body of the nation. And is the body of the nation unfit to bear arms and defend itself? Are the people their own worst enemies? May they not be trusted with their own protection? We betray their cause if we sap the confidence of the nation in this arm of its defence. The Constitution requires us to prepare a "well regulated militia" for our service; and yet we leave the militia a disorganized mass, untrained, undrilled, undisciplined, and then denounce them as useless to the country. We waste annually upon the army and other objects sums of money that would give the militia an effective organization, and then stigmatize them as unfit for service. What have we done for the standing army? Every thing. What for the militia? Nothing. How long will the people tolerate this negligence? It is a question to be settled, how far sound policy allows us to premit, from year to year, the adoption of an effective militia system?

Mr. T. would have been glad if the opposers of reduction had contented themselves with eulogiums upon standing armies. He had to regret that they thought it necessary to disparage and defame the militia. They came with books prepared for action. With sword in hand they made the assault, and cut and hacked as furiously as if they had orders to give no quarter. We were told again and again by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) and by others on his side, that the militia could not be relied upon in time of danger; that they wanted firmness, and were unfit for national defence. A catalogue of instances had been given to show how shamefully they had fled when faced by regular troops; but they had forgot how often regular troops had been beaten by militia, and how often, when opposed to them, old veterans had turned recreant in the battle fray.

He feared that those who complained most of the militia were least able to command them. In his judgment, some of the arguments advanced were political heresies. When the second amendment to the Constitution was adopted, "a well regulated militia was considered necessary to the security of a free State." And who, said he, caused that article to be inserted? The schoolmen and tyros of the day, who had collected their knowledge of men and Governments from European authors, as ignorant of the subject as themselves? No, sir. It was a great political truth, promulgated by the sages of the Revolution, by men who understood the human passions, and knew how to close the avenues to arbitrary power; men of disinterested public virtue; who had fought and bled for freedom, and had been taught the science of free government in the schools of experience; men who knew that liberty is held upon condition of perpetual vigilance, and only secure when guarded by the body of the people, well armed and disciplined. As statesmen, said he, we should ponder well before we expunge from our liturgy the doctrines of '76 and '89. There are moral ligaments between freedom and the use of arms; cords of sympathy and union between liberty and a well organized militia, which should not be rashly cut or broken by the hand of folly. Liberty is gone when the military art is taught and practised only in the standing army. Deracinate the use of arms, and the people become timid and pusillanimous. Abandon the Republic to the protection of standing armies, and a prostration of political virtue will ensue, that must terminate in the spasms of despotic power. There was a period, he said, in the history of nations, which he fondly hoped our country would never know; that period in which the body of the people neglect the use of arms; that fatal period in which the nation, enfeebled by luxury, and overcome by lassitude, surrenders its protection and defence to standing armies and mercenary troops. Select an example where you please, of ancient or of modern date; take any nation that has figured on the theatre of time; look steadily into its history; search for the causes of its rise and progress—its decline and fall; mark the summit of its highest elevation, the point of its decline; seat yourself upon that eminence, while you survey the boundless ruin and gloomy desolation around you; inquire for the moral character of the generation that lies buried where you sit, and in that generation you will find that the use of arms was neglected; that the people had surrendered their protection and defence to standing armies and mercenary troops. Before that period, when every citizen bore arms, and flew, when called upon, to the ramparts of his country, you will find the nation marching upon its destiny with a steady eye and fearless front: after it, when the people had surrendered their protection and defence to standing armies and mercenary troops, you will find the nation falling, to rise no more.

The first, is the doric age of economy and strength; heroic virtues and love of liberty, vigorous measures and glorious achievements; national renown, and general prosperity. The second, is the corinthian period of luxury and refinement, and indolence and ease; voluptuousness and effeminacy; venality and corruption; cowardice, treachery, baseness and depravity, and all the catalogue of wayward vices, passions, and propensities. With such a people, liberty is not an effulgent body, fixed and located to the nation; it is a comet, blazing for a moment, or a meteor, gleaming across the horizon of their night, flashing and sparkling for an instant, and vanishing for ever. Sir, said he, it is a great political truth, attested by all experience, that a well regulated militia is necessary to the security of a free State. It is madness to deny it. If it be not true, then all history is false, and he that has not learnt it from the chronicles of nations, has read history to little purpose. When did a national militia erect a despotism? When, and where, have standing armies established free government and equal rights? It is the stratagem of tyrants to let the people neglect the art of war, and persuade them to abandon the use of arms, and thus make the protection of standing armies necessary.

Mr. T. was prepared to urge some general remarks, which he would suppress, rather than forfeit the indulgence of the Committee. He had attempted to show, that an army of six thousand is adequate to the peace service of the country. He had waived the fiscal argument, and admitted, hypothetically, that the Treasury could sustain the expenditure required by the present Peace Establishment, and upon that supposition had contended, that a reduction of the army would not diminish the strength of the nation. He had made it appear, he hoped, that the money saved by reduction could be more usefully and effectively applied in various modes of preparation for hostilities. Among these modes, that of regulating, drilling, and training the militia, was suggested as the best preparation for future wars, and a better and safer repository of the military science. He had, while upon the fiscal subject, expressed a doubt of the ability of the Treasury to meet the future disbursements of the Government, unless aided by an excise, or a system of direct taxation; and in referring to the state of the country, had avowed his belief, that frugality had become an imperative duty; to which he would only add, as his fixed opinion, that at all times, and under every possible relation, in which events may place it, the nation that is first in the practice of economy, will be foremost in the march of power and true glory.

When Mr. TRIMBLE had concluded—

Mr. WOOD advocated generally, but briefly, a reduction of the Army.

Mr. COCKE spoke at considerable length in support of reduction, and of the bill under consideration.

Mr. BRUSH opposed, decidedly, a diminution of the present number of the Army; and

Mr. STEVENS advocated a reduction generally, without declaring a preference of any particular plan.

The speech of Mr. S. terminated the debate on the main question; but

Mr. LOWNDES having, as well from what had fallen from others, as from his own inability to vote on the subject understandingly until the Committee of Ways and Means had made their report, and exhibited to the House the true state of the national finances—suggested the propriety of postponing this bill until that committee should make their report.

A desultory conversation followed this suggestion, embracing various points, but chiefly touching the best mode of proceeding with the consideration of the subject—in which Messrs. BALDWIN, SIMKINS, FOOT, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, McLEAN, SERGEANT, COBB, FLOYD, CAMPBELL, and BARBOUR took part. Finally, a little before sunset, the question was put on Mr. SIMKINS's motion to strike out the first section of the bill, (to destroy it,) and was decided in the negative, by a large majority, only four or five rising in favor of the motion; and the Committee rose, and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, January 17.

Mr. STREET, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens and Austin L. Sands, legal representatives of Richardson Sands, deceased, and others," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Bartholomew Duverge, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill for the relief of Lewis H. Guerlain.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of Benjamin Freeland, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the case of the deputy surveyor of the "Vincennes tract," made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Robert Buntin; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill making provision for the payment of debts due the United States from purchasers of public lands.

Mr. BARBOUR laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to the Chairman of the Naval Committee, stating that no change is necessary or expedient in the organization of the marine corps; and communicating a report of the Navy Commissioners upon the subject of rations; the number of officers necessarily wanting for actual service in 1821; upon the propriety of reducing the number of pursers, and dispensing with the service of sundry superintendents, storekeepers, &c., at the several navy yards; the average cost per annum of the various sized vessels of the Navy while cruising and in ordinary; which letter and report were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SIBLEY, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a district court of the United States in and for the Territory of Michigan.

On motion of Mr. SIBLEY, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, amendments are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "An act relating to the ransom of American captives of the late war," passed the first day of March, 1817, in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

On motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act passed April 26, 1816, by which was allowed an additional compensation of fifty per cent. to the compensations of certain officers of the customs, therein named.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the whole number of militia in service during the late war with Great Britain, showing the periods of their service, their pay, and from what States and Territories drawn; prepared in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 15th of April, 1820; which letter and statement were referred to the committee on the subject of the militia.

On motion of Mr. WARFIELD, the House proceeded to the consideration of a resolution moved by him, calling on the First Comptroller of the Treasury for certain information in respect to discriminations in the list of balances due to the Government; and, after a few remarks between Messrs. SMITH and WARFIELD, it was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and the consideration of the bill for the reduction of the Military Peace Establishment was resumed.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, moved to strike out the first section of the bill, with a view to the insertion of the substitute moved by him some days ago.

Mr. COBB having requested from the mover an explanation of the considerations which had led to this motion—

Mr. SMYTH explained at length his views of the relative merits of the two systems embraced by the bill and proposed substitute.

Mr. EUSTIS followed, in reply to a part of Mr. SMYTH's observations, and giving his views of the proper organization of the Army.

Mr. COCKE next spoke in opposition to the details of the proposed substitute.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, rose and said, that he had listened with great attention to the arguments which his honorable colleague (Mr. SMYTH) had delivered in support of the amendment he had offered to the bill now under consideration, but he had not been persuaded to accept it; and he had no hesitation in saying, he preferred the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, who, after the most mature deliberation, had offered this to the House as the result of their labors; and if, said he, there was any dissenting voice besides that of his honorable colleague, he was not apprized of the fact, and desired to be corrected if he was in an error. There can be little doubt that the mover of this amendment, who is chairman of that committee, proposed his system of reduction to his committee previous to the report of the bill; but finding no support from them, has now offered it as an amendment. I am, said he, unwilling to make any change in a measure, the result of much labor and patient investigation of the ablest military gentlemen in the House; and, sir, I cannot but recur to the recommendation made to the House at the last session, by a member who has lately taken his seat, when the bill, reported by the member from Pennsylvania, I mean the honorable chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, (Mr. BALDWIN,) was under discussion, that we ought not to dot an i or cross a t—the advice is good now. For a year or two we could not find the right time to begin the work of retrenchment; this, we are told, was not the proper object to begin with, or not the place; we have, in this way, been Talleyranded in every instance, in every attempt; and, for my own part, I do not choose, upon a subject of this importance to the nation, to be Talleyranded any more. Now is the time, and this the proper object. The national debt last year was increased three millions of dollars by a loan; and this year the Secretary of the Treasury tells us, the impoverished state of your finances will require a loan of seven millions more. This is the issue: you must either retrench your expenditures, or tax the people. To tax I will not consent; nor can it be any thing short of prodigality, that, during two years of profound peace, you increase the national debt the enormous sum of ten millions of dollars, when we ought to be paying it off. I know that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) has labored hard to persuade us so large a loan was not necessary, but even he tells us we must have a loan—we must borrow.

I am not a little surprised, on every question, to find gentlemen ready with examples, drawn from the history of Europe, to induce us to adopt their measures; for my own part I cannot see the parallel, and believe the wisest policy is to suit our own views to our own country. There is no similarity in our situations. When you talk of war and military preparations, the policy of Europe, her standing armies, her posts and fortifications, are continually presented to us. In what do we resemble them? Take Germany, for example. She has a foreign Power on every side; armies, fortifications, and all the paraphernalia of military array must be kept up; as, upon the recurrence of hostilities, she is liable to the sudden inroads of all these Powers. How will this apply to us? What neighbor have we? Canada, it might be answered. That country, from the nature of things, can never make war upon us; a country we could grasp any day, but so miserable, if I were to judge from the brilliant military plans of the late war, we would not have. The only parallel, then, which I can see, is in our inordinate desire to become suddenly a "great people." Yet, sir, I confess we have good cause to suspect there is something very attracting on the other side of the water, as our citizens are so very fond of going there; but always come back worse than they go, except they know all about etiquette.

Reduction of the Army.

Mr. Chairman, I did not believe I should ever have been brought so low as to approve any of the institutions of that country; but when I heard a distinguished member last night speak of the European system of permitting their officers to retire upon half-pay, I could not otherwise than think that plan would be a greater relief to the people of this country than the mode now pursued.

Sir, I would certainly prefer their retiring upon half-pay, rather than maintain, according to this plan proposed by the Secretary of War, such an host of officers upon full pay; then, indeed, we would save to our bankrupt Treasury the one-half of this expense. Surely half-pay would retain the science of the Army, which some gentlemen talk so much about; and, in the meantime, they could add, by useful labor, something to the general good.

If the habits of soldiers have unfitted them for business, as has been said, let them learn and add to their half-pay by useful employments. I believe, however, the science of the Army seems to consist in transmitting an order through the scientific channel; for instance, when an order is issued from the Department of War, to an officer at Fort Washington, twelve miles below this city, it must go to Nashville, in Tennessee, and scientifically come back within twelve miles of the department, to its place of destination! And so, I suppose, one would go to Brownsville, in New York, and then return to Baltimore, to preserve the science of the Army. But I will say nothing about this little matter, as I do not scientifically understand it, though you know, Mr. Chairman, how it went with the Department of War—very glad to get off on any terms.

We are told that peace is the time to prepare for war, and gentlemen have said that this bill will tear down the defence of the country, and overturn the wise regulations of the Administration, and many such fine things. I know that peace is the time to prepare for war. But does that preparation consist in a few men more, or a few less? Where is the visionary who can think ten thousand a warlike preparation for this country? Notwithstanding all that has been said to deride the militia, you must at last depend upon them—an army of even twenty or thirty thousand could not guard your maritime frontier. Suppose, sir, an enemy, Great Britain, for example—I take her because I think there is a great willingness in some people to take her for example—was to arrive upon your coast with a force of forty or fifty thousand men, and threaten Boston, would the whole of your thirty thousand be sufficient to defend it? And, after putting the whole country in commotion, sail down the coast and threaten New York—what then? Your Army cannot follow them in time to render any service; you must call out the militia. When he has run you to all the expense of preparation, he changes his position, and threatens the Chesapeake Bay with an immediate invasion. Here, again, you have to rely upon the militia. Thus, every point on our whole coast is threatened with invasion. Charleston next, or Savannah, and New Orleans. And, if the enemy, during the late war, did not take advantage of your fruitless attempts to procure a regular army, it was the result of his ignorance: while his ignorance did not not secure you—the degraded militia secured you. No, sir; that is not the preparation for war. Choose your positions well upon the coast, fortify them strongly, place in them a sufficient body of troops to keep them in repair, and, in time of war, place enough of men in them to maintain and defend them. These ought to be the points from which the intermediate country should be defended; that the space between would suffer greatly, none can doubt. But did any man ever expect a country to be at war and not suffer? What kind of talk is that which insists on "driving insidious foes from our shores," and not suffering our "soil to be polluted by a foreign footstep?" Do not gentlemen know that, in war, a country has no limits but those marked by the edge of the sword? And could this country, under any circumstances, maintain an army equal at all points to an invading foe? If he has fifty thousand men on board his ships, I hold the entire expense to have been encountered; and it costs no more on the coast at Boston than it did at Liverpool. If, then, you would oppose an invading enemy of that force with success, you should have, at each of those points, at least sixty thousand men, as it is utterly impossible for the forces at Boston to follow his ships round to New Orleans. What, then, is the consequence? That your coast would require three hundred and sixty thousand troops. Let us take things as they are. This bill will keep us enough of the military to preserve our fortifications, which is all we want. In war, it would be necessary to have a regular army to promote the success of some particular design. But, at last, the militia of the country is the great reliance, as we are compelled to know, from the document this morning laid upon our tables, which shows the militia force called into the service of the country during the late war, to have amounted to three hundred and twenty-six thousand; while that of the regular army amounted to perhaps thirty-five thousand.

I am a little surprised to see how things cut about in these times; and not less surprised to find a letter of Mr. Monroe, written at the close of the late war, when Secretary of War, make its appearance in the newspapers just at the very nick of time, while this bill was before the House. How it got there is more than I can tell; for what purpose I know not; but it does appear to me to be one of those little obliquities which now and then we see in this our day. Will not every gentleman at once see that the letter, when written, contemplated a state of things which then existed totally different from that which now exists? We had just then finished a war with a powerful nation; then, too, Lord Castlereagh had just said, in his place, in the British Parliament, that if Bonaparte had been victorious at the battle of Waterloo, he could not have succeeded, as Europe had at that time one million two hundred thousand bayonets marching against him. And, sir, do we not recollect that two distinguished members of this House, whom I now see on the other side of the way, here declared, in their places, that they did not believe the peace with England to be a lasting one; that it was a mere interval of hostilities, and a war of severer conflict would soon recommence. These were the circumstances of the times when the letter recommended an army of twenty thousand men, and Congress fixed upon ten thousand as the proper number, though the House of Representatives, even then, thought six thousand the proper amount of force. But will any man think, if the condition of the world then required ten thousand, that six is not now enough, as we believe our peace a lasting one, and there is less likelihood of collision now than there has ever been since the adoption of the Constitution? While all Europe is at peace, tired and exhausted; nay, almost the whole world reposing in a dead peace, unknown to history, I believe, from the days of Moses until the present time, with the exception of the Augustan reign; and now we have another.

The Secretary of War has here given us a report upon the subject of organizing the Army, which is to consist of officers, and says, "no position connected with the organization of the Peace Establishment is susceptible of being more rigidly proved than that the proportion of its officers to the rank and file ought to be greater than in a War Establishment." Sir, if this be true, mankind has for ages been in error and darkness, and Great Britain been to us doubly unjust. During the late war she falsely charged us with putting a double proportion of officers on board our ships, that if one should be killed there should be another ready to take his place. And when the frigate Chesapeake was taken, in her battle with the Shannon, we always have believed it was because the gallant Lawrence and most of his officers had been killed. How wrong we have been! But the Secretary had not then informed us more officers were necessary in time of peace than in time of war.

We are told of our increasing population; and some gentleman think a corresponding increase of the Army necessary. This doctrine would lead to frightful consequences. We have a certain frontier to defend, and, as I have always said, certain positions on that frontier ought to be fortified; and then, whether our population shall be great or small, or increase to any extent, these posts will be adequate to their protection. We have now ten millions of inhabitants, and, according to the narrowest calculations, it doubles itself every twenty-five years. What a fearful army this, in a few years, would require, were it to double with our population! And what an increased number of posts and fortified places it would require to accommodate them!

Now, Mr. Chairman, we come to the military posts, and this document which I hold in my hand is that which, under a call of this House, the Secretary of the Department of War has sent to us; and, from the examination which I have been enabled to give it, I am compelled to say, that either the Secretary must believe Congress wholly ignorant of the defences of this country, or he himself must be destitute of the necessary information which a man in his office ought to possess. If, sir, we take all the places marked upon this list, including the places where our Generals reside, we find it spun out to the wonderful length of an hundred and twenty-six! I wish clearly to be understood; and, if I am in an error in supposing that a military post where the Generals are stationed, I will thank any gentleman in this House to correct me before I proceed any farther.

I believe, sir, from a reference to the report of the Secretary of the Department of War, in the year 1818, already reverted to by my friend from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) it will be found we then had seventy-three military posts; and now, in two years, by some strange occurrence, unknown to the country, they have of late wonderfully increased, until, indeed, they number us one hundred and twenty-six.

I have heretofore believed, in common with the rest of the citizens of this country, who did not understand the science of the army, that a military post was a place so fortified and provided with men, cannon, and defences, as to be, upon any occasion, of some advantage to the military operations of the country. But this report shows us to have been in an egregious error, as there are here many military posts where there is neither forts, magazines, cannons, arms, or men, or any single thing, except the ground where an army happened to encamp for a few days, during the late war. Sir, I will examine this wonderful list of military posts. I will, however, say nothing about those to the North, as I am not acquainted yet with that part of the country; but some of them, you will perceive, like persons wanting office, carry their labels on their foreheads, on which you may read, "I want," at every turn.

Here you see, occupying a conspicuous position, is Fort Mims. How this fort has been revived, I know not; but I had believed there was not a boy in the whole nation who had not heard of its destruction; and many fine speeches, said a gentleman on the left the other day, have been made about the blood and tomahawk, the relentless savage, which spared neither age or sex, and the bones of unfortunate victims, left to blanch upon the dreary plains; to the end, I suppose, we might not forget the poor Indians, whilst all, with a sentimental delicacy for the honor of civilization, choose to forget the scenes at Hampton as soon as possible. But this fort, I suppose, possessed the properties of the phoenix, and has risen from its ashes in all its military array. Next to this we find Fort Stoddart. How this came here is equally strange, as, Mr. Chairman, I believe for the last ten years there has not been any thing in this fort, without it is an alligator, that sometimes chooses that as a place of retirement, to bask undisturbed in the sun. Fort St. Stephens is on the list, and shows how amply we have been disposed to provide for the safety of the government of the State of Alabama, as that place has been, until lately, the metropolis of the State. This partiality for that State ought to create some jealousy among us to the South; but, as it is among ourselves, we will forgive the predilection. Next in order is Fort Claiborne, which is now, as my friend from Alabama will testify, a beautiful little town, containing about two or three thousand inhabitants. After passing this town to the next military post, we find it to be Fort Strother, which we are told is on the Coosa river, at the junction of the Etawha; and here we find, in the establishment of this fort, that valuable corps we hear so much about, called the topographical engineers, displayed a skill and accuracy equal alone to this report, as there is no stream at all entering the Coosa river at that fort. But there we find the Secretary's local prejudices in full growth, which I must confess I had rather seen otherwise, as Fort Strother is one of the most flourishing cotton plantations in all the South. Fort Williams, it is true, is on the Indian land; but, whilst it stands on one side of the Coosa, the other is in the highest state of cultivation, covered with the finest cotton plantations in the country. Look here! About twelve miles above St. Louis is a military post, called Fort St. Charles, a beautiful little town, containing a thousand inhabitants. But, Mr. Chairman, here are some military posts which startle us with their warlike preparations. This is Belle Fontaine, on the Missouri, defended by three men! and Fort Osage, at the confluence of the Osage and Missouri rivers, as ably defended by one man! There too is Fort Edwards, in Illinois—in what part of the State I cannot learn; but it does appear that it is not quite so well defended as Fort Osage. It appears too that the mouth of Licking, in the State of Kentucky, on the opposite bank of the Ohio river from the city of Cincinnati, is a military post, defended by the imposing force of one man!

Sir, if this report had not come in so opportunely, we should have gone home without knowing that the city of New Orleans, Natchez, St. Louis, the town of Nashville, in Tennessee, and Brownsville, in New York, were all important military posts. But, here we have a new scene. As if they did not grow up fast enough by ones, we get them by twos. Here, sir, is Fort Plaquemine and Fort St. Philip, two names for the same spot, as my friend from Louisiana (Mr. BUTLER) assures me. Next in order are Fort Bowyer and Fort Mobile Point, which prove to be the precise same place. Then come Fort Toulouse and Fort Jackson, not less extraordinary than the others. The history of Fort Toulouse, if I am not greatly mistaken, is this; that, when the extravagant pretensions of England produced the war of 1755, when she was opposed by France and Spain, a chain of military posts was attempted by France, to be established from Canada to the Gulf, to confine the British within their own territory, and this Fort Toulouse was one of them. But, after the peace of 1763, that military post remained a retreat only for wildcats and foxes, until the late war; when, at the close of the Creek campaign, the army cut away the trees which had grown up in the meantime, and removed some old iron cannon which lay in their way, with their trunnions broken off, and built Fort Jackson upon the self-same spot; and yet the Secretary gives us Fort Toulouse and Fort Jackson as two military posts.

I must confess, sir, this reminds me very forcibly of an anecdote I once heard of an Irishman, who said, he liked to live in America very well, but he believed he would have remained in his own country, where he had every convenience, and as fine a farm as any in Ireland; but there was a little encumbrance upon it, which made it rather disagreeable, which was, that another man's land lay right on the top of it.

Mr. Chairman, I am indeed astonished how it is possible for the head of a department to have been so imperfectly informed as to the real state of what are here reported to us as military posts; and how they can be mentioned both in debate and in official documents as existing posts, where a portion of our force may be required, and used indeed as a pretext to palliate the retention of this present useless force, is not less astonishing. If, sir, you reject from this report all the arsenals, the houses of the generals, the camps and cantonments, where troops chanced to stay for a few weeks during the late war; and all the forts, where there are neither soldiers, guns, nor fortifications; and all those in cotton fields, as well as those the long time den of wild beasts; you will find this list of one hundred and twenty-six, dwindled down to fifty-eight; and, I do not hesitate to say, the true military aspect of this country will never require that number; and, when another subject comes before the House, I think I shall be able to show that not more than perhaps thirty are in any event necessary.

I cannot divine how it is the gentleman from South Carolina undertakes to brand the supporters of this measure as aiming a blow, through it, at the Executive. Does he know the Executive to be hostile to the measure now under debate? He tells us, too, the President's glory is in the magnitude of the fortifications of the country. For my own part, I think myself a better friend to him than to believe he would place his glory upon any other basis than the administration of the laws for the prosperity of the country and the welfare of the people.

It is difficult for me to see the necessity for this army, organized as it is. We have two Major Generals and four Brigadiers in service, whilst we have not as many men at any one place as would constitute a captain's guard; but I suppose it must be necessary to us, as we must be a "great people." These officers receive near seven thousand dollars a year, for no other service than living comfortably at home, and transmitting the orders of the Department of War; as it seems the Secretary of that department has no choice left him but compliance. This sum is enormous; yet I will not say it is an abuse, as it is drawn through the medium of the law; though, whilst their pay is two thousand four hundred dollars a year, their allowance for servants, houses, quarters, kitchens, fire-wood, and other little matters, swells it to that sum. The life though, of some of them, is not a dull monotony, in "these piping times of peace," as we might suppose; as we are informed a visit is made each Winter to this imperial city, by some means or other, moving in the style of an Eastern satrap, says my friend from North Carolina, with all the pomp of military indulgence, having twelve hundred pounds of baggage, three rooms, and a kitchen in the train, come to Washington by an order from the Department of War, and obtain transportation for it all; should, however, the journey have been commenced without an order, one is kindly furnished when the city is entered; such would be the beneficent disposition of a well drilled department.

These things, when we had a Treasury overflowing with money, would have been wrong; but now, when the Treasury is unable to pay, it is little else than an abuse of the trust reposed in us by the people, who expect from us a faithful account of our conduct. When the welfare of the country shall require taxes, I will vote them. But to borrow millions every year, thereby increasing the national debt in time of peace instead of paying it off—to tax the country, already embarrassed with difficulties of their own, to support this prodigal system, is what I cannot do. A prudent man will limit his expenditures to the amount of his income, and that which is right in an individual, cannot be wrong in a nation.

We have heard much of the services of our officers, their high expectations, and generous sacrifices of personal prospects; all this may be true, and, as an individual, I am always proud to honor the meritorious officer. But, can it be possible for an individual as brave, as patriotic, and disinterested as they are represented to be, should desire to remain one moment in the army, after they know their country did not stand in need of their services? Would they not rather feel dishonored by the belief that pecuniary compensation was all they sought? Let us do the country justice, Mr. Chairman, and when the services of these officers are wanting, let us require them and pay them; when they achieve deeds of valor, let us reward them; when they display heroic patriotism and devotion to the country, let us give them our distinguished consideration. This, sir, is the highest reward any man can receive from a free people.

The officer who would wish to remain in service one minute longer than his country desired him, or wanted his services, is unworthy of its confidence or commission. Why are we told of irritated feelings or animosity of individuals? If these exist, then instantly disband the army; it has already existed too long for the good of the country. The danger of a standing army is not that there is any fear of their overthrowing the Constitution at one blow; but the tainted feelings they engender, and the influence it acquires upon public opinion. I hope the day has not arrived when we fear to disband an army, even though its number should be ten or fifty thousand; if we do, then liberty has fled, we have nothing left us but the shadow. Let us beware in time, and keep pure the national feeling from the influence of this dangerous doctrine of "you can't do enough," and you are "bound to fulfil expectations yourselves have created." Against this, and the impatient desire to cram into every office military men, to the exclusion of citizens of better pretensions, I must protest. It is ruinous and unjust.

Sir, at a future day, when our population will have increased, and we involved in some future war, necessity or favor will compel us to create major generals, lieutenant generals, generals, and field marshals; when the doctrine of the science of the Army will apply then as now; and to guard against future evil as much as we can, we ought to give an example now of that moderate and disinterested justice to disbanded armies, which future ages ought to pursue.

We ought to remember a lesson already given in the exhibition of feeling in a publication addressed to the nation by the disbanded officers of the late war. It is only necessary to advert to it; the memory of every gentleman in the House will recall it to their recollection; a more severe, acrimonious, bitter, biting, rancorous piece, I yet have never seen. It is in this way inroads are made upon the national feeling, and whenever the representatives of the people shall fail to consult any interest but that of their country, there is an end to the Constitution. Control them now; when you cannot, you are slaves. Gradual approach is the march of tyranny. Can any man believe there was much to surprise the people of Rome when a certain Emperor created his horse priest and consul? Could this have been done in the purer days of Rome? No, sir, they had been accustomed to see small changes and innovations, until, from one step to another, they arrived at this last degree of degradation; themselves impotent and despised, doubtless beheld this spectacle without wonder or astonishment.

Much has been said of the inutility of the militia. They have been contemned and despised to enhance the claim and usefulness of a standing Army. We are told, too, that this Army is necessary for the protection of our Western frontier, which is feeble and defenceless. Mr. Chairman, I will not speak on that subject. I cannot trust my feelings; but, sir, this I may say, that I know well the kind of protection given to the West by your standing armies. No man has suffered more than myself by the wars of the country, though I was too young to have any personal concern in them; then it was the brave and dauntless frontier man protected himself, and often your Army—for all was war; then, sir, every individual could aim the unerring rifle, and often their wives and daughters could use them with skill and effect; and whilst tilling their fields of corn, each would in turn remain on guard; then, too, battles were fought, where deeds of valor were displayed, which would have rivalled the boast of any age or country; nor did they expect rewards in office, favor, swords, or medals, for the enemies they killed or did not kill.

But I will not, as I have not spoken of these things. My friend from Kentucky, who I see before me, (Mr. HARDIN,) is better acquainted with these occurrences than I am, or any gentleman in the House, may picture them to you. He is more capable than I am, and can do the subject more justice. Let him speak, and you will learn whether your militia ought to be so despised.

I will not trouble you further. Under any view which I can take of this matter, I cannot see any good cause why the Army should not be reduced. Let it be fixed upon the most economical basis, and we yet may avoid loans and taxes in time of peace, which will some day ruin this country. Let us often recur to the pure original feelings and opinions which we once had, and then perhaps we may preserve the Republic from the inevitable fate which the gradual change of original principle must bring upon it. Let us recur to the maxims of 1801, and all will be well; if not, expect prodigality and ruin.

Mr. TRIMBLE followed Mr. FLOYD in opposition to so indiscriminate a reduction of the Staff of the Army as was desired by some gentlemen.

The question was then taken on Mr. SMYTH's motion, and decided in the negative.

Mr. HARDIN then, after some general remarks in favor of his object, moved to amend the bill by adding thereto a new section, to abolish any commutation for subsistence of the officers, forage, servants and servants' hire, and subsistence and clothing, transportation, and any other incidental charges whatever, and to allow in lieu thereof — per cent. on the amount of pay now allowed the officers respectively.

Before deciding on this motion, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned at 4 o'clock.

THURSDAY, January 18.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Peter Stephen Chazotte, of Philadelphia, enclosing a printed pamphlet, entitled "Facts and Observations on the Culture of Vines, Olives, Capers, Almonds, &c., in the Southern States, and of Coffee, Cocoa, and Cochineal, in East Florida."—Referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of Edward Barry, a sailing-master in the Navy of the United States, praying compensation for his household furniture, destroyed in the navy yard, in the city of Washington, on the 24th of August, 1814; which petition was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Committee on the Public Lands were discharged from the consideration of the memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of Missouri, praying that relief may be extended to certain purchasers of public lands, referred to that committee on the 11th instant; and that the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill regulating the payment of debts due from purchasers of public lands.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill authorizing Benjamin H. Rand to import a certain piece of plate free of duty; which was read twice, and committed.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering the times of holding the terms of the district court of the United States for the northern district of the State of New York.

Mr. SILSBEE submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to lay before this House a statement of the number of inspectors, and of weighers, gaugers, and measurers, employed in each part of the United States, and of the amount of pay received by each of those officers for each of the last five years; and, also, a statement of the names of persons who have been employed as agents for building or supplying light-houses, revenue cutters, or marine hospitals, in the several districts of the United States, with the amount of compensation which has been paid to each of them, for these services, within the last five years.

On motion of Mr. SILSBEE, the Committee of Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing imported goods, on which the duty has been paid or secured, to be transported coastwise, from the district into which they were imported, to one or more other districts, without losing the benefit of debenture when exported from the United States, within the time prescribed by law.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the bill to reduce the Army to six thousand men—Mr. HARDIN's amendment offered yesterday being still under consideration.

Mr. HARDIN having since yesterday ascertained, in conversation, that the Military Committee had now a proposition before them, similar to that which he had offered by way of amendment to this bill, said he would leave the subject to them at present. He therefore withdrew his amendment.

The Committee then proceeded with the consideration of the details of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved an amendment, going to retain one-half of the topographical engineers, and followed his motion by a number of remarks on the valuable services this corps had rendered; the destitute condition of the Government and the military service of topographical information, at the commencement of the late war; the disasters which had ensued therefrom, instances of which he detailed; the mass of useful and essential information which they had given, and were daily acquiring, by their surveys, for the public use, &c.

Mr. COCKE opposed the motion, and spoke to show that the information wanted in some of the instances referred to by Mr. S., might have been acquired by any of the citizens in the vicinity of the scene of operations, &c. He was further opposed to any material amendments, as they might tend to defeat the bill; it was a course deprecated and avoided at the last session by the friends of the tariff bill, and he wished to show the House that the friends of this bill could not be outflanked, and that, though militia had been so much decried, he wished it to be seen that, on this occasion, there was something like discipline in their ranks, and that they would not be decoyed from their object by amendments.

Mr. SMITH said he really had never heard so broad a declaration as this in the House—that the friends of reduction were to rally round a bill, good or bad, right or wrong. He avowed himself a friend of the bill, so far as regarded a reduction of the Army; but he desired to make the organization as perfect as possible.

Mr. MERCER entered into a detail of many of the duties devolved on the topographical corps, for civil as well as military purposes, to show the great value of their talents and services to the nation. He adverted to the small number (ten or twelve) of which this corps even now consisted, and the little expense they were to the country. He referred, particularly, to many instances in which their talents and services had been of the utmost importance to the national defence, and many in which, had they been employed, they would have prevented defeat and disgrace to the arms of the Republic. Mr. M. concluded his remarks by moving to amend his amendment so as to retain the whole instead of half of the corps of topographical engineers. Believing, however, that the provision retaining the corps of engineers would be construed to retain the topographical corps connected therewith, he hoped this motion would be withdrawn, that it might be made when another part of the bill should be reached.

The motion was withdrawn by Mr. SMITH.

Mr. FORD moved to strike out the provision for retaining a surgeon general, considering him to have little or nothing to do, and that his duties might be discharged by the apothecary general.

This motion was opposed by Mr. STORRS, and was supported by the mover; but who, subsequently, withdrew his amendment, to obtain further information on the subject.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved so to amend the bill as to give to the Quartermaster General (as at present) the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, instead of reducing his rank, pay, &c., to that of a colonel of cavalry, as proposed by the bill.

The question on this amendment was decided in the negative—ayes 50, noes 58.

Mr. MERCER moved to strike out the fifth section of the bill, which abolishes the topographical engineers and their assistants—wishing, as he before stated, to retain in service the whole of that corps, and further advocated his object.

Mr. HARDIN spoke at some length against the amendment, and to show that the information collected by this corps and embodied in maps was not of such importance to military movements; the whole face of the country, in its water courses, roads, bridges, &c., constantly changing, rendered the maps made now useless in future wars, &c. He might not be averse to retaining a part of the topographical corps; but deeming this bill the result of much military knowledge and experience in the committee which pronounced this corps unnecessary, he was not prepared to act in opposition to the plan which they recommended, &c.

Mr. MERCER replied to Mr. H. If the argument of Mr. COCKE, that the bill was not to be touched, lest it should be endangered, and that of Mr. HARDIN, that all amendment was precluded by an implicit confidence in the views of a committee, were to prevail in this House, he could have nothing more to do with this bill, or indeed with any other. He proceeded to reply in detail to the objections of Mr. H. to the corps in question, and to show the necessity of retaining them.

Mr. HARDIN rejoined at considerable length.

Mr. MALLARY referred to the duties of the different branches of the engineers, as laid down in the rules and regulations of the War Department, to show that the duties of the topographical corps were called for only in a state of war, and that they would consequently not be requisite in a Peace Establishment; objecting particularly to retaining the number now in service, which equalled the whole number in service during the late war.

Mr. MERCER went into a further exposition of his views in defence of the topographical corps, and in reply to Mr. HARDIN.

The question being taken on Mr. MERCER's amendment, it was decided in the negative, without a count.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then renewed his motion to retain one-half of the topographical engineers.

Mr. BRUSH spoke in reply to Mr. MALLARY, in regard to the relative duties of engineers and topographical engineers, to show that his conclusions were not accurate, and to show the great utility of the duties of the latter corps as well as the former; and to retain at least a part of the topographical corps, even at the expense of part of the engineers themselves; that to have a perfect system, a part of each corps ought to be retained, and not any one sacrificed entirely.

Mr. SMITH's amendment was also negatived—ayes 43.

Mr. CANNON moved to amend the 7th section, so as to make the same allowance of three months extra pay to the disbanded non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, as is provided for disbanded officers.

After some little discussion, this motion was lost without a division.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to amend the bill so as to allow a salary of three thousand, instead of two thousand dollars, to the Commissary General of

JANUARY, 1821.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

Purchases, and followed his motion with some remarks against reducing, (as the bill proposed,) the salary of an officer whose duties were so important and had been so ably and faithfully discharged as they had been by the officer now in service.

Mr. EUSTIS added his opinion that the sum of $3,000 was not more than an adequate salary for this officer. He as fully deserved this sum, from the nature of his duties, and the fidelity of their execution, as any laborer was worth a dollar a day.

Mr. COCKE argued, from the duties incident to this office, which he detailed to the Committee, that the sum of $2,000 a year was an adequate compensation; considering it also probable that this officer was engaged in other business of his own, &c.

Mr. SERGEANT supported the motion, from a conviction of its justice, derived from a personal knowledge of the entire and exclusive devotion of the present Commissary General of Purchases to the discharge of his duties.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said $3,000 was the sum originally given to this officer and argued that if a reduction of it should drive the present officer, now fully experienced in his duties, from the service, it would probably be extremely detrimental to the service; he disbursed perhaps a million of dollars annually, and $3,000 was a very low commission on the amount of the disbursement; his duties were also multifarious and laborious; and his salary ought to be such as not to drive him to other means of support, if not from service; indeed if he were to engage in any private business, he ought not to be retained in the public service.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, was averse to arguing thus ad hominem. The salary of this officer was no more than $3,000 during the war, when his duties were much greater, and Mr. W. thought the diminished duties of a Peace Establishment made a corresponding reduction of salary equitable and proper.

Mr. RICH was opposed to reducing the salary of any particular officer—he was willing to go into the subject of a general reduction of salaries; but, until then, would not consent to single out a particular case. He was, therefore, in favor of the amendment.

Mr. FLOOR hoped, then, that this subject would be laid by for the present, and the subject of salaries taken up, in which case he trusted that of the Commissary General of Purchases would not be the only one reduced.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remarked, in reply to Mr. WILLIAMS, that this salary was fixed at $3,000 long before the late war; and during that war he had many deputies to assist him.

The amendment proposing to make the salary $3,000 was rejected without a division.

Mr. FULLER moved to amend the bill by adding a provision for one Adjutant and Inspector General in addition to the Assistant Adjutant and Assistant Inspector General.

This motion, after some discussion, was negatived without a division.

Mr. STORRS moved to change the provision of one Assistant Inspector General, to a provision for one Inspector General; and supported his motion by referring to the important, essential, and valuable duties of this branch of the service.

After some debate, this motion was also negatived, without a division.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, moved an amendment, the effect of which, in substance, was to prevent the consolidation of the corps of ordnance with that of the artillery, and to preserve the corps of ordnance distinct and separate, as at present.

This amendment was briefly discussed, without any strong objections being urged against it, and it was agreed to—ayes 64, noes 37.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, the bill was further amended by substituting the word discharged for the word deranged, as applied to those to be disbanded under the bill.

Mr. TRIMBLE moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following section:

Be it further enacted, That hereafter, of the pay allowed by law to each enlisted soldier there shall be retained — dollars and — cents per month, until the term of enlistment shall expire, or until legally discharged; at which time the retained sums shall be paid to each soldier personally, without regard to any transfer or assignment, and without being subject to any lien arising upon any contract or engagement made after the date of enlistment; and, in the event of death in service, the sums so retained shall be paid only to the widow of the deceased, or to his heirs at law, or their guardian, under the same rules and regulations now established in similar cases.

Mr. T. wondered that such a provision had not been before incorporated in the system. The desertions were very numerous, and it was proper that part of the soldiers' pay should be retained to operate against desertion and as a penalty for it. The practice in the Roman army, he remarked, was excellent. The books of the regiment always accompanied the colors of the regiment—if the colors were lost, the books were lost too, and the State thereby gained all the retained pay; but the consequence was, that the colors were seldom lost.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. COCKE, and Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, on the ground that such a provision would be reported in a different bill, in which it would be more appropriate.

The amendment was negatived.

The Committee of the Whole then rose, and reported the bill and amendments to the House; and the amendments of the Committee were successively adopted, without variation, except as related to the ordnance corps, which, on motion of Mr. COBB, was so modified as to consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, six captains, six first, six second, and six third lieutenants.

Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. STORRS, and Mr. FULLER, renewed, without success, the motions which they had respectively made in Committee to amend the bill.

Mr. COBB renewed, and spoke in support of the motion, unsuccessfully made in Committee by Mr. SMITH of Maryland, to give the Quartermaster General the rank, pay, and emoluments of a Brigadier General, in lieu of those of Colonel of Cavalry.

The motion was opposed by Mr. FLOYD, on principle, and was supported by Mr. SMITH of Virginia, also on principle.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. LATHROP moved to deprive the Adjutant General, the Quartermaster General, and Judge Advocate, of the proposed rank, but to leave them the pay and emoluments of a Colonel of Cavalry; which motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. ANDERSON, after some remarks in opposition to the plan of reduction proposed by the present bill, and in explanation of his views of a different organization, moved that the House come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill be recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to report a bill placing the present Military Establishment of the United States under the command of one Major General, and two Brigadiers General, and containing other provisions necessary for making the staff of the Army conform to this arrangement.

The motion was negatived without debate, ayes 26; and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 19.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill authorizing the President of the United States to remove the land office in the district of Lawrence county, in the Territory of Arkansas; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Friday next.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to alter the times of holding the district court in the northern district of New York; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Wednesday next.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill authorizing the settlement of the accounts of the late Le Roy Opie; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the report made at the last session on the petition of Hoel Lawrence.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill authorizing the establishment of a penitentiary within the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting the President to inform the House (if in his opinion proper) whether any, and, if any, what negotiations, since the first of January, 1816, have been had with the Six Nations of Indians, or any portion of them; who the commissioners or agents were; the objects of the negotiation; the expenses of the same; the compensation of each commissioner, secretary, or agent, and to whom the moneys were paid; I now transmit a report from the Secretary of War, communicating the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1821.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the amount of merchandise on hand at the different Indian trading-houses, and in the hands of the superintendent of the Indian trade, at cost; rendered in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 13th instant; which letter and statement were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MALLARY, after some remarks, going to show that there was reason to believe there were several officers of the Army, employed in certain of the public offices, to whom compensation was paid for their clerical services, in addition to their pay as officers, and with the view of obtaining precise information on this subject, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire whether any officers of the Army of the United States are employed as clerks or in any other capacity, in any of the Departments, or in the office of the Surgeon General or Apothecary General, and whether such officers, if any, have received any other compensation than their pay as officers; if so, what are their names, and what extra compensation have they received.

Mr. LITTLE moved to amend the resolution so as to make it a direct call on the Secretary of War for the information; which motion, after some conversation between three or four gentlemen, was negatived, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH gave notice that he should on Monday next call for the consideration of the bill making provision for the family of the late Commodore Perry.

On motion of Mr. GORHAM, the Committee of Commerce were directed to inquire into the expediency of placing such a number of buoys on the Nantucket shoals, in the Vineyard sound, on the coast of Massachusetts, as may be necessary to render the navigation the more secure.

REVENUE OFFICERS.

The following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SUGREE was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to lay before this House a statement of the number of inspectors and weighers, gaugers and measurers, employed in each port of the United States, and of the amount of pay received by each of those officers for each of the last five years; and also a statement of the names of persons who have been employed as agents for building or supplying lighthouses, revenue cutters, or marine hospitals, to the several districts of the United States, with the amount of compensation which has been paid to each of them for their services within the last five years.

Mr. TOMLINSON wished the call somewhat extended, so as to obtain information on a subject in which there were considerable abuses practised, some particulars of which he referred to. He moved therefore to add the following to the resolution:

“Designating the persons who during the said period were paid as inspectors, and who at the same time performed the duties and received the fees of weighers, gaugers, and measurers, and the amount paid to such persons respectively, for services rendered in each of the capacities aforesaid.”

This amendment was accepted by Mr. SILSBEE, and thus modified, the resolution was agreed to.

HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Public Buildings, in the House of Representatives, to whom was referred the resolution of this House of the 19th of December, 1820, instructing them “to inquire into the practicability of making such alterations in the present structure of the Hall of the House of Representatives, as shall better adapt it to the purposes of a deliberative assembly; and, if no such alteration can be effected, to ascertain whether it be practicable to provide a suitable hall in the centre building of the Capitol,” delivered the following report:

That, in obedience to the above-recited resolution, they have examined the practicability of making any alterations in the Hall of the House of Representatives, that would render it more convenient for the transaction of public business, with all the attention in their power.

They have, also, submitted the different plans for this purpose that have occurred in the course of their inquiries, or that have been suggested to them, to the examination of the architect of the public buildings, who has furnished them with his opinion of the alteration most likely to produce the desired effect in the Hall of the House of Representatives, accompanied with a drawing exhibiting the form and construction of such alteration, and an estimate of the expense of its construction.

From the result of their own inquiries, as well as the examination of the public architect, the committee have reason to believe, that a level glass ceiling, at the foot of the dome, resting on the stone entablature over the columns, would, in a great measure, prevent the evils that are now experienced from the expansion of the voice and the reverberation of the sound; and is, on every account, the most eligible alteration for this purpose of which the room is susceptible, compatible with the preservation of the proportions of the Hall and the use of the gallery, and least injurious to the beauty of its appearance.

But, although the committee have no doubt that the alteration suggested may be so constructed as to be perfectly secure, and might contribute to improve the facility of speaking and hearing in the Hall of the House of Representatives, yet they think it questionable whether the alteration is absolutely necessary, and whether the disadvantages incident to it would not counterbalance the benefits to be derived from it.

Independently of the objection arising from the expense, in the present state of the Treasury, it is objectionable on other accounts: it would lessen the circulation of the air in the room, and render it sooner liable to become impure; would obstruct the view of the dome, and impair the beauty of the Hall.

Experience proves that the members speak with more ease, and hear more readily, at the present session, than they did during the last. The difference, it is believed, is in a great measure to be ascribed to the drying of the walls, and there can be but little doubt but that further improvement may be expected from the same cause.

The centre building of the Capitol does not furnish a suitable Hall for the members of the House of Representatives. The only room that would admit them is the one destined for the Library of Congress, and that, in the opinion of the committee, is not calculated for their convenient accommodation, or the admission of spectators.

The committee are induced to believe that, by carpeting the gallery, to prevent the noise which arises from moving from one place to another, and by strict order in the House, business may now be done with tolerable facility, and a few years' experience will ascertain the full effect of the drying of the walls.

The committee are, therefore, of opinion, that provision should be made for carpeting the gallery; and, that any further alteration in the Hall should await the result of further experience. They submit the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That a sum of money be added to the appropriations for the public buildings, for the present year, for the purpose of carpeting the gallery of the House of Representatives.

The report was read, and committed.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

The House, then, on the motion of Mr. BARRETT, proceeded to consider the “bill in addition to the several acts making provision for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war.”

This bill was discussed, in Committee of the Whole, on the 3d instant, and, having been reported to the House, Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following sections:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no pensioner under the aforesaid acts shall be stricken from the rolls, who, upon giving in the schedule of his property as is therein directed, shall be worth less, after deducting his debts, than ——— dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every pensioner who has, under the act of the 1st of May, 1820, been stricken from the pension roll, shall be placed again on the pension roll, if application shall be made by him, if, upon examining his schedule, he is worth less than ——— dollars.

The question was on the adoption of this amendment; and on this question, as well as on the bill itself, incidentally, much debate again took place—Messrs. HARDIN and GROSS, of New York, advocating the amendment, and Messrs. BARRETT, ROBERTSON, TOMLINSON, and BROWN, opposing it. The debate had continued some time, when,

On motion of Mr. BARRETT, (who in calling it up had no idea of interfering materially in the progress of the other business before the House,) the bill and amendment were again laid on the table.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce the Military Peace Establishment of the United States.

Mr. STORRS submitted to the House a number of remarks to show the inexpediency of abolishing the existing provisions for the inspection of the army, and of the substitute proposed by the bill for one assistant inspector, and concluded his remarks with a motion to strike out the clause providing "an assistant inspector general," with a view of moving afterwards to insert a provision for one inspector general.

The amendment was opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, FOOT, and COCKE; and was supported by Messrs. STORRS, GROSS of New York, ROBERTSON, SMITH of Maryland, and MERCER. The debate continued until near 4 o'clock; when,

The question being taken on the proposed amendment, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 71.

Mr. STORRS then moved to insert a provision for "one inspector general;" and the motion was agreed to without debate—yeas 76, nays 69.

Mr. FORD moved to amend the bill by striking out the provision for one apothecary general, conceiving that the duties belonging to that office might be well discharged by the surgeon general, and the office dispensed with, to show which he offered several remarks.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. FLOYD, and was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. MERCER moved to strike out the fifth section of the bill, which abolishes the topographical corps; which motion was negatived without a division.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, who asked for the opponents of the bill an opportunity to present their views on the subject, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, January 20.

Mr. JOHNSON laid before the House certain resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress "to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law, permitting the purchasers of public lands at private sale to apply the instalments already paid to the payment in full for such portion of their purchases as such instalments may be adequate to pay for at the price of two dollars per acre, and to relinquish the balance of their purchases to the United States," and requesting them to present the same to the Senate and House of Representatives; which resolutions were read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill regulating the payment of debts due from the purchasers of public lands.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill concerning invalid pensioners; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, the committee on the subject of reviving, for a limited time, the currency of foreign gold coins in the United States, were instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing also, for a further limited time, the currency of French crowns and five franc pieces; and, also, into the expediency of increasing the relative value of the gold which may hereafter be coined at the Mint of the United States.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement showing the tonnage of vessels of the United States which entered from, and cleared for, ports in France, together with the tonnage of French vessels which entered the ports of the United States from the same, during the years 1816, 1817, 1818, and 1819, prepared in obedience to the resolution of the House of the 3d instant; which letter and statement were referred to the Committee of Commerce.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House then again proceeded to the consideration of the bill for reducing the Military Peace Establishment.

Mr. FULLER delivered at large the reasons, general as well as of detail, which induced him to oppose the passage of this bill in its present shape.

Mr. TOMLINSON, of Connecticut, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The bill now before the House has been so ably, and, I may add, so eloquently discussed, by honorable gentlemen who have preceded me, and that discussion has been protracted to such an extent, that, for prolonging it, I am conscious an apology may be expected. Anxious, as the House evidently is, to take the final question on this bill, I very reluctantly occupy any portion of its time. But the objections to the bill under consideration, which have been offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. FULLER,) who has just resumed his seat, deserve a reply, and have determined me to put the patience of the House to a further trial. Knowing, however, that the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEDES,) wishes on this day to present to the House his views in relation to the financial condition of the country, I shall not enter as fully into the various considerations connected with this question, as, under different circumstances, I should feel disposed to do.

My honorable friend from Massachusetts alleges that the bill under consideration ought not to pass, because by its provisions the corps of topographical engineers, in his opinion a necessary part of a Peace Establishment, will not be retained in the service of the country.

Not being a military man, and making no pretensions to practical military science, I have, for the purpose of acting understandingly on this subject, adverted to "the military laws, and rules, and regulations for the army," which a friend near me has put into my hand. In this book the duties of the topographical engineers, and also those required of the engineers, are particularly detailed, and it will be distinctly seen that those duties do not essentially differ in time of peace. By this military code, which has been compiled under the direction of the Department of War, for the government of the army, the topographical engineers are required to make such surveys, and exhibit such delineations of these, as the commanding General shall direct, and make plans of all military positions which the army may occupy, and of their respective vicinities, indicating the various roads, rivers, creeks, ravines, hills, woods, and villages, to be found therein.

JANUARY, 1821.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

From the same authority I learn that the duties assigned to "the corps of engineers, comprise the direction of fortifications, military reconnoiterings, embracing surveys and examinations of the country, and surveys of sites that may be designated for defence, with maps and plans of the same. These reconnoiterings, surveys, maps, and plans, will be made, from time to time, by such engineers as may be assigned to those duties."

Now, sir, will the honorable member from Massachusetts, or any other member who may be disposed to retain the topographical engineers, as a distinct department, designate the exclusive duties of that corps? They seem not to differ even in name from those required to be performed by the corps of engineers. Are any duties assigned to the former corps which may not be properly and efficiently discharged by the other? Surveys, maps, and plans, are to be made by each, with the same objects, and for the same purposes, and under precisely the same regulations.

Will it be pretended that the corps of engineers are not adequate to the performance of these duties? If so, dismiss them from the public service. But their skill and ability will not be questioned. They are men of experience, and practical military science. Are they not, then, sufficiently numerous? This corps now consists of one colonel, one assistant engineer, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, six captains, six lieutenants, and six second lieutenants, besides non-commissioned officers and privates. Surely the addition of the topographical engineers, drawing a considerable amount of compensation, cannot be necessary, nor even expedient, in time of peace.

It ought not, however, to be concealed that, in a time of war, certain duties are assigned to the topographical engineers, which, by the existing regulations, are not required of the engineers. These are, "to accompany all reconnoitering parties sent out to obtain intelligence of the enemy, or of his positions, &c.; to make sketches of their route, accompanied by written notices of every thing worthy of observation thereon; to keep a journal of every day's movement when the Army is in march, noticing the varieties of ground, of buildings, of culture, and distances, and state of the roads between given points, throughout the march of the day; and, lastly, to exhibit the relative positions of contending armies on fields of battle, and the positions made, whether for attack or defence." But these duties seem to me more properly to belong to the staff of the acting Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and some of them might be performed even by his private confidential secretary, with more utility to the service than by a distinct corps. Indeed, during the Revolutionary war, these duties were often performed by the Commander-in-Chief in person. Besides, should the country unfortunately be again involved in a war, those duties may be easily transferred to the corps of engineers, who, I trust, will be found to possess sufficient military science to keep a journal of the movements of the Army. I trust it will not be seriously contended, that a distinct and separate corps must be preserved and paid, for the purpose of performing services so inconsiderable.

But, sir, it is further objected, that the bill now before the House proposes to abolish the office of adjutant and inspector general. Whatever may be the importance of such a "department," it has not the authority of long experience to sustain it. I had supposed that the duties of an adjutant general and an inspector general were entirely dissimilar, and could not well be discharged by the same person.

The adjutant general is the officer through whom all orders from the Department of War are communicated to the Army, and from whom "reports of services performed, and returns intended to exhibit the strength of the corps, are transmitted to the same department. To this officer is committed the direction of the military correspondence."

The inspector general is required to be with the Army. It is his duty to inspect the troops; "to ascertain the exact state of their arms, equipments, and clothing, and of every other circumstance tending to show the actual condition of the troops so inspected," and may be said to exercise a general superintendence over "the police of the army." On this officer depends the discipline of the army.

The bill under consideration contains a provision that there shall be an adjutant general and an inspector general attached to the Army. Why, then, continue the office of adjutant and inspector general with his clerks? Why not suffer the adjutant general and the inspector general to communicate with the War Department? What need of this intermediate department? Sir, it is worse than useless; it is a mere excrescence; its continuance would materially affect the symmetry of the establishment proposed by the present bill, and in my judgment it ought to cease.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts has thought proper to bring to the consideration of the House the character and qualifications of the officer who now holds the station of adjutant and inspector general, and to say that, if he were not "actually engaged on the lines during the late war, it was because his repeated requests to be so employed were denied." Sir, with the character of that officer, or any other in the Army, I have nothing to do on the present occasion. The officers and men of our Army, during the late war, distinguished themselves by their valor, and both deserved and received the almost unqualified applause of a grateful country. But I will not detract from the glory which they acquired in that eventful and victorious contest, by admitting, for a moment, that they were influenced by any but the most honorable considerations. I trust they joined the Army to defend, not to become a burden to their country.

H. OF R.

Reduction of the Army.

JANUARY, 1821.

The gentleman from Massachusetts will not claim that they were mercenaries. If their patriotism impelled them to the field, can it be supposed that, disregarding the example of their predecessors of the Revolution, they will reluctantly quit the profession of arms, and resume the pursuits of private life, when their country no longer needs their services? A contrary supposition would, in my judgment, tarnish the glory which they have so bravely won. Sir, the man who wishes to hold a sinecure in this Government is unworthy of its confidence.

But, sir, I do protest against this mode of legislating. I will not suffer myself, in forming an opinion upon this question, to inquire how it may affect particular individuals—who may be retained and who discharged? The sole inquiry I feel disposed to make is, what does the good of this nation require? Having ascertained that the demands of individual friendship must yield to that consideration which, in legislating, is paramount to all others, the interest of my country.

If the considerations which have been suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts were to govern, you could never disband an army. The force found necessary in war, must be retained in peace. But on the termination of the late war, with the flattering prospect which then cheered the country as to its accruing revenue, the Army was reduced to ten thousand men. The nation could not, or would not retain in service a larger number. The revenue was deemed inadequate to the maintenance of a greater force, and the discharge of the other necessary expenditures of the nation.

The question now to be settled is, whether this Army shall be further reduced to six thousand men? It is a question as to the maximum of military force which this nation ought to maintain in time of peace. In deciding it there is an obvious propriety, not to say necessity, of adverting to the state of the finances of the country; it being an axiom in this Government, which I hope never to see controverted, that our permanent expenditures are not to exceed our permanent revenue. The examination which I have been able to give this subject, has resulted in the settled conclusion that neither the present condition of this country, nor that which may be reasonably anticipated, for years to come, will be found adequate to the maintenance of our present Military Establishment, and the discharge of the other authorized and necessary expenses of the nation. This being granted, will any gentleman venture to pronounce the proposed reduction of our military force inexpedient?

What, then, sir, is the amount of the revenue which may be expected to accrue during the year 1821, and what will be the condition of the Treasury at the termination of the current year, if all the present objects of expenditure be continued? I choose to confine this examination to the revenue which may be expected to accrue during the present year, believing that it will afford a fair sample of that which may accrue in subsequent years.

In drawing the attention of the House to this interesting, and, I may add, intricate and difficult subject, I do not propose to examine the various calculations which honorable members have already submitted to your consideration, no two of which produce the same result; all admitting, however, that, at the close of the year 1821, the balance against the Treasury will amount to several millions. Indeed, no gentleman seems disposed to pronounce, with much confidence, what is now the situation of the Treasury, much less what it will be at the close of the current year.

Laying aside all the calculations of honorable gentlemen in relation to this subject, I resort for information to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting the state of the finances. This is the official statement on which alone this House will venture to act. I shall, therefore, discard all the ingenious, and probably fallacious calculations of gentlemen, and consider the expenditures of the current year as correctly exhibited in the official document to which I have referred, taking the balance which will be against the Treasury on the 1st January, 1822, as estimated in the supplementary report from that department, as accurately stated upon the hypothesis, that the receipts into the Treasury will equal the estimate by that department. In that report we are informed that the estimated balance against the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1822, will be $5,158,483. But if from this sum there be deducted $500,000 of the sum heretofore appropriated for the gradual increase of the Navy, which sum will not be wanted during the year 1821, the actual balance against the Treasury on that day will be $4,658,483. With respect to this there can be no doubt; the report distinctly so states. But it will not be forgotten that this balance will depend entirely upon the actual receipts into the Treasury during the present year, and must, of necessity, fluctuate with those receipts.

The official report from the Treasury estimates the receipts into the Treasury for the year 1821, at - - - - - $16,550,000

customs - - - - -	$14,000,000
Public lands, exclusive of Mississippi stock - - - - -	1,600,000
Arrears of internal duties and direct tax, and incidental receipts - -	100,000
Third instalment from the Bank of the United States - - -	500,000
And from bank dividends, which may accrue during the year, estimated at five per cent. - -	350,000

Making the aggregate of - $16,550,000

Now, sir, it is obvious, that, if the receipts shall fall short of this estimate, the estimated balance against the Treasury will be proportionably increased. Although that diminution may not be felt to its full extent in the current year, yet it will materially affect the revenue which may become available in the two first quarters of the year 1822. Hence the importance of inquiring what amount of revenue may be expected to arise from customs during the present year? For the sake of brevity, I confine this inquiry to a single year. The subject is liable to so many contingencies, that no one will hazard a precise calculation upon it. But from the reflection which I have been able to bestow on this subject, I have formed the conclusion that the official estimate is much too high.

What, sir, is the situation of your commerce, from which this part of your revenue is to accrue? The prospect is appalling, but you must look at it. With the West India islands, that trade which in former times was so lucrative to the merchants engaged in it, and contributed so largely to the revenue, is very greatly diminished. The reduced price of the produce of this country in those islands, and the high duties on the return cargo, combined with the existing regulations, or rather restrictions, of a portion of that trade, forbid the hope that the revenue arising from this source during the current year, will equal that of former years of peace.

The importations from the East Indies, it is believed, will decline. Already the coarse cottons of India, which have contributed largely to the revenue in former times, have given place to the manufactures of our own country, under the influence of our existing tariff; and it may be reasonably apprehended that our trade to that quarter of the world will be still further diminished by causes which I will not detain the House to detail.

If we turn our attention to the other side of the Atlantic, we shall discern nothing to justify the opinion that our commerce has there experienced its greatest depression. With France, our trade is suspended, I had almost said annihilated, by the countervailing system to which each nation has deemed it proper to resort. The tonnage duty surcharged upon American vessels arriving in French ports, by the ordinance of July last, has instantly effected that which the commercial regulations of France have for years tended gradually to produce, the entire exclusion of American vessels from French ports.

The discriminating duty imposed by the act of the last session of Congress, on French vessels arriving in the ports of the United States, equal to the charges then collected from American vessels in French ports, with the declared intention to procure that just reciprocity in the commercial regulations of the two countries, which the United States offer to all nations, and desire to make the basis of their commercial intercourse, has diverted French ships from our ports. We have been officially informed by the Secretary of the Treasury, that already several French vessels are hovering upon our Southern border, with large cargoes, for no other conceivable purpose but to smuggle those cargoes into the United States. We have it from the same authority, that more are expected shortly to arrive in the same quarter. The design is apparent. It will probably be defeated by the vigilance of the Treasury Department; but it is most evident that the revenue which will accrue during the present year, from French commerce, must be very inconsiderable.

With Great Britain and the continental nations of the north of Europe our trade is still open, and placed upon a fair and reciprocal basis. But it is much circumscribed by the present condition of those Powers. At peace with each other, and with us, it is evidently not only the interest but the determination of those Powers to resuscitate their own commerce, and to direct it in the natural channel, in which it flowed previous to its diversion to our shores, which commenced in 1790, and continued with partial interruptions to 1812. During that period we enjoyed the carrying trade, so immensely profitable to us, and under the influence of which this country increased in wealth and population, with a rapidity unprecedented. But the causes which made us the carriers of Europe have ceased, and with them has ceased this source of profit.

But it has been said that, notwithstanding we have lost the carrying trade, we shall continue to import for our own consumption the manufactures and produce of other countries, and thus the revenue will be sustained. Sir, be not deceived. This expectation will not be realized. This country will not import foreign goods to an extent equal to former years. Our exports will not enable us to do it. The value of our exports having been diminished by the production of the same articles in other countries, it seems to me a necessary, an inevitable consequence, that our imports will be equally diminished. That our imports will be restrained by our exports is clear, unless the people of this country shall become so infatuated as to consent to contract a debt to foreign nations for articles which may be produced by their own industry. While the enormous debt which was contracted by the excessive importations of former years is still unpaid and producing widespread embarrassment, it is to be hoped that even common prudence will restrain us from enlarging that debt. Should the individual embarrassments, to which our extravagance, as a people, has subjected us, result in the successful cultivation of our own resources, our condition may be ameliorated. But, to continue our imports by contracting new debts abroad, or at our own banks, would be madness. And, sir, I must confess I am not much dissatisfied to find that we have not the firmness to resist the progress of extravagance in this country. The time is not far distant when stern necessity will bring us back to the simplicity of former days, and compel us to rely upon our own energies.

But, sir, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) who sits near me, and with whom I usually take pleasure in acting, has told us that the two last have been "bad years," and that "we may hope for better times." But that gentleman has failed to show us any ground to justify this hope. He tells us that commerce is indeed depressed; that it languishes; that our exports are diminished; but that we may expect a "reaction." Trust not, sir, to a reaction. Under given circumstances, it is true, action and reaction are equal; but let it be remembered that where there is no resistance there will be no reaction. Your commerce has gradually declined since the general peace in Europe; and what is there, I ask, to prevent its further depression? Will "reaction" give you the carrying trade, which has afforded a clear profit of 30,000,000 annually? Will it bring your productions into competition with those of the same character in the countries where they are raised with less expense? Will it prevent the efforts of foreign nations to supply their own wants from their own resources?

I come then to the conclusion that the revenue which will accrue from the customs, during the year 1821, will not equal the estimate of the Treasury. And, sir, in my judgment there is no good reason to expect that it will exceed $13,000,000.

Besides we have been informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that of the bonds outstanding, on the 30th of September, 1820, $3,130,000 are in suit; of which about $1,250,000, will not be collected on account of the insolvency of the debtors. Now what guarantee have we, that from the same cause an equal amount will not be lost during the current year? Is it not now as difficult for the collectors of the customs to ascertain the solvency of those who may be entitled to a credit for duties, as it was during the year ending on the 30th of September last? If then the losses "on account of the insolvency of the debtors," during the current year, be estimated at only one-half of that of the last year, a further deduction of $625,000, must be made from this portion of our revenue; giving an unavailable amount of $12,375,000.

The revenue which is estimated to arise from the "public land exclusive of Mississippi stock," which, in the report heretofore referred to, is stated at $1,600,000 next presents itself for our consideration. This sum it is expected will be received from persons who are now indebted for lands heretofore purchased; and from the sales to be made under the law of Congress passed at the last session, providing "that credit shall not be allowed, for the purchase money on the sale of any of the public lands." On this subject my information is limited, not being particularly acquainted with that section of the Union from which this portion of the revenue is to be drawn; but certain facts have been communicated to this House which seem to justify the conclusion that the available amount of receipts from this source will fall considerably below that at which they have been estimated. Although the amount due for the public land is enormous, exceeding $20,000,000, yet the debtors tell you they cannot pay it. Your table has been loaded with memorials, not only from individuals, but from the Legislatures of several States, praying that further time may be allowed for the payment of the loan. If, sir, the people of the West cannot pay the debt already contracted for the public lands, can it be supposed that any considerable quantity will be sold for cash? Unless some measures shall be adopted to relieve those who are indebted for public lands, there is, in my apprehension, no good reason to believe that the receipts into the Treasury from this source during the year 1821, will exceed $1,000,000.

If then it be admitted that "the bank dividends which may accrue during the year" will amount to the sum of $350,000, which is by no means certain, it may be estimated that the revenue accruing in the year 1821 will not exceed $14,325,000. If this calculation be correct, and no diminution of the public expenditures take place, the balance against the Treasury, on the 1st day of January, 1822, will exceed that which has been estimated at the Treasury, and will probably not be much less than $7,000,000.

Now, sir, I readily admit that this calculation depends upon contingent events, the effect of which it is impossible to determine, and which may occasion a very great fluctuation in our receipts. But we are made officially certain, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that provision must "be made for raising the sum of $7,000,000, in aid of the funds which it is estimated will be received into the Treasury during the year 1821."

With this appalling financial prospect before us, I anxiously ask, what is to be done? And I trust the people of this country will, with not less anxiety, respond the inquiry.

Sir, you must either boldly meet the crisis and supply this deficiency, which, for aught I can see, must be as great in future years, by resorting to a permanent system of internal and direct taxation, or to perpetual loans; or, by a judicious and thorough retrenchment, you must bring your expenditures within your income.

Will you, I ask, impose a land tax, in time of profound peace?

Should you, the people cannot pay it. The produce of the farmer is depressed to a price unexampled since the formation of this Government. The distress of the country is universal. If I have been correctly informed—and I have my information from sources entitled to the highest credit—there are farmers in this country, who have heretofore lived in affluence, that cannot command ten dollars in cash, while many of them are deeply in debt, and are compelled to witness the sacrifice of the earnings of "better times," to satisfy debts which they have contracted at the banks in those times. This, I admit, is an unpleasant picture, but it is no fiction. I wish it were.

But, sir, you will not impose internal taxes. The voice of the nation is opposed to this course, and you must and will listen to it.

Will you, then, resort to loans! Sir, I hope the long exploded doctrine, that "a national debt is a national blessing," is not now to be revived. I, for one, cannot consent to transmit that inheritance which was achieved by the wisdom and valor of our predecessors to posterity encumbered with the expense of our improvidence. I have hoped to see the day when this nation shall, by a steady and persevering course of economy, and a rigid application of its means to useful ends, present the solitary and cheering spectacle of a nation free of debt. Although the public debt is now $20,000,000 more than it was when the operations of this Government commenced, I will not yet relinquish this hope.

But, should Congress now resort to loans in preference to relieving the Treasury by a general retrenchment of our expenditures, I should indeed despair.

It is said that a loan may be taken on terms favorable to the Government. I admit it. There is no difficulty in procuring the money. You need but authorize a loan, and foreign capital will fill it. The rate of interest which is here given will draw capital from abroad. But, be it remembered, that, by the use of a foreign capital, the nation becomes in a measure tributary to foreigners.

The principal must ultimately be refunded, and the interest paid quarterly. Already, sir, as we have been told by an official report from the Treasury, above $25,000,000 of our national debt is due to foreigners, the annual interest of which, at six per cent., is one million five hundred thousand dollars. Shall we, sir, increase this monstrous tribute by additional loans? If you value your independence, your liberty; nay, your existence as a nation, I warn you to abstain. Profit by the examples of other nations who are sinking under the weight of their augmented debts. Practise upon the maxim, that money is power; pay your national debt; and with a full Treasury, you will be prepared for any emergency.

There is then, sir, but one course left, and that is, to adopt a judicious and prudent, but thorough system of retrenchment. This nation must pursue that course which every wise and considerate man, who had maintained a splendid establishment, would adopt on finding his income diminished, to which many individuals in this nation have already given their practical sanction; it must reduce those establishments which are not absolutely necessary. Sir, would a wise and prudent individual, who had been accustomed to a coach and four, on finding his income inadequate to his expenditures, borrow money to meet those expenditures? No, sir, he would take off a pair, and then another, and dispose of his coach, and take a gig, and even travel on horseback, if necessary, in order to conform his establishment to his income. He would put an end to every expenditure which should not be indispensably necessary, notwithstanding it might contribute to his convenience. Splendor would be laid aside, and plain simplicity take its place. The legitimate and necessary effect of a contrary course would be individual ruin. And can a nation, pursuing that course which would ruin an individual, expect to escape national destruction?

In my judgment nothing but a thorough and persevering system of economy and retrenchment will preserve the useful institutions of this nation. Unless some of our superfluous establishments be curtailed, and the Treasury thereby relieved, there is great danger that we may be ultimately compelled to prostrate those which are of vital importance, and that here a "reaction" will produce an unfortunate effect. But it has been asked, where will you begin this work of retrenchment? By the bill on your table our attention is directly drawn to the Army. This bill proposes to reduce your Army from ten to six thousand men, retaining the number of officers requisite to command that force. And can gentlemen point me to a more fit object of retrenchment in time of peace? It has indeed been urged, that this force will not be adequate to meet the emergency of an unexpected war. This I will not deny, if we are to rely solely upon an army to repel invasion; nor would 50,000 men be adequate to that object, unaided by any other force. But I do deny that it is, or ever has been, the policy of this nation to maintain a large standing army in time of peace.

The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress the power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia." For what purpose? "To repel invasions." Sir, the militia are the Constitutional defence of this country in time of peace, and in the onset of war, until regulars can be raised. In the language of the first President of the United States, they are "the army of the Constitution." The framers of that instrument, deeply impressed as they were with a sense of the manifold evils arising from a large standing army, manifestly intended that the militia should be looked to as the legitimate and principal defence of this nation upon the land.

This great principle of our Government, as to national defence, has received the repeated sanction of Washington. In his speech delivered to Congress at the opening of the session in December, 1793, after adverting to the necessity of procuring supplies of arms and military stores, leaving nothing to the uncertainty of procuring a warlike apparatus in the moment of public danger, he says, with a force peculiar to himself, "Nor can such arrangements, with such objects, be exposed to the censure or jealousy of the warmest friends of republican government.— They are incapable of abuse in the hands of the militia, who ought to possess a pride in being the depository of the force of the Republic, and may be trained to a degree of energy equal to every military exigency of the United States." This, let it be remembered, is the language of the founder of American liberty and independence. Sir, when I have such authority for my opinions, I pronounce them, fearless of contradiction. I rest upon a basis which is not easily shaken.

Shall I hereafter be told that the militia are not to be relied upon to defend the country? Sir, who are the militia against whom so much has been said, and who have been pronounced so inefficient? They are the freemen of this country with arms in their hands; they are a band of citizen soldiers, 800,000 strong. And will not they defend the country which contains all they hold dear? Will they "refuse" to defend their firesides, their wives, their children, and the Government of their choice? Sir, they will present a front of steel to an invading foe; a protection, in my judgment, much to be preferred to the "iron front" of a standing army, so highly appreciated by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. A. SMYTH.)

foreign Power, on its maritime frontier, and on the Lakes which divide the United States from the British possessions bordering on those Lakes. Will it be pretended that an Army such as that which we now have is, or that one vastly larger will be, adequate to the defence of our immensely extended frontier?

Sir, the natural, the cheapest, and the most effectual defence of the maritime frontier of this country, as well that bordering upon the Atlantic ocean, as the Lakes, is the Navy. Experience has fully demonstrated the truth of this proposition. With a few ships-of-the-line, and a proper proportion of frigates, moving, as they can so easily do, as the position of an invading enemy may be changed, and combining the aid of the militia of that portion of the country immediately threatened with an invasion, an attack may, at all times, be successfully repelled. The character acquired by the Navy of this country, during the late war, is a safe pledge of what may be expected from it on any future emergency. The results of the battles of Erie and Champlain decisively determine its utility on those inland seas. With a knowledge of these results, no one, it is presumed, will doubt the expediency of employing this species of force for the protection of that frontier. Let, then, the wealth of the nation be directed to the augmentation of its naval force to an extent which will afford that protection which is, or ought to be, the object of all military preparations.

I admit that a limited military force upon the land may be usefully employed, in time of peace, in overawing the Indian tribes upon our inland frontier, in the performance of garrison duty, and in protecting and taking care of the public stores and arms; but for all these purposes, in my apprehension, the force to be retained by the present bill is entirely incompetent. It will constitute the nucleus of an army, to which at any time, a force may be added, to meet the exigencies of war.

But, sir, the present situation of the world, and of our foreign relations, does not justify the expectation that we shall be involved in war for a long period to come. The nations of Europe are reposing in the arms of peace, and although certain movements are there taking place, of deep import to themselves, yet there is no reason to apprehend that this nation will be materially affected by them.

If we may place reliance upon the accounts from Spain, the long protracted diplomatic war, in which we have been engaged with the Spanish Government, has been amicably and satisfactorily terminated. There is no danger that it will be followed by a war of bayonets.

From France we have nothing to apprehend. With that Power we are not likely to come in collision. The commercial dispute which has unhappily arisen between the two countries, in consequence of what may be deemed their municipal regulations, has, it is true, occasioned a suspension of a direct commercial intercourse, to the mutual injury of both; but there is good reason to believe that this matter is susceptible of such friendly explanations as will restore the good understanding which has heretofore existed between the two countries.

But the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CUTHBERT) admonished the House that Russia might assail us, she having evinced a disposition to occupy the mouth of the Columbia river, and that we may find it necessary to resist such an unwarrantable encroachment upon our territory by an armed force. Sir, the gentleman may dismiss his fears. Russia has in view objects of greater magnitude. Her attention is directed to another quarter. The occupation of the unsettled territory at the mouth of the Columbia river comes not within the scope of her policy. She looks with a far more longing eye to the Dardanelles. Besides, Russia has uniformly manifested the most friendly disposition towards the United States, and it is evidently for the mutual interest of the two countries to cultivate that good understanding which has so long subsisted between them.

With England your relations appear to be permanently peaceful. England will cautiously avoid a war with the United States. She has too recently and too severely felt the effects of such a war. You have taught her a lesson which she will not soon forget. The lapse of half a century will not obliterate from her recollection the demonstrations of your force, which she was made to feel during your late contest, so eventful in its progress, and in its termination so honorable to this nation. She may indulge a jealousy of the rising power of this nation, but, profiting by experience, she will not strengthen that power by calling it into action.

If, then, sir, no speck of war be discernible in all your political horizon, will gentlemen contend that the safety of the country demands a standing army of ten thousand men? If such an army be now necessary, will the time, can it, ever arrive when it will be less so? Should Congress now decide to reject the bill under consideration and to retain the army as at present organized, it may be considered as finally settled that this country will maintain a standing army of ten thousand men as a permanent peace establishment.

Sir, it is my fixed opinion that the ordinary revenue of the United States will not enable them to maintain such an army, with their other establishments; that the safety of the country does not demand it, and that the proposed reduction of the army is consistent with sound policy.

Sir, I will detain the House a single moment to notice an observation which has been reiterated here, and perhaps elsewhere, that those who support the bill under consideration, are opposing "the whole course and spirit of the present Administration." Sir, this assertion, so far as it respects me, is unwarrantable. The Administration possesses my confidence and that of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. On this point the late election speaks a language which cannot be misunderstood, and to the force of which I cannot add.

It has, too, been often repeated, and I deem it my duty to reply to the remark, that the bill before the House is in hostility to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Department of War, and that its adoption may be considered disrespectful to that valuable officer. Sir, I repel the charge, and I improve this occasion to say, that I entertain the highest respect for the distinguished gentleman who presides over the War Department. The energy and rigid economy of the system which he has introduced into that Department has greatly diminished the expense of supporting the army. The able manner in which he has discharged the arduous and responsible duties of his station, entitle him to the confidence of this nation.

But great as is my respect for that gentleman, I will not consent to make even his opinions the rule of my own conduct. I act here upon my own responsibility, and shall be directed by the dictates of my own judgment. Being convinced that the passage of the bill now before the House will advance the best interests of the nation, I shall give to it my cordial support.

When Mr. T. had concluded—

Mr. BURTON, of North Carolina, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: In rising to address you, I disclaim all intention to throw censure upon any person connected with the Executive branch of the Government; motives of that kind shall never influence my conduct, while I have the honor to occupy a seat on this floor. Indeed, I should not trouble the House at all upon the subject but for the circumstance that I belong to the committee that reported this bill. This committee has frequently been called upon for explanations; and, as one of its members, I feel it my duty briefly to state some of the reasons that influence my vote upon the question.

I shall not attempt to follow the gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, through all their various statements and calculations, particularly on the subject of the Treasurer's report. I am not sufficiently skilled in the finances of the country to throw much light on the subject; for even those gentlemen who have, for years, turned their attention that way, are far from agreeing in their results. It is enough for my purpose to know that the Treasury is empty; that we must either lay taxes, borrow money, or curtail our expenditures. As to the first, for many reasons, which it is not necessary now to examine, the people at this time are not in a situation to pay taxes. As to the second, it is believed, by many judicious persons, that the borrowing of money is only postponing the evil which in the end will come; and that it will lay the foundation of a large public debt which may ultimately prove extremely oppressive to the citizens of this country.

The third alternative—retrenchment—appears to meet the approbation of a large majority of this House; but, sir, when we come to point out the particular items, what is the result? If you attempt to reduce our own pay, we are met at the threshold, and told that members of Congress are worse paid than any other persons in the Government. If you look to the heads of departments and their numerous clerks, why, it is with the greatest difficulty, and most rigid economy, that they can support themselves and families with their present salaries. As to the pension list, gratitude and justice forbid that we should take from the old soldier his miserable pittance. As to the Navy, the pride of our country, and which has heaped upon us imperishable fame, touch but a plank and we shall become the prey of some foreign Power; and, sir, to continue the catalogue, when we come to the Army, and are about to dismiss so much of it as we can do without, we are accused of prostrating essential establishments, and are told that, when we get to war, some fifteen or twenty years hence, perhaps with the inhabitants of the moon, that we cannot again expect to obtain the services of these men. So that, after going the rounds, we find ourselves precisely where we started; and we shall not even have it in our power, on returning home, to say to our constituents, as was pleasantly remarked by an honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) at the last session—we have saved two hundred dollars of the public money, after spending thousands in debate.

The rules that apply to the conduct of an individual, are certainly, in some measure, applicable to Governments; and, to borrow a comparison used by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON,) it is very easy for a man, after riding on horseback, or in a gig, to persuade himself that a carriage would be more comfortable; and, next, that four horses would make it run much easier; immediately the two foremost horses become an indispensable part of the establishment. In this manner, sir, individuals and Governments go on adding ad infinitum to their establishments, believing that every part is essential. Sir, if there is any thing proven by history it is this, that Governments, as well as individuals, may commit errors; and, whenever convinced of that fact, to retrace their steps is, to my mind, the highest evidence of wisdom and magnanimity—to persist in error, from the fear of being charged with vacillating in their conduct, and changeable in their plans, is the reverse.

To attempt to prove that standing armies are dangerous to liberty, in time of peace, would be as unnecessary as to attempt to prove that the sun has done shining; but, I do not believe that any danger is to be apprehended from the present number of our Army, nor even were it much larger than it is; and this is an argument, to my mind, in favor of reducing the Army. If fifty thousand men, connected with the community by all the ties of relationship, can produce no impression upon it, is it not fair to presume that these people can defend themselves against any foe that might be sent against them from abroad? Was not this fully exemplified in our Revolutionary war? Great Britain sent her armies here, chose her own points of attack; we were then in our infancy, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages on her side, we established our independence. Does not this show that it is the moral sense of the people on which we must rely for defence? and that any army, larger than what is necessary to take care of our public property is totally useless, unless employed in foreign conquest? and I do not believe that there is an individual in this House, or in the nation, that would vote a single dollar for purposes of that kind. Further to illustrate my idea, let us recur to the history of France. Republican France was able to withstand the Powers of Europe, because the people were defending what they believed to be their rights. A few years after, when France had added greatly to her territory, and her military fame had reached its highest point—when her armies were commanded by as able generals as the world ever produced—when every citizen was a well trained soldier, and even her drill sergeants were capable of commanding armies—we see her Emperor dethroned and sent into banishment, and another individual, who, to say the least, did not meet with the approbation of the nation, seated on the throne.

Are we certain that it is the true policy of this Government to encourage this military spirit to any great extent? Even now, we find that it is with much difficulty that we restrain our citizens from overrunning the territory of our neighbors. Notwithstanding that we have express laws, prohibiting our citizens from taking up arms against any nation with whom we are at peace, yet we have seen Toledo, Robinson, and others, assemble troops and march them into the Spanish provinces; and at this very time, a General Long, with his adventurers, are in Texas, in despite of all law.

If, sir, we turn to the history of England, we will find, that the standing army of that country had but a small beginning, and that after each successive war, some speck of another war was discovered in the horizon, or some other phantom of the brain was conjured up, by which a considerable addition was made to the Peace Establishment; it went on, like a ball of snow, accumulating at each revolution, until at length it has become so ponderous as now literally it threatens to crush to death the honest yeomanry of the country.

The whelp of the tigress is an inoffensive animal; but, as it grows in size and strength, it becomes mischievous and dangerous. Should we keep up our present Army, may it not, a few years hence, be found that active employment is the best way to improve in the military science? And, may this not prove a temptation to foreign conquest? To use a plain comparison, would any farmer of common sense ever think, of giving a considerable part of his income to a set of idle fellows to watch his grounds, lest, peradventure, some twenty years hence, rogues might break in and plunder his property? Surely not. Such a man would meet with derision. But, we are told, we must keep up the present Army to preserve military science, for, if we dismiss those now in service, they will not again return, should they be wanted. Sir, for the same reason, we should always keep in their places all civil officers; for I believe the science of Government is as important and as difficult to learn as the art of war. Yet, we see when one civil officer is turned out, there is no want of a successor. Even for a seat in this House, where the term is only two years, there is no scarcity of candidates; and, in the Senate, I have never heard any complaint on that score. As for the office of Chief Magistrate, which is only four years, I believe we are likely to have a plentiful crop of candidates at the next election.

So far as my observation goes, the good people of this country are at no loss for characters to fill any appointment, and, should we be so unfortunate as not to obtain the services of these gentlemen when required, I hope there will be no difficulty in supplying their places. Sir, the two most distinguished generals in the late war, (Generals Brown and Jackson,) were not educated in the standing army. A letter, written some years ago, by the present Chief Magistrate, was published in the papers a few days ago. This letter recommends fixing the Peace Establishment at twenty thousand men, but Congress at that time held a different opinion, and fixed it at ten thousand. I think that too large for our present finances. To do justice to the writer of that letter, we should advert to the circumstances under which it was written—the unsettled state of Europe, and the probability that she might soon again be involved in war.

Mr. Chairman, I took my seat on this floor with the strongest predilection and attachment to the Army. I had not the pleasure of a particular acquaintance with many of the officers, but for the few that were known to me, I entertained the highest regard. I viewed the Army as a band of brave and patriotic men, devoted to the service of their country; who, in the hour of her danger, had overlooked all personal considerations, and manfully came forward in her defence. Under such feelings I could deny the soldier nothing, and I hope, from the vote I am about to give, that it will not be considered that I have lost any of my respect for the distinguished individuals that compose our Army. But, from my short experience in this House, I have discovered that personal feelings and wishes are very unsafe guides when legislating for the nation. It is a maxim as old as our system of jurisprudence, that individual convenience must give way to the public good; and, however much I may regret the hard fate of those who may lose their offices by this bill, yet no feelings of this kind can have the smallest influence on my mind in determining this question. I believe that the best interest of the country, at this time, calls for a reduction of the Army, and for that reason alone I shall vote for the passage of the bill.

Mr. Brown then moved to amend the original third section, by striking out that portion of it which, as previously amended, reads thus: "one Brigadier General, with one Aid-de-Camp, one Inspector General, one Assistant Adjutant General," and in lieu thereof to insert "three Brigadier Generals, with one Aid-de-Camp, one Assistant Adjutant General, and one Assistant Inspector General;" which, upon the request of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, Mr. Brown modified to read as follows: "three Brigadier Generals, one of 'whom shall reside at Washington, and perform the duties heretofore confided to the Adjutant and Inspector General, together with the duties of Inspector General of the army, with one Aide-de-Camp; one Assistant Adjutant General, and one Assistant Inspector General to each.'

Mr. BROWN said he had waited to this late period with an expectation and hope that some other person would have proposed the amendment which he should offer; none having done so, he felt it his duty to submit it, although he could not flatter himself from the temper of the House that it would succeed. He said that an honorable gentleman, Mr. COCKE, of Tennessee, with whom he had acted on the principal provision of this bill, had suggested the necessity of discipline among its friends; for one he should protest against discipline in civil, for the same reason that he should applaud it in military service; by doing so, the object sought was most likely to be attained. He hoped that gentlemen who took upon themselves the labor of argument would not suppose that those who chose to be silent, surrendered the right to reflect and decide upon measures; and that they were ready to obey rules of discipline. Should such an impression prevail, the number of speakers would greatly increase, and, he could say, much to the detriment of the public service.

Mr. B. said he was favorable to the reduction of the army to the number proposed by the bill, of six thousand, because he believed that number sufficient for all the legitimate duties of soldiers in this country, in a time of such profound peace, and not because he believed the Government unable to support them. He would not use an argument here, predicated upon a fact, at the bare suggestion of which an American in passing through Europe would feel himself highly insulted: I mean the incapacity of the American nation to support such establishments and officers, as were deemed necessary for their prosperity and safety; he would not permit himself to be driven into argument to support a proposition so plain as was the negative of this. He should predicate his legislation on this and other measures of the Government, on the ample capacity of his country to support all necessary establishments and officers. Mr. B. said that he thought too much stress had been laid on the deranged state of our finances; for one he thought their distressed condition should induce the Government to pursue the course of a prudent individual; to look into her expenditures, and to curtail wherever it was not incompatible with her safety and prosperity; and if there required it, he would be willing to increase the army beyond its present size; he feared not the resources of the country.

Mr. B. desired that gentlemen, in reply, having maps before them on which our line of posts and extent of frontier were exhibited, would point out the places and posts at which a greater force could be beneficially used, and not confine themselves to the proof of our capacity to pay them. He yielded them that ground. He said, that, although friendly to a reduction of the army to six thousand men, he was in favor of a liberal and efficient organization, and had voted for many of the amendments proposed. From a belief that three general officers, instead of one, would produce a higher state of subordination and discipline, a surer protection of the fortifications and public property, and this number being also indicated by the geographical situation of the United States, and the rank and file of the army, he would beg leave to offer the proposed amendment.

The amendment was then rejected without a division.

Mr. LOWNDES then took the floor against the bill generally, but spoke more particularly on the considerations growing out of the condition of the finances of the country. He spoke at considerable length.

Mr. BARBOUR then signified a wish to make some remarks on this bill, but would not press them if the House desired to take the question this afternoon; when, a motion to adjourn was made; and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 22.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill to continue in force an act, entitled "An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war," and for other purposes; which was read twice, amended, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time tomorrow.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the Territory of Arkansas; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from WILLARD HALL, containing a notification of his having resigned his seat in this House, as one of the Representatives from the State of Delaware.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Governor and Council of the State of Maryland, accompanied with two copies of the Laws of Maryland, lately compiled by Chancellor Kilty, and Messrs. Harris and Watkins, presented by the General Assembly of that State to the Congress of the United States.

TREASURY REPORT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following report:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 19, 1821.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the fourth instant, instructing the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the House "a statement of the money in the Treasury on the first of January, 1821, together with a statement of the money in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent for the War and Navy Departments, on that day," I have the honor to state, that there was in the Treasury on that day the sum of $1,076,261 18, and in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent for the War and Navy Departments, the sum of $1,050,378 25, viz: For the War Department, $151,373 29, and for the Navy Department, $799,004 96.

Reduction of the Army.

JANUARY, 1821.

Of the sum of $1,076,271 18, in the Treasury on the first of January, 1821, $500,000 were paid by the Bank of the United States, on the 30th of December, 1820, but which were payable on the first day of January thereafter, and were estimated in the receipts into the Treasury for 1821. If this sum is deducted, the amount in the Treasury on that day will be $576,271 18. If it is considered a part of the receipts of 1820, the estimated receipts for 1821 will be diminished by that amount. With this explanation, it will not be material whether it is placed to the credit of the one or the other year; the general result of the two years will be the same.

The receipts of the fourth quarter, with the exception of payments made at Mobile and New Orleans, in the two last weeks of December, 1820, and in the whole month at most of the land offices, are ascertained to be $4,045,585 99. In the annual report, the receipts of the fourth quarter were estimated at $3,430,000; the actual receipts, therefore, exceed those that were estimated by $615,585 99, and by $115,585 99, if the payment made by the bank on the 30th of December be deducted from the receipts of 1820.

If the sum of $615,585 99 be added to the sum of $5,417,830 83, which was stated in my letter of the 21st of December, 1820, to be the aggregate means for the fourth quarter of that year, the amount at the disposition of the Treasury, in that quarter, will be augmented to $6,033,416 82.

It is ascertained that the payments from the Treasury, during that quarter, have amounted to $4,957,145 24, which, being deducted from the estimated means of that quarter, will leave in the Treasury, as already stated, on the 1st day of January, 1821, the sum of $1,076,271 18. But if the $500,000, paid by the bank, be deducted from the receipts of 1820, the balance on the 1st day of January, 1821, will be, as has already been stated, $576,271 18.

The demands upon the Treasury during the year 1820, in order to complete the service of that year and to effect the objects for which the several appropriations were made, and which are not included in the foregoing sum of $4,957,145 24, which amounts to $4,707,987 96, viz:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous, (being the difference between the sum of $1,407,213 56, estimated to be paid in the fourth quarter, and the sum actually paid,) - - - - -	$855,905 20
Public debt - - - - -	2,076,918 15
War Department - - - - -	665,164 61
Navy Department - - - - -	1,110,000 00

Which leaves an excess of demand beyond the money in the Treasury of $3,631,716 78, and of $4,131,716 78, if the payment made by the bank be deducted from the payments into the Treasury in the year 1820.

It may be proper to observe, that, if the sum of $2,076,918 15, of the Louisiana stock, has not been pressed for payment, it has been the result of forbearance on the part of the holders of that stock, and of confidence in the faith of the nation, that such forbearance will not operate to their injury. The other demands upon the Treasury, which were estimated as a charge upon it in the fourth quarter of the year 1820, and which are not embraced in the estimates of the expenditure for 1821, and which constitute a part of the deficit above stated, will, it is presumed, be demanded of the Treasury.

It will be perceived that the sums in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent of the War and Navy Departments, exceed the estimate of them, annexed to the estimates of the service of the year 1821. These moneys are drawn from the agent, as the demands upon the respective departments are presented, or requisitions from the disbursing officers of those departments are received. The amount drawn from the agent depends, therefore, upon contingencies over which the heads of those departments have no control, and may exceed or fall short of any estimate made by them for any definite period of time.

It may be proper, also, to state, that, in contemplation of law, money is not considered to be in the Treasury until a warrant is issued by the Secretary and receipted by the Treasurer, for the sums paid by the receiving officers into the bank; but, for the practical purposes of the Treasury, all sums paid into bank to the credit of the Treasurer are considered by him to be in the Treasury. Generally, the warrants covering the money received on account of the Government are issued quarterly for all sums received during the quarter. These warrants are usually issued about two months after the expiration of the quarter, as the payments made into the banks which are the depositories of the public money are not ascertained sooner.

The statements which accompany this letter are explanatory of the views which it presents, or afford information connected with them, which it is presumed may be useful.

I remain, with respect, &c.,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. JOHN TAYLOR,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The report was read, and, with the documents, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce the Military Peace Establishment of the United States.

Mr. McCULLOUGH moved further to amend the third section of the bill (as recited on the Journal of the 18th instant) by expunging from the fifth and sixth lines thereof the words following, viz: "each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry, as heretofore prescribed by law;" and also, from the eighth and ninth lines thereof, the words "with a salary of two thousand dollars per annum;" and also, after the word "purchases" in the tenth line, the following words: "whose compensation shall not exceed two and a half per centum on the public moneys disbursed by him, nor the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum; and also, from the thirteenth and fourteenth lines, the words "to be compensated as heretofore;" also, after the words "surgeon general," in the sixteenth line, the words "with a salary of two thousand dollars per annum;" and also, after the words "apothecary general," in the seventeenth line, the words "with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars per annum;" and to add to the section the following words, viz: "the said several officers to hold the rank, pay, and emoluments which now are, or hereafter may be, prescribed by law."

After considerable debate, in which Messrs. McCULLOUGH, RICH, McLEAN, BURTON, FLOYD, BRUSH, and MERCER, took part, the motion of Mr. McCULLOUGH was negatived, first on the question of inserting, and then on striking out the existing compensations.

Mr. BRUSH then moved to strike out the word "general," after "Quartermaster," so that there should be a Quartermaster without the addition of "general," the rank of general being proposed to be taken from the office.—Negatived.

Mr. EUSTIS moved an amendment, the object of which was to place the deputy commissaries and quartermasters on the footing on which they will be found to stand in the amended bill, instead of that in which they stood in the original bill.

This motion was agreed to 51 to 47.

The question having been then stated on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. MERCER addressed the House, each at great length; the first in favor of the bill, the latter against it.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Baker, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Beecher, Brown, Bryan, Buffum, Burton, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Cannon, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Crawford, Culpeper, Cushman, Dane, Dennison, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Fay, Fisher, Floyd, Foot, Garnett, Gray, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Hostetter, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Livermore, McClay, McCoy, McCreary, McCullough, Mallary, Marchand, Meigs, Metcalf, Monell, Montgomery, R. Moore, T. L. Moore, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Patterson, Philson, Plumer, Randolph, Rankin, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Ross, Russ, Sawyer, Shaw, Silsbee, Sloan, Southard, Stevens, Tarr, Terrell, Tomlinson, Tracy, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Walker, Warfield, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina and Wood—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Baldwin, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brush, Butler of Louisiana, Case, Clark, Cook, Crowell, Outhbert, Darlington, Davidson, Dickinson, Ford, Fuller, Gorham, Hemphill, Jones of Tennessee, Little, Lowndes, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mercer, S. Moore, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parker of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Pinckney, Ringgold, Robertson, Rogers, Sergeant, Simkins, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, A. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Udree, Wallace, Wendover, and Whitman—47.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow, in the following shape, as amended:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, from and after the first day of May next, the Military Peace Establishment of the United States shall consist of six thousand non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, with a due proportion of field and company officers, according to the present organization of companies, and in such por-portions of artillery and infantry as the President of the United States shall direct; and that the corps of engineers, as at present established, be retained in service.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the corps of ordnance shall be retained in service, and shall hereafter consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, six captains, six first lieutenants, six second lieutenants, and six third lieutenants.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States cause to be arranged the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the several corps of troops now in service, in such manner as to form and complete the corps to be retained in service under this act, attaching the corps of light artillery to the corps of artillery, and the corps of riflemen to the infantry, and cause the supernumerary officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, to be discharged from the service.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be one brigadier general, with one aid de camp, one inspector general, and one assistant adjutant general; there shall also be one adjutant general, one quartermaster general, with as many assistant deputy quartermasters as the service may require, to be taken from the subalterns of the line, who shall perform all the duties which may be required of them in the quartermaster's department, and in the department of the commissary general of subsistence, and who shall receive, as a compensation for their services, fifteen dollars per month in addition to their monthly pay; and one judge advocate, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments, of a colonel of cavalry, as heretofore prescribed by law; there shall also be a paymaster general, with a salary as heretofore fixed by law, commissary general of purchases, with a salary of two thousand dollars per annum, and one assistant commissary general of purchases, whose compensation shall not exceed two and a half per centum on the public moneys disbursed by him, nor the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum; and two military storekeepers, to be compensated as heretofore; one commissary general of subsistence, one surgeon general, with a salary of two thousand dollars per annum, and one apothecary general, with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars per annum.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be to each regiment of infantry, and to each battalion of artillery, one adjutant, one quartermaster, and one paymaster, one surgeon, and one assistant surgeon.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the topographical engineers, and their assistants, shall be discharged from the service of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the judge advocate shall keep an office in the city of Washington, and, in addition to the duties which may be assigned to him by the President of the United States, he shall keep a record of all trials by general courts-martial, and report the decisions.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all officers of the army, whose continuance in service is not provided for by this act, shall be discharged from the service of the United States, and that to each commissioned officer, who shall be discharged by virtue of this act, there shall be paid, in addition to the pay and emoluments to which he will be entitled at the time of his discharge, three months' pay.

The above bill having been disposed of—

Mr. RANDOLPH, agreeably to notice, then moved that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the family of Oliver Hazard Perry, and to provide for the education of his children.

To this course, by the rules of the House, an unanimous vote was necessary, it not being in the ordinary routine of the business of the House. The motion was objected to, and therefore failed of course.

Subsequently, however, on motion, the orders of the day preceding that bill were postponed, which gives it priority in the order of business for to-morrow.

TUESDAY, January 23.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Alexander Elmslie and Samuel Clarkson, merchants of Philadelphia; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. Cook submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made in the law, entitled "An act relative to the election of President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President;" and also whether it be expedient to increase the compensation of any of the persons appointed to transmit the votes of the Electors of President and Vice President at the late election.

The said resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STORRS submitted the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration :

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House a statement of the moneys now in the Treasury, or collected at any place, which are applicable to the redemption of the stock created by the act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, passed March 31, 1814.

On motion of Mr. CROWELL, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the State of Alabama all the unsold islands in the Tennessee river, the proceeds of which shall be applied to the improvement of the navigation of said river.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, submitted the following joint resolution :

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the recruiting service for the Army be suspended for and during the present year, and until the end of the next session of Congress.

The said resolution was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to continue in force an act, entitled 'An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war, and for other purposes,'" was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, gave notice that he should, on Thursday next, move to proceed to the consideration of the motion to amend the Constitution of the United States, so as to establish an uniform mode of election of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting two statements of goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in American and foreign vessels; together with an aggregate view of both from the 1st October, 1818, to the 30th September, 1819, rendered in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of 29th May, 1798.

The letter was read, and, with the documents, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following report :

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives instructing them "to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, to secure to mechanics and others payment for their labor and materials, in erecting any house or other building within the District of Columbia, by giving them a lien thereon," have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report: That, under the existing laws of the United States, within the District of Columbia, a security, analogous to that contemplated by the resolution, may be provided by special contract, in every case wherein any house or building is about to be erected, against any loss which any mechanic or merchant, contributing labor or materials towards the erection thereof, might sustain from the failure of the proprietor to pay voluntarily therefor. Whether for this, or any other reason, existing in the institutions or state of society of the District of Columbia, no complaint to Congress, by petition or otherwise, has ever been made by any of the inhabitants of the District, of any defect of their present laws in relation to the object for which the resolution of the House of Representatives suggests a provision. The committee, therefore, recommend to the House of Representatives the adoption of the following resolution :

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to make, by law, the provision suggested by the aforesaid resolution.

The report was read, and agreed to.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

The engrossed bill for the reduction of the Military Peace Establishment, was read a third time.

Mr. SIMKINS rose, and spoke against the passage of the bill, and in reply to the gentlemen who had supported it.

Mr. FLOYD made a few explanatory remarks.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, assigned the reasons why he should vote against this bill, though not opposed to a proper reduction of the Military Establishment.

Mr. HUSTIS replied to Mr. SMITH, and defended the bill in regard to some of its details.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, opposed the bill in toto, in its objects and in its details, as contrary to the public interest.

Mr. RICH briefly assigned the reasons why he should vote for the bill.

Mr. CLAY stated the reasons why he thought the interest of the country called for the passage of the bill.

The question on the passage of the bill was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—109 to 48, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Beecher, Brown, Bryan, Buflum, Burton, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Claggett, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Crawford, Culpeper, Cushman, Dane, Dennison, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Fay, Fisher, Floyd, Foot, Gray, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Hostetter, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Va., Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Livermore, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, McCullough, Mallory, Marchand, Meigs, Metcalf, Monell, Montgomery, R. Moore, T. L. Moore, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Patterson, Philson, Pitcher, Plumer, Randolph, Rankin, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Ross, Russ, Shaw, Silsbee, Sloan, Southard, Stevens, Tarr, Terrell, Tomlinson, Tracy, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Warfield, Williams of Virginia, and Wood—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Baldwin, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brush, Butler of Louisiana, Case, Clark, Cook, Crowell, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Dickinson, Ford, Fuller, Gorham, Hemphill, Jones of Tennessee, Little, Lowndes, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mercer, S. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Udree, Wallace, Wendover, and Whitman—48.

COMMODORE PERRY'S FAMILY.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. FOOT in the chair, on the bill reported at the last session of Congress, for the relief of the family of the late Oliver Hazard Perry, and to provide for the education of his children at the public expense.

The bill having been read through—

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, who declined occupying the time of the House by speaking on the subject, the blanks in the bill were filled, so as to make the proposed allowance to be $330 per annum for the mother of the late Commodore Perry, $400 for his widow, (during life, or until intermarriage,) and $150 for each of the children, until they arrive at twenty-one years of age. The whole amount proposed to be annually appropriated being $1,330, the estimated amount of half the pay which Commodore Perry, whilst living, would have enjoyed whilst on separate command.

Mr. HARDIN moved to strike out all the bill except the enacting clause, and insert, in lieu thereof, a provision, allowing to the family of Commodore Perry half-pay for the term of five years, being, Mr. H. said, the amount which they would have received had Commodore Perry fallen in battle.

On this motion there arose a short debate.

The motion of Mr. HARDIN was negatived, on a division, by apparently a large majority.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill.

The House having concurred in filling the blanks as reported from the Committee—

Mr. HARDIN renewed the motion he had made in Committee of the Whole, and demanded the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays being taken, there were, for the amendment 62, against it 82, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Anderson, Baker, Ball, Barbour, Beecher, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Claggett, Cobb, Culpeper, Cushman, Dennison, Earle, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Fisher, Floyd, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Gray, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hall of New York, Hardin, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hooks, Hostetter, Jackson, Lincoln, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, Marchand, Metcalf, Monell, R. Moore, T. L. Moore, Murray, Newton, Patterson, Philson, Rankin, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sloan, A. Smyth of Virginia, Stevens, Tarr, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Wendover, and Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Buflum, Burton, Butler of Louisiana, Clark, Clay, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Crowell, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Davidson, Dickinson, Eddy, Eustis, Fuller, Gorham, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hackley, Hall of North Carolina, Hemphill, Hill, Hobart, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kinsey, Lathrop, Livermore, Lowndes, McCullough, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mallory, Meigs, Mercer, Montgomery, S. Moore, Morton, Moseley, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Parker of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Pinckney, Plumer, Randolph, Reed, Rhea, Ringgold, Robertson, Sawyer, Sergeant, Shaw, Silsbee, Simkins, Smith of Maryland, Storrs, Terrell, Tomlinson, Tracy, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Udree, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warfield, Whitman, and Williams of Virginia.

So it was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, though decidedly in favor of the object of the bill, objected to that part of it proposing an allowance of $330 per annum, during life, to the mother of the deceased; and, on his motion, that part was stricken out.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved a reconsideration of the allowance of $400 per annum to the widow of Commodore Perry, with a view to make it $730, by adding to it the $330 just stricken out; so that the amount to the family should be the same, though the distribution would be different.

The motion of Mr. R. was negatived, by a vote of 69 to 52.

On the question for ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, the yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. BRUSH, there were, for the bill 76, against it 62, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Clark, Clay, Cocke, Crawford, Crowell, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Davidson, Dickinson, Eddy, Eustis, Forrest, Fuller, Gorham, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hemphill, Hill, Hobart, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kinsey, Lathrop, Lowndes, Maclay, McCullough, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Meigs, Mercer, Montgomery, S. Moore, Moseley, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parker of Mass., Pinckney, Randolph, Reed, Ringgold, Robertson, Russ, Sergeant, Shaw, Silsbee, Simkins, Smith of Maryland, Storrs, Street, Terrell, Tomlinson, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Udree, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warfield, Whitman, and Williams of Virginia, NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Baker, Ball, Barbour, Beecher, Burton, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Clagett, Crafts, Culpeper, Dennison, Earle, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Fisher, Floyd, Foot, Garnett, Gray, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hall of New York, Hardin, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hooks, Hostetter, Jackson, Johnson, Lincoln, Livermore, McCoy, McCreary, Marchand, Metcalf, R. Moore, T. L. Moore, Morton, Murray, Parker of Virginia, Patterson, Philson, Plumer, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Sawyer, Sloan, Stevens, Tarr, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Wendover, and Wood.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. EUSTIS gave notice that he should, on to-morrow, call for the consideration of the resolution submitted by him, proposing the conditional admission of Missouri into the Union.

WEDNESDAY, January 24.

At the usual hour of meeting, but few members being present, when the Speaker took the Chair, Mr. BRUSH moved that there be a call of the House. [The object of a call, as it is technically termed, is to place on the Journal the names of the members present, whence may be inferred the names of the absentees.] After some conversation on this motion, in the course of which it was suggested that the quantity of business before the committees required them to sit sometimes beyond the hour of meeting, and it would be harsh to record them, whilst thus engaged, as absentees, &c. Mr. BRUSH consented to withdraw his motion.

Mr. SAMUEL MOORE, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of James May, of Detroit, accompanied with a bill for the relief of the said James May and the legal representatives of William Macomb; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, respecting the title to the land upon which their seat of government is located, accompanied with a bill confirming the location of the seat of government of the State of Illinois, and for other purposes; which bill was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill supplementary to "An act relating to the ransom of American captives of the late war;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to incorporate the United States Naval Fraternal Association for the relief of the families of deceased officers; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Baltimore.

On motion of Mr. RHEA,

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of suspending, for a limited time, so much of an act, entitled "An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt," passed the 3d of March, 1795; and so much of the act, entitled "An act respecting loan office and final settlement certificates, indents of interest, and the unfunded and registered debt, credited on the books of the Treasury," passed the 12th day of June, 1798, as bars from settlement or allowance, certificates, commonly called loan office and final settlement certificates, and indents of interest.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, and the same being again read, was agreed to.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the district court in the northern district of New York," was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, enclosing an authentic return of the election of DANIEL UDREE, as a Representative of that State in this House, to serve in the room of Joseph Hiester, resigned; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

An engrossed resolution to suspend the recruiting service for a limited time, was read the third time, and passed.

The following bills passed through Committees of the Whole, in succession, viz: The bill for the relief of Jacob Hunsinger; the bill extending the time for issuing and locating land warrants to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war; the bill to regulate the location of land warrants, and the issuing of patents in certain cases; the bill for the relief of James Brady; the bill for the relief of Joseph McNeil; the bill for the relief of Alexander Milne; the bill for the relief of Lewis H. Guerlain; the bill for the relief of John Rodriguez; the bill for the relief of Francis B. Languille; the bill for the relief of Bartholomew Duverge. And the said bills were all ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The engrossed bill for the relief of the family of the late Oliver Hazard Perry, and for the education of his children at the public charge, was read a third time.

Mr. BEECHER moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole, but subsequently varied his motion so far as to move its recommitment to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with a view to incorporate the amendment yesterday proposed by Mr. HARDIN, or, failing in that, to reinstate the allowance of three hundred and thirty dollars to the mother of Commodore Perry, which was yesterday stricken out.

JANUARY, 1821.

Fugitive Slaves—Fine Arts—Missouri.

H. OF R.

After a short debate, the motion for recommitment was negatived.

The bill was then passed, 73 to 63, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

FUGITIVE SLAVES.

Among the papers offered during the presentation of memorials to-day, was the following, presented by Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky:

Whereas it is represented to the present General Assembly that many negroes and persons of color, the property of citizens of this Commonwealth, have escaped from their lawful owners into the province of Canada, and are there protected from recapture by the subjects of His Majesty the King of Great Britain, residing in said province of Canada: And whereas the practice of concealing and countenancing slaves that thus escape from their lawful owners, tends greatly to the injury of the people of this State, and, if persevered in, may lead to unhappy consequences between the subjects of his said Majesty's Government and the citizens of the United States:

Resolved, therefore, That it is the opinion and desire of the present General Assembly, that the Government of the United States invite the attention of the British Government to this subject, and, if practicable, procure arrangements to be made, on the part of that Government, for the restoration of such fugitive slaves as shall have heretofore escaped, or may hereafter escape, from their lawful owners, (being citizens of the United States,) into any of his said Majesty's North American dominions. And the Governor is requested to transmit to the Executive of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, copies of the foregoing resolution.

The SPEAKER stated that, according to the rules of the House, this resolution could not be received, not being "addressed to the House;" though the subject might readily be brought before the House in a different form. Upon which, Mr. B. withdrew the resolution, with the intention of presenting the subject to the House in a different shape.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, to whom was referred the petition of Julia Plantou, of the city of Philadelphia, made the following report, which was ordered to lie on the table:

That the petitioner states that, having from early life an ardent attachment to the art of painting, she was encouraged by the approbation of intelligent gentlemen, on whose judgment she relied, to cultivate her talents for this branch of the fine arts; that, for this purpose, she visited Europe to inspect the works of the great masters of the art, in order to improve her taste and talents, and to render them worthy of the consideration of her enlightened countrymen; that, while there, she spared no pains in her improvement, under the direction of the first artists of the age.

Anxious that her own country should reap the fruits of her improvement, and desirous to commemorate some of its distinguished events, she selected as the most interesting subject of her pencil the concluding scene of the late war, and has, with great labor and assiduity, accomplished an emblematical representation of the Treaty of Ghent, which she now offers to the acceptance of Congress, and prays for such remuneration for her performance as the design and execution may, in their estimation, be worth.

The committee are not insensible of the importance of the fine arts in the scale of social improvement, or of the claim those who cultivate them have upon the public munificence; they derive much pleasure from contemplating the progress of improvements in the United States, and are happy to perceive the cultivation of the arts that contribute to the embellishment of society, as well as such as are essential to its well-being.

It must be admitted that the fine arts not only serve to amuse and please as the evanescent exertions of rare and extraordinary genius, but they elevate the mind, purify the moral feelings, create a relish for pure and refined pleasures, and diffuse a taste for kindred arts and improvements; they serve to commemorate important eras in the history of nations, to preserve the memory of distinguished citizens, and to inspire succeeding ages with an emulation of their virtues; they, in effect, connect the past with the present, and thus invigorate public spirit, keep alive a sense of national honor, and contribute to promote the national glory.

The committee cannot behold without the most pleasing emotions a female fellow-citizen, prompted by the ardor of genius, abandoning all the pleasurable amusements of her sex, and braving the dangers of the ocean in search of the aid and instruction in foreign regions which her native soil did not afford; and would most cheerfully recommend her productions to the patronage of Congress did they conceive it compatible with the powers of Congress to afford it, or consistent with the duty they owe their country.

Such a course is, indeed, not without precedent, but the committee are not able to perceive by what article of the Constitution it can be sustained.

A government without restriction doubtless possesses powers commensurate with every public improvement that can contribute to the welfare or glory of a nation; but the Government of the United States is restricted to the objects enumerated in the Constitution, and the committee cannot discover that the encouragement of the fine arts is among the number.

Independently of this difficulty, the committee conceive that the pressure of the times and the exhausted state of the Treasury imperiously require that the public buildings should be completed before any further appropriation is made for their embellishment.

The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

MISSOURI.

The House then, on motion of Mr. EUSTIS, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, and it is hereby declared, That, the — day of — next ensuing, the State of Missouri shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever: Provided, That so much of the 26th section of the 3d article of the constitution of said State, presented to Congress at the present session, as makes it the duty of the Legislature to pass such laws as shall be necessary "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in this State, under any pretext whatsoever," shall, on or before that day, have been expunged therefrom.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. EUSTIS stated the objects he had in view in moving this resolution to be, to remove the only objection which he had to the admission of Missouri into the Union; to give facility and despatch to the admission of the State into the Union, and thereby to preclude the possibility of this question ever again coming before Congress. These were his only motives, and he had, in moving the resolution, acted without consulting with any one else. Foreseeing a difficulty in prescribing the mode in which the amendment might be made, he had left that a question for separate consideration, in order to obtain a decision on the principle of the resolution. Having introduced the resolution with a sense of duty, should it not meet with the approbation of the House, he should be entirely satisfied with having, in proposing it, performed what he believed to be his duty.

On motion of Mr. EUSTIS the blanks in the resolution were filled with the first of October next.

Mr. FOOT moved to postpone the resolution, in order to take up that from the Senate, under the impression that doing so would facilitate a final decision on the subject.

Mr. LOWNDES suggested that in all probability nothing would be gained by this course, as the same question now before the House might, and probably would be, brought up by a motion to amend the resolve in the Senate.

The motion to postpone was negatived.

No debate arising—

The Chairman put the question to agree to the resolution, and it was negatived by a large majority.

The Committee then rose and reported their decision to the House.

The SPEAKER put the question on agreeing to the amendments made in Committee, (by filling the blanks in the resolution.)

It being objected that the report of the Committee had been to reject the resolution—

The SPEAKER decided that no committee, whether select or of the Whole House, has the power of rejecting any bill or resolution referred to it. Bills and resolutions are referred to committees to be discussed and amended or not, and not to be agreed to or rejected in form, though sometimes virtually rejected by striking out their vital parts.*

* "If it be a paper referred to them, (a committee, whether select or of the whole,) they proceed to put questions of amendment, if proposed, but no final questions on the whole; because all parts of the paper, having been adopted by the House, stand of course, unless altered or struck out by a vote. Even if they are opposed to the whole paper, and think it cannot be made good by amendments, they cannot reject it, but must report it back to the House without amendments, and there make their opposition."

[Jefferson's Manual.]

The decision was objected to by Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. BARNOUR, and Mr. COBB, but justified by Mr. SERGEANT, and in part at least by Mr. LOWNDES. In the end, however, no appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair.

The House having agreed to the amendments made in Committee of the Whole—

The question was then taken, Shall the resolution be engrossed, and read a third time? and determined in the negative—yeas 6, nays 146, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Eustis, Hill, Little, Smith of Maryland, and Stevens.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Beecher, Bloomfield, Boden, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Buffum, Burton, Burwell, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Clagett, Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Crowell, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dickinson, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Fisher, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Gorham, Gray, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hemphill, Hendricks, Hobart, Hooks, Hostetter, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Lowndes, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, McCullough, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Meigs, Metcalf, Montgomery, R. Moore, S. Moore, T. L. Moore, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parker of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Patterson, Philson, Pinckney, Pitcher, Plumer, Randolph, Rankin, Reid, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Ringgold, Robertson, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sawyer, Sergeant, Shaw, Silsbee, Simkins, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of North Carolina, Southard, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Tarr, Terrell, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tracy, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Udree, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Walker, Warfield, Wendover, Whitman, Williams of Virginia, and Wood.

So the resolution was rejected.

After a pause—

Mr. CLAY rose, and gave notice, that, if no other gentleman made any motion on the subject, he should on the day after to-morrow move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take into consideration the resolution from the Senate on the subject of Missouri.

THURSDAY, January 25.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, made a report on the memorial of the General Assembly of Missouri, respecting pre-emption rights, referred to them on the 11th instant; which was read, and the resolution therein submitted was concurred in by the House as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialists ought not to be granted.

the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer certain balances of appropriations to the surplus fund, reported the same with an amendment; which was read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Jacob Hunsinger;" "An act for extending the time of issuing and locating military land warrants to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army;" "An act for the relief of Joseph McNeil;" "An act for the relief of Alexander Milne;" "An act for the relief of Lewis H. Guerlain;" "An act for the relief of John Rodriguez;" "An act to regulate the location of land warrants, and issuing patents in certain cases;" "An act for the relief of Frances B. Languille;" "An act for the relief of James Brady;" and "An act for the relief of Bartholomew Duverge;" were severally read a third time, and passed.

OCCUPATION OF THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. FLOYD, from the committee appointed on the 19th ultimo to inquire into the situation of the settlements on the Pacific Ocean, and into the expediency of occupying the Columbia river, made a detailed report, accompanied with a bill to authorize the occupation of the Columbia river, and to regulate the intercourse with the Indian tribes within the United States and territories thereof; which bill, by leave of the House, was reported, read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the resolution of the 19th of December, 1820, to inquire into the situation of the settlement upon the Pacific ocean, and the expediency of occupying the Columbia river, report: That they have carefully examined the subject referred to them, and, from every consideration which they have been able to bestow upon it, believe, from the usage of all nations, previous and subsequent to the discovery of America, the title of the United States to a very large portion of the coast of the Pacific ocean to be well founded; nor have they been able to ascertain that any other Government than Spain has made claim to any part of it, from Cape Horn to the sixtieth degree of north latitude.

When this continent was first made known to Europe, by the bold and enterprising genius of Christopher Columbus, it seemed for a long time conceded that the Spanish monarchy, which alone could be prevailed upon to listen to his plans and propositions, was most entitled to the benefits resulting from the successful issue of his undertaking. Though Ferdinand and Isabella, who, at that time, filled the throne of that country, did not rest their title upon the tacit consent of other nations, or even upon their armies or fleet, which was, at that period, formidable, and well provided; but, instructed by the example of the Portuguese, who had obtained a grant for all countries east of the Azores, from pole to pole, they obtained a similar grant from the Roman Pontiff of all the territories they wished to occupy west of the same point, as the superstition of the times conferred on him a right of dominion over all the kingdoms of the earth. Thus, in virtue of his power, as the vicar and representative of Jesus Christ, did Alexander VI., in 1493, grant to the Crown of Spain, in full right, all the countries inhabited by infidels, which they had or should discover.

Enormous as the power was, which the Popes then exercised, it was recognised and submitted to by the monarchs of that day, and considered as having vested in Spain a title which they deemed completely valid, and authorized her to extend her discoveries and establish her dominion over a great portion of the new world. The Spanish Crown, as well as individuals, the subjects of that Power, continued to fit out ships for voyages of discovery, and, in the space of a few years, had visited various parts of the coast of America, from the Gulf of Mexico, to many degrees south of the equinoctial line, taking possession, according to the custom of that day, in the name of the Spanish King. Nor was their zeal for discovery confined to the Atlantic shore alone; parties, under daring and enterprising leaders, penetrated far into the interior of the continent, and even to the shores of the Pacific ocean, wresting by violence the rich Empires of Peru and Mexico from the peaceful and legitimate sovereigns who reigned over them, and annexed them to the Crown of Spain, by the triple title of conquest, discovery, and the grant of the Pope.

So well satisfied do the rest of Europe seem to have been of the rights of Spain, derived from such high authority, that they permitted her to progress unmolested in her career of discovery and conquest for many years, until she had acquired the undisputed possession of most of the Atlantic coast of South America, and the whole shore of the Pacific, as high as the northern extremity of California, and, as they affirmed, after they came in possession of Louisiana, to a point far to the northward of that.

Though discoveries were frequently made of countries among the most beautiful and fertile, where nature seemed to invite the industry of man to the enjoyment of luxuriant abundance, yet none seemed to arrest the attention of either Government or people, but those which contained the precious metals; this morbid thirst for gold may be the cause why no settlements were made north of California, as no metal of that description is believed to be found in that region.

About this time it became the interest of the British Crown to think differently on the subject of religion from the See of Rome, and, separating entirely from it, assumed the right of annexing to their Crown all the territories discovered by their subjects, and of bestowing them by charter upon individuals. To this end, grants were issued by Elizabeth in the year 1578 and 1584, the one to Sir Humphrey Gilbert, the other to Sir Walter Raleigh, which were limited to a certain number of leagues, but those issued in 1606, 1608 and 1611, by James I., in the charters for Virginia, were declared to embrace the whole extent of country from thirty-four to forty-five degrees of north latitude, extending from sea to sea, always excepting the territories of any Christian Prince or people.

It is believed that when these charters were granted by the Monarchs of England, they were not well apprized of the extent of country they were giving away, but from their reservations, in regard to the title of Christian Princes or people, they were apprized of the title of Spain upon the western ocean, though not informed of its extent; as it is evident from the words Christian and infidel often occurring, both in the charters of the Monarchs and the bulls of the Pope, the legitimate sovereigns, as well as people of this country, in that day, were considered as possessing no rights. With whatever care they avoided collisions with each other respecting territory which might produce a war with a Power equally skilled in the military art with themselves, they were not scrupulous in dispossessing the natives of both Americas of their country, all of whom were as brave, as generous, and magnanimous as themselves, and some of whom as far advanced in civilization and the arts of peace, though not professing to be Christians, or skilled in war.

The opinion of Europe undergoing another change upon the subject of discoveries in unknown regions, they were now reduced to a more definite and reasonable extent, consequently, in a few years, a third mode of obtaining territory came to be admitted by all as the basis on which they could safely rely for a just decision of their claims, should difficulties present themselves; and one which, to a moderate extent, gave to all nations the benefit of their own labors. By this rule, too, all the territory thus acquired was vested in the State rather than the Crown, which Spanish jurisprudence, under the authority of the Pope, seemed to consider.

Hence, the Power which discovered a country was entitled to the whole extent of soil watered by the springs of the principal river or water course passing through it, provided there was settlement made, or possession taken, with the usual formalities, in the name and on the behalf of the Government to whom the individual owed allegiance. Though the tacit consent of all seemed to yield the sovereignty from sea to sea, where no settlement or express possession was had of an intermediate country; and such right was held good to the whole extent, but not wholly confirmed until another settlement was made at a distinct point upon the same territory beyond the water of the first, or so distant as not manifestly to encroach upon the establishments of the coast; other Powers, though, might avail themselves of the failure of the first to occupy another principal stream, or distant point, and become thereby vested with a full right of sovereignty. This seems to have been the condition of America until the close of the war of 1812; since which time all treaties have yielded to the different Powers, in full right, all they claimed, either by settlement, or from the failure of others to occupy the principal streams when they might do so. There is now no longer territory to be obtained by settlement or discovery; and if there should be any difficulty, it will be where the different limits of the different Powers shall be fixed.

Impressed with a belief, that, under this mode, valuable possessions might be added to the French monarchy, it is presumed Sieurs Joliet and Marquette penetrated the unknown wilderness from Canada, and discovered the Mississippi so long ago as the year 1673, and explored it down to the Arkansas. Perhaps, encouraged by their success, a few years after, Hennepin visited those regions, and pursued that river to its mouth. His representations, with other considerations, two years after, induced M. de la Salle and M. Tonti to descend that river with a considerable force to the Gulf of Mexico, and they are believed to have built the fort during that trip, the bricks and other remains of which are now to be seen on the first high ground on the west side of the Mississippi, below the mouth of the White river.

After this period, in 1685, M. de la Salle, being on his return from France, landed on the west side of the Rio Colorado, in the bay of St. Bernard, and planted a considerable colony there, taking possession, in due and solemn form, in the name of the French King. Such were the discoveries which gave to France the country called Louisiana, from the Rio Grande del Norte, being the next great river to the west of that settlement, along the mountains of Mexico and Spain west, as the western limits, and California as the eastern boundary. That France, and all other nations interested in its boundary, considered it in the same light, is ascertained in various ways, to the conviction of the most incredulous.

In consequence of these settlements and discoveries of the French, Louis XIV. granted, by letters patent, in the year 1712, to Anthony Crozat, the exclusive commerce of that country, and defines its boundary, declaring that it comprehends all lands, coasts, and islands, situated in the Gulf of Mexico, between Carolina on the east, and Old and New Mexico on the west. The French title to these boundaries is further established by the Chevalier de Champigny, who lived in the country, and declares Louisiana to extend to the Rio Grande del Norte, and the mountains of Mexico. This appears to be the opinion of other writers, who, it is presumed, had the most intimate knowledge of the subject, and among them we find that intelligent statesman, the Count de Vergennes, in a work entitled an Historical and Political Memoir of Louisiana, where he says, it is bounded by Florida on the east, and by Mexico on the west. The same extent is assigned to it by Don Antonio de Alcedo, an officer of high rank in the service of Spain, entitled "Diccionario Geografico Historico de las Indias Occidentales ó America." Don Thomas Lopez, geographer to the King of Spain, in a map published in 1762, is of the same opinion, which is supported by the opinion of De Lisle, of the Royal Academy of Paris, in the year 1782.

Upon the testimony of so many respectable writers, many of whom were in the employment of both France and Spain, not to mention the authority of Du Pratz, it is believed the United States may with safety rely, they having, by the Treaty of Paris of 1803, become possessed of the French title. If, however, there exists any obscurity in the boundary of that province, Spain, with whom it is supposed the title conflicts, has no right to claim any benefit arising from it, as all the writers and geographers above referred to agree in fixing Mexico, New Spain, the Rio Grande del Norte, and the mountains of Mexico, as the true boundary anterior to the treaty of 1763. If she, then, by treaty, obtained from France that country, with these limits, as asserted by France, and different ones not being stipulated for by her, she cannot now, with any shadow of justice, propose others. Moreover, Spain, by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, retroceded this same country to France, with the same extent of boundary it had when originally in her possession, thereby confirming to France, without doubt, all she originally claimed, particularly, as no notice is there taken of the invalidity of the original French title to the full extent of their claim; at all events, it is believed, if there was difficulty in regard to it, during this last transfer would have been the time to adjust it; or, by the law of nations, it is thought, as well as candor and good faith, she has not, or ought not, to be permitted to insist upon other boundaries. That law, in one place, declares, that "if the party making them (meaning grants or cessions) fails to express himself clearly and plainly, it is the worse for him; he cannot be allowed to introduce, subsequently, restrictions which he has not expressed."

JANUARY, 1821.

Occupation of the Columbia River.

It is proper, before this part of the subject is passed over, to remark, that, from the examination of the best records of the times, from the discovery of America until the year 1763, the bull of the Pope rather gave a title to the country, the coast of which had been examined by the Spaniards, than confirmed, beyond the participation of other nations, the hemisphere west of the Azores; but, where an extensive coast had been discovered by them, and no settlement attempted previous to 1763, that coast, and its extended interior, has been considered the property of the nation so discovering it; or discovering the interior, the unoccupied coasts becomes a part.

Great Britain, as was her interest, maintained for a long time the old notion of a right to grant by charter all the countries from sea to sea, where it did not interfere with the territory of any Christian Prince or people; and her obstinate adherence to that system is considered as largely contributing to the production of the war of 1755, when she was opposed by France and Spain, as granting away almost all Mexico and the French possessions, both claiming much of the intermediate country, and the coast of the Pacific. Great Britain, at the close of that war, abandoned her pretensions, and gave manifestations of her sincerity, by revoking the first charter granted to Georgia, and in the second, in 1764, limited it to the Mississippi, and agreed, in 1763, to limit her whole territory to that river in the west.

Where territory has been acquired, as already shown, upon any coast, and the same coast is actually settled, or occupied by another Power, at such a distance as not manifestly to encroach upon the first, the point equidistant from either is considered as the utmost limits of each. This principle, it is believed, was fixed and settled by all the most important treaties which have engaged the Powers of Europe in affairs appertaining, in any way, to possessions in this country, and, it is believed, was acted upon and sanctioned, not only by the treaty of 1763, but, in some measure, by that of Utrecht, in 1713.

Spain, by virtue of her original discovery, and actual settlement in Mexico, together with her title to Louisiana, claimed the Pacific coast of North America, as high up as the sixtieth degree of north latitude; and, to enforce her claim, in the year 1789, sent a ship of war up the coast to capture or drive from those waters several English vessels fitted out in the East Indies by English merchants, upon their own authority, and at their own risk, to trade with the natives in that quarter. This service was performed by Martinez, of His Catholic Majesty's navy; and, in the year 1790, became the subject of a message from the British King to his Parliament. Although much debate ensued, and some resentment was expressed towards Spain for her treatment of the British subjects who were made prisoners, yet no claim was alleged on the part of England to territory there. Great Britain, in the course of that transaction, seems to have recognised the claim of Spain, and was willing to treat for the enjoyment of privileges on that coast, which she obtained, and was, by stipulations, invested with the further right to fish even as low down as the Gulf of California.

The Spanish monarch, being in possession of the French title, regardless of that which the United States had obtained, according to the mode last adopted, felt great confidence in his negotiations with the British Government, in the year 1790. But the territory, the title to which gave that confidence, has since, by the Treaty of Paris, come into the possession of the United States, and it is believed the Treaty of St Ildefonso confirmed to France the full extent of boundary originally claimed, Spain taking no notice of the original error, if any existed.

Under this view of the case, the United States, being possessed of the title of France, and, by a just application of the law of nations, that of Spain too, if she ever had any, leaves them the undisputed sovereignty of that coast, from the sixtieth degree of north latitude down to thirty-six, which is believed to be the situation of the mountains of Mexico, alluded to in all the authors and charts before referred to. If, however, there should remain a doubt, that doubt is relieved by a reference to the subordinate principle recognised by the Treaties of Utrecht and Paris, in 1763. When we know that all the formalities deemed necessary in the possession of a newly discovered country have been complied with on the part of the United States; that, in the year 1785-'6, an establishment was made at the mouth of the Columbia river, by Mr. Hendricks, the full and entire benefit of whose courage, enterprise, and success, results to this Union; and that at a later day, in 1805, Messrs. Lewis and Clark, in executing the desires of this Government, again visited the Columbia and the Western ocean, twelve miles from which they built Fort Clatsop, yet to be seen—these establishments made by the United States, not so near the settlements of California as manifestly to encroach upon them, entitle them to the whole country north of Columbia river. And, in applying the principle known to govern in such cases, the point equidistant from the Spanish actual settlements and the mouth of that river is the true point at which a line drawn separating the two countries should commence. The actual settlements of Spain are believed to have been, at that time, upon the Colorado of California, in latitude 32° north; but, even supposing the point to be the extreme south of the claim of the United States, which is believed to be 36°, then the line of separation would fall at 41°. And, if any doubt arose as to the claim of the United States to the full extent of the Spanish title, to the north of Fort Clatsop, so high as 60 degrees of latitude, there could remain no doubt as far as the equidistant point, which would be at the completion of the 53d degree of latitude, leaving us twelve degrees of coast on that ocean.

From every information that can be obtained, worthy to be relied upon, our coast on the Pacific, for years past, has been the theatre of much individual enterprise, stimulated by the rich returns of numerous whale ships, and the great profit of the fur trade, together with the flattering accounts of Messrs. Lewis and Clark, relative to the resources of the interior, though no regular trade or well organized system of commerce existed until the year 1810, in the course of which year a vessel was fitted out in the city of New York, well supplied with provisions and seed of every description necessary in a permanent occupation of the coast, which they contemplated. This little colony consisted of an hundred and twenty men when it arrived in the Columbia; and after ascertaining its soundings, they removed some miles above Fort Clatsop, and built the town of Astoria, where a portion of them cultivated the soil, whilst the others engaged in the fur trade with the natives. The soil was found to be rich, and well adapted to the culture of all the useful vegetables found in any part of the United States; as turnips, potatoes, onions, rye, wheat, melons of various kinds, cucumbers, and every species of pease. In the course of a year or two, it was believed their interest would be promoted by cultivating and securing the friendship and confidence of the tribes inhabiting the waters of that great river; to which end, the town of Astoria was maintained by about thirty men, whilst the rest established themselves at five other points, to become fixed stations, to raise their own vegetables, trade with the natives, and receive supplies of merchandise from the general depot of Astoria, and to return to it the fruits of their labor. One of these subordinate establishments appears to have been at the mouth of Lewis's river; one at Lantou; a third on the Columbia, six hundred miles from the ocean, at the confluence of the Wantana river; a fourth on the east fork of Lewis's river; and the fifth on the Multnomah. Thus situated, this enterprising little colony succeeded well in all their undertakings, nor met with but one misfortune, which seemed to partake largely of that kind which had, for a long time, so certainly and so unseen, been inflicted upon our Western inhabitants; this was the loss of the Tonquin, a vessel they had taken from New York, whilst trading down the coast, where, in time past, she had been, in common with the ships of some European Powers, enjoying the friendship and confidence of the natives. This confidence had by some means been destroyed, and, whilst they induced many of the ship's company to go on shore, many of their own number went on board the ship, and suddenly attacking the crew, the whole were destroyed, as well as the vessel. This, though a great affliction to the survivors on the Columbia, did not dishearten them, as other vessels were expected soon to arrive, and, with these expectations, they continued their trade, which, becoming profitable, they were the less inclined to abandon. But the operations of the war of 1812, which took place between the United States and Great Britain, were destined to mar their prosperity. That Government, it appears, despatched a vessel of war called the Raccoon, to destroy or possess Astoria, which, by the assistance of the Indians, influenced by the Northwest and Hudson's Bay Companies of fur traders, they were easily enabled to do; and have, from that period to the present time, continued to reside at it, as well as on the river above, though a messenger or agent was sent by the authority of the United States to receive, and did receive, that post from them, at the close of the late war.

From every reflection which the committee have been able to bestow upon the facts connected with this subject, they are inclined to believe the Columbia, in a commercial point of view, a position of the utmost importance; the fisheries on that coast, its open sea, and its position in regard to China, which offers the best market for the vast quantities of furs taken in those regions, and our increasing trade throughout that ocean, seems to demand immediate attention.

The fur of every country which has produced it, has been ever esteemed one of its most valuable commodities, and has long held a rank among the most profitable articles of commerce; it was much sought for even in the days of Tatila, a Visigoth, who reigned in Italy about the year 522, at which time they drew their supplies from the Suetons, who inhabited that part of Europe called Sweden. The Welch set a high value on them as early as the time of Howel Dda, in 940, and, from its being first an article of dress, used only by the poorer class of the community, it by gradually extending itself came to be one of luxury of the highest value, in which kings and princes vied with each other in their costly magnificence and display; their clothes were not only fashioned of them, but even their tents were lined with the finest varieties. Such was the display of the Cham of Tartary, when he was visited in his tent by Marco Polo, about the year 1252. It had become so much in use, and so high in price, that Edward III., in the year 1337, deemed it expedient to prohibit its use to any but those who could afford to spend an hundred pounds a year, without detriment to their property. At that day, having exhausted those parts of Europe which had supplied them, the price increasing with a growing demand, they were obliged to seek them elsewhere, and procured their supplies from the north of Asia. This, for a long time, poured into the adjoining parts of Europe, immense sums, as it was in that direction they were brought to market. This trade, so valuable to that part of the world, had no competition, nor were other sources of supply even known until Francis I. of France, in the year 1514, sent Jacques Curtis, of St. Maloes, to make discoveries in this country. That gentleman entered the St. Lawrence, and exchanged his merchandise for fur, which was the commencement of a feeble trade, that was continued until the year 1608, when Samuel Champlain went some distance up that river, and laid the foundation of the town of Quebec, as a trading establishment, and commenced a system which, however, did not greatly flourish until about the year 1649. But very soon after that country came into the possession of England, this trade was cherished and greatly increased, and the dominion of the Hudson's Bay enabled her not only to supply Russia itself, and all Europe, but even to send it to Turkey, and round the Cape of Good Hope, to distant China. That trade which had destroyed all competition, and, in the hands of well regulated companies, was capable of enriching an empire, had yielded a part of its profits to the skill and industry of individuals upon our western shore; that skill and that industry has withered, not for the want of fostering care, but justice and protection.

The fur trade of Canada has long been conducted by well organized companies; and, although they encounter infinite difficulties, yet the great profit of their business enables them to overcome them, and to divide a considerable per centage. All those articles intended as supplies for the Indians are shipped at Montreal and carried far into the interior, through lakes, and rivers, and difficult streams, until they arrive even in the vicinity of the Rocky Mountains. The increasing wealth derived from this source, induced a large increase of capital, and corresponding exertions to obtain a more extensive knowledge of the rivers and lakes through which their merchandise was to be carried, and a more extensive acquaintance with the natives, among whom they were eventually to be disposed of for furs, the produce of the labor of the savage. With views of this kind, small parties have been despatched, at different times, from the year 1774 until the year 1793, to examine the rivers of the West. At the period last mentioned, one of those parties, under the direction of Alexander McKenzie, penetrated even to the Western ocean, thereby greatly adding to their stock of useful knowledge in that branch of commerce, which they have not failed duly to appreciate. Notwithstanding the great difficulties which the British furriers encounter, from the embarrassment of their commerce by their different systems of exclusive privilege, these companies find it a source of vast profit, far exceeding any thing known in the United States; this, too, when the merchandise is so much advanced in price, from the distance and the numerous obstructions. The enhanced value of the articles, and their difficulties in transporting them, may be fully understood, when it is known the tract of transport is equal to three or four thousand miles, through more than sixty lakes, some of them very considerable in extent, and numerous rivers, and the means of transportation are bark canoes. Furthermore, these waters are interrupted in at least an hundred places, by falls and rapids, along which the trader has to carry his merchandise on his back, and over an hundred and thirty carrying places, from twenty or thirty yards in extent to thirteen miles, where both canoe and cargo have to be conveyed by the same means.

These are some of the obstructions which the Northwest Company encounter; yet their exports from Quebec alone are valued at more than a million of dollars annually, without reference to those brought to the United States, and shipped from New York and Philadelphia direct to China, rather than incur the cost and delay in procuring them a passage to London, and thence to India, in the ships of the East India Company. Indeed, it appears that many of the goods of that company, destined for this trade, particularly on the coast of the Pacific, are shipped to Boston, and immediately reshipped in American vessels, for the benefit of drawback. These vessels are sometimes employed to make a voyage for them from the mouth of Columbia to Canton. To illustrate more fully the increasing value of this trade, it is only necessary to observe, that from Quebec, in 1803, there were exported the skins of six hundred and fifty thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine quadrupeds, ninety-three thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight of which were the beaver. Since that time they have extended their trade beyond the Rocky Mountains, and have, as has already been observed, established themselves at the mouth of the Columbia. The amount of their export from that port cannot be ascertained, but it is thought to be of great value. The Hudson's Bay Company is believed to be considerable, and, from a state of former depression, is fast becoming the rival of the other, but for several years past have withdrawn their traders from the west side of the Rocky Mountains; they have fewer difficulties to overcome in arriving at the highest point of navigation than the Northwest Company. Their route is through the Hudson's Bay, the Nelson river, to Lake Winnipeg; thence, by passing other lakes, they ascend the Red river to their establishment, which is within ninety miles of the Missouri river, at a point called the Mandan villages. This river takes its rise in the Rocky Mountains, in about the forty-third degree of latitude, and observes a course north and northeast towards Hudson's Bay, until it arrives at the Mandan villages, a distance of nearly twelve hundred miles, when it turns short to the south, without any apparent cause, and joins the Mississippi; the water running to the Hudson's Bay at that point, approaching within one mile, and no hill or high ground to separate them, of any magnitude. Yet, notwithstanding the many advantages which the Hudson's Bay Company possessed over the Northwest Company, the Earl of Selkirk, the patron of the former, and a man of uncommon enterprise, was exceedingly desirous to obtain the privilege of supplying his establishments upon the Red river, by ascending the Mississippi to the St. Peter's; thence, to its source in Stone Lake; then, by a short portage, through open woods and a level country, to his stations; or, taking the route by the Missouri to the Mandan villages, thence by a portage of ninety miles, to his place of destination. The exports of this company, for a short time past, have been very little less than those of the Northwest Company.

The committee, from carefully examining all the facts connected with the subject referred to them, are well persuaded that the situation of the United States is such as to enable it to possess all the benefits derived from this trade, which, in the hands of others, amounts to millions; many of whose trading establishments east of the Rocky Mountains are within the acknowledged limits of this Republic, as fixed by the Convention of London of the 20th of October, 1818; and, it is believed, that no Power, with the exception of Spain, has any just claim to territory west of them, or on the Pacific. The dependence for subsistence of many of those establishments, is upon the buffalo beef hunted by the Assiniboin Indians, who inhabit the country between the river of that name and the Missouri; their hunting ground is far within our boundary. To succeed in procuring to the people of the United States all the wealth flowing from this source, it is only necessary to occupy with a small trading guard the most northeastern point upon the Missouri river, and confine the foreigners to their own territory; at the same time occupying, with a similar guard, the mouth of Columbia. The great profit derived from this trade by the Canadian companies, when we know the distance and obstructions in their rivers, and in the various streams they ascend in carrying it on, the advance of price consequent upon it becomes rather a matter of amazement than otherwise, and inclines us to examine our own rivers with a view to the same object. Instead, however, of those formidable obstructions, we find a smooth and deep river running through a boundless extent of the most fertile soil on this continent, containing within its limits all those valuable furs which have greatly enriched others; a certain, safe, and easy navigation, with a portage of only two hundred miles, uniting it with another river, equally smooth, deep, and certain, running to the great Western ocean. Thus are those two great oceans separated by a single portage of two hundred miles! The practicability of a speedy, safe, and easy communication with the Pacific, is no longer a matter of doubt or conjecture: from information not to be doubted, the Rocky Mountains at this time, in several places, are so smooth and open that the labor of ten men for twenty days would enable a wagon with its usual freight to pass with great facility from the navigable water of the Missouri to that of the Columbia; the actual distance from river to river several hundred miles from their source, that is, from the great Falls of Missouri to the fork of Clark's river, is one hundred and forty-nine miles; the distance, therefore, of two hundred miles is to good navigation on the Columbia, which is the only river of any magnitude upon that whole coast, north of the Colorado of California, though there are several good harbors, secure and safe for vessels of any size.

The region of country from the ocean to the head of tide water, which is about two hundred miles, is heavily timbered, with a great variety of wood well calculated for ship building, and every species of cabinet or carpenter's work; though there is a heavily timbered country thence for two hundred miles further, yet it is of a lesser growth, and quality not so durable; at that point commences the plain country, when the soil becomes more thin, and almost without wood, until it arrives at the table lands below the mountain. Though the soil of this region is not so good as in any other part of this great valley, yet it produces grass of the finest quality, and is emphatically called the region favorable to the production of the horse; this noble animal, so far surpassing all others in usefulness, courage, and swiftness, is here produced in greater perfection than even in Andalusia or Virginia. But, independent of all the wealth which may be derived from the fur trade of that river and the Missouri, the security too which the peace of this country would find in the influence which the American traders would obtain over the native, is the increasing commerce in the Western ocean. There is no employment so well calculated to make good seamen as the whale fisheries, which are known to be more profitable on this coast than any other; at the same time the oil is far preferable to that taken on any other coast, being clear and transparent as rock water. While so many of our citizens are industriously engaged in the various branches of trade in those seas, more valuable to this country, it is believed, than any other; while all nations who have claims upon that coast, and some who have none, are anxious to occupy some position upon it, even at a vast expense, to enable them to participate in its benefits, we have neglected to extend to it any portion of our care, though it appears, from the best information, that there is at this time eight millions of property owned by citizens of this Republic in the Pacific ocean.

Russia, whose dominions on the Asiatic coast, occupy nearly the same position upon that side, which ours do on this, has long been well informed of the great and increasing value of that commerce; and while she has been nowhere visible, not even to the powers of Europe, only as she has of late taken part in a few memorable enterprises, she has been felt everywhere. No labor, care, or expense, is avoided, to make tributary the four quarters of the globe; forts, magazines, towns, cities, and trade, seem to arise on that coast as if by magic; with an army of a million of men, she sits not only in proud security as it regards Europe, and menaces the Turk, the Persian, the Japanese, and Chinese, but even the King of Spain's dominions in North America are equally easy of access, and equally exposed to her fearful weight of power. Her watchfulness is ever in advance in discerning the most practicable avenues to profitable commerce. In the midst of all her busy arrangements she has not neglected the opportunity of possessing herself of two important stations on the American shore of the Pacific—the one at a place called New Archangel, in about 59 degrees of north latitude, the other at Bodiga Bay, in latitude 38 degrees, 34 minutes. At the former of these military positions, for the protection of her commerce it is presumed, she has incurred much expense, and built a fort of great strength, situated upon one of the best harbors on the coast, standing upon a point of land projecting into the little bay, giving something of the appearance of a conical island in the centre of it; this fort is well supplied at all times with provisions and military stores, mounting a hundred and twenty cannon, carrying balls from eighteen to twenty-four pounds weight. That at Bodiga is well constructed and supplied with cannon, and has a good harbor; at this point they have ammunition and merchandise in abundance, and find the Indian trade at this post as well as New Archangel very considerable; besides the fine condition of this fort and its defences, they have many field pieces, some of brass, of the finest construction, in good order and well mounted.

All these supplies have been conveyed to those places through immense oceans, round Cape Horn, which would have appalled any but Russian policy and perseverance.

The light articles destined for this trade are transported from St. Petersburg in sledges, which will perform in three months that which would require two Summers of water-conveyance to effect; their communications are open to Kamtschatka, to Fort St. Peter and St. Paul, by Okhotsk, in the Pacific, where they have the finest harbor in the world; the distance is estimated at ten thousand miles. The nation which can encounter such journeys as these, often through seas of ice, and storms of snow so terrible as to obscure an object beyond the distance of a few paces, to prosecute any branch of commerce, must be well and fully informed of its value. That the objects she has in view may not, by any event, be taken from her grasp, after encountering such vast difficulties, she has found it expedient to occupy one of the Sandwich Islands, which not only enables her effectually to maintain her positions, but to command the whole northern part of the Pacific ocean. These islands, lying just within the tropics, in the direct course from the lower coast of North America to Canton, are well supplied not only with all the fruits of that climate, but with every vegetable and animal known in this country.

It is worthy of remark, that among other advantages which the Russian position on the opposite coast possesses, is, that a voyage from Kamtschatka to Japan can be made in an open boat, as it is a continued chain of islands from the Okhotsk sea until it arrives at its place of destination.

Your committee are well persuaded that, by a little care and small expense, the citizens of this Republic might reap all the benefits of this trade, not only profitable now, but from every view of the subject there is a strong probability that it will increase for many years.

Were an establishment made at the mouth of Columbia, which should be allowed to take with them their women and children, there can be no doubt of success, as so many year's experience of the English fur companies have amply shown this mode has the most powerful effect in separating the minds of the men from pursuits which often in frontier countries lead to strife, as it gives them a local interest and feeling, and makes them even more vigilant and prudent in the discharge of all their duties. It is believed that population could be easily acquired from China, by which the arts of peace would at once acquire strength and influence, and make visible to the aborigines the manner in which their wants could be supplied. The coast of the Pacific is, in its climate, more mild than any part of the continent in the same parallel, and many vegetables on that shore grow in great abundance in the native forest, which are likewise natives of China.

JANUARY, 1821.

Occupation of the Columbia River.

H. OF R.

It is known that when the Spanish Government, in 1789, sent their ships of war up the coast to capture the British vessels which were intruding, they found seventy Chinese, whom the English had procured to emigrate, that they might be employed in the mechanic arts; and, though the people of that country evince no disposition to emigrate to the territory of adjoining princes, it is believed they would willingly, nay, gladly, embrace the opportunity of a home in America, where they have no prejudices, no fears, no restraint in opinion, labor, or religion.

The committee cannot doubt that an establishment made on the Pacific would essentially benefit the natives, whilst it would give this country the advantage of all its own treasures, which otherwise must be lost forever or rather never enjoyed; and, from all that can be ascertained relative to its present and increasing value, of more profit to this country than the mines of Potosi.

From the best information which can be had, it appears that the Indian trade on the Missouri, below the Mandan villages, is worth about $120,000, and that on the Mississippi is valued at $250,000, making the sum of $370,000 annually. They have reflected upon this trade, and that prosecuted by the whalers on that coast, and are irresistibly drawn to the conclusion, that they are the most valuable to this nation, and demand its care and attention in a high degree. This trade, unlike any other, originates its own capital, and may fairly be said to bring into the United States $370,000 every year, where not one dollar previously existed, and adds that much to the wealth of the community as decidedly as though it had been fished from the bottom of the rivers in gold and silver, as it is in the market of China, or any other market, capable of purchasing as much; and if, with that amount in furs, a vessel should sail from the mouth of the Columbia to Canton, which is a voyage of from fifty to seventy days, she would return with that in exchange which would sell for perhaps double that amount, thereby contributing to the comfort, enjoyment, and accommodation of the community, $740,000, which is the result not of a profitable voyage but a creative trade.

It is believed that a shipment of tobacco, flour, or cotton, bears no comparison, in point of profit, with this, as they are properly the rough manufactures of the country, and the result of considerable capital, and the cargo brought back in return for them, in European or other fabrics, is only an increased value they receive by being exported and returned to us in that shape. Hence, the exportation of $370,000 worth of tobacco or cotton, should it return to us $740,000 in European silk and cloth, is still the original cargo of tobacco or cotton, as nothing but these have been paid for them; but, in the first instance, he who manufactures either the tobacco, flour, or cotton, is compelled to take into consideration the capital employed, and then the balance is his gain; but in the fur trade and the whale fisheries, there is in the one little capital, in the other none.

Under the strongest belief that by a new organization of the system of Indian trade, comprehending a settlement on the Columbia river, great benefits would result to the citizens of the Republic, whilst the aborigines would be better protected and provided for by instructing them in agriculture and the minor branches of the mechanic arts, the committee ask leave to report a bill.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, to occupy that portion of the territory of the United States on the waters of the Columbia river, and to extinguish the Indian title to a district of country not exceeding — miles square, on the borders of said river, in the region of tide water; and that — acres of land be allowed to each actual settler, being the head of a family, and to each unmarried man, between the age of eighteen and forty-five years, who shall establish himself in said district, and cultivate ground therein within — years after the Indian title shall be extinguished thereto.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President shall prescribe regulations for the government of said district, and the administration of justice therein, and appoint the necessary officers for carrying the same into effect.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President be authorized to open a port of entry, as soon as he shall deem it expedient, within the said district, and to appoint custom-house officers for the regulation of the same; and from and after which time the revenue laws of the United States shall be extended over said district, and be of full force therein.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President be authorized and required to appoint agents for the Indian tribes on the waters of the Columbia, and to fix the salaries of the agents so appointed, not exceeding the salary now allowed to the agent to the Indians on the Upper Missouri; and that from and after such appointment, all the laws of the United States for regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes, shall be deemed and had to be in full force throughout the territories inhabited by the said tribes.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a Superintendent of Indian Affairs, who shall reside at St. Louis; and all the Indian agents to the different tribes on the waters of the Upper Mississippi, the Lakes Michigan, Erie, and Superior, and the waters of Missouri, Arkansas, Red River, and Columbia, shall be under his control and direction, and shall correspond with him, and through him, to the Department of War. The said Superintendent shall be authorized and required to grant all licenses to Indian traders, and shall have over them a general superintendence; that each trader shall make a full and accurate report to him of the state and condition of the Indians with whom they trade, at least once a month; and the Superintendent shall forward the same, digested in a general report, to the Department of War, once in three months, or oftener if thereto required.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of every act which establishes a superintendency of Indian affairs at Washington city, and so much of every act which establishes factories among the Indian tribes, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the property in the hands of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs at Washington city, and the respective factors in the service of the United States, be sold, and the proceeds accounted for in such manner as the Secretary of the Department of War may direct.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That licenses shall not be granted to trade with any of the Indian tribes, to any but citizens of the United States, of approved moral character, and of ability to embark at least — dollars annually in the trade; and every trader obtaining a license so to trade, shall have a fixed habitation; to which end he may lease from the tribe where such habitation is fixed, a tract of land not exceeding — miles square, and for a term not exceeding — years, nor shall it be within — miles of a similar location previously made, and shall have leave to trade within the limits of their respective licenses; and each trader shall set up a blacksmith shop, and shall supply the Indians with such working tools as they may be willing to purchase; and are hereby required to cultivate at their establishments the different kinds of grain and fruit, which the climate and soil will produce, and shall rear the domestic animals in common use; and shall furnish seed and stock animals to such Indians as may wish to buy them, and shall induce them to cultivate the soil and rear the domestic animals. Nor shall any trader be permitted to sell to any of the Indian tribes ardent spirits of any kind, under the penalty of — dollars for every such offence, and shall ever after be debarred the privilege of trading with any Indian tribe. Each trader shall pay — dollars annually for his license, but it shall be granted during good behaviour upon his giving bond with sufficient security, which shall be judged of by the superintendent, and may by him be required to give additional security in proportion to his additional capital employed every two years, the license to be annulled for breach of conditions, which shall be determined by the verdict of a jury.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the money paid to the superintendent annually for licenses by the Indian traders, shall be by him appropriated to the purchase of any kind of seed or domestic animals, for such Indians as may want to cultivate such seed, or rear such animals; but if, at the end of the year, there should be money remaining in his hands accruing from this fund, he shall make payment of it into the Treasury of the United States, where it shall be kept as a distinct fund, to be applied to the building of mills in such place and manner among the different tribes as the President may direct; and it is hereby made the duty of the agent who has the care of the affairs of that tribe where such mill is built, to superintend the building of the same, and to transmit an accurate account of his disbursements to the superintendent, and by him to the Department of War.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every Indian agent to report to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs upon the state and condition of the Indians, and the conduct of the traders, within their respective agencies, at least once a month, and oftener if thereto required; the said reports to be made in the form prescribed by the Secretary of the Department of War, and upon all such points as may be indicated by the said department; and the superintendent shall forward the same, digested into a general report, to the Department of War, at least once in three months, and as much oftener as may be required.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all Indian agents, not under the direction of the superintendent as herein directed, shall be authorized to issue licenses to traders within the limits of the Indian territory under their authority, and shall correspond directly with the Department of War.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the sum of — dollars is hereby appropriated to carry into effect the provisions of this act, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so as to establish an uniform mode of electing, by districts, Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and Representatives in Congress.

And the question having been stated on the passage of said resolution, this being its final reading in this House—

Mr. GROSS said, that he had voted for a similar resolution at the last session of Congress, without, as he confessed, having examined the subject in the most attentive manner; but subsequent consideration had confirmed his original impression. He was of opinion that the permanent interests of the United States demanded the adoption of the proposed amendment. A variety of objections, he said, had been taken to the resolution during a former discussion. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. REID) warned us against rashly altering the provisions of the Constitution; while the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) entered into an arithmetical calculation to show that the amendment would lessen the power and influence of the larger States. Other gentlemen thought they foresaw still greater evils. All their arguments were directed to the same point, and were of three kinds: those drawn from considerations of the sacred character of the instrument, and the danger of rash amendments; those addressed to the pride and jealousy of States; and, lastly, those which result from an inquiry into the present practices of the different States, in choosing their Electors, and their general tendency and effect. The first class of arguments, he said, were certainly worthy of respectful consideration. No one, perhaps, had a right to object to those of the second; but he would venture to say that those of the third alone involved the real merits of the question.

If, said Mr. G., we admit that it be ever lawful or proper to examine the Constitution, with a view to its amendment, when, he would ask, has there ever been a time, or when are we to expect the arrival of a period, better adapted to our purpose than the present? In some States the fire of discord is rekindled, but the nation is comparatively tranquil. Party spirit is now, for the most part, local in its nature, and local in its effects. Where is the party, or where is the citizen, who does not desire the union and prosperity of these States? He confidently believed they were not to be found. He presumed that no one doubted that the framers of the Constitution were both patriotic and enlightened; yet they have thought proper to prescribe a mode of amendment in the instrument itself. Would they have done this had they designed to conceal it from public view, and to permit none but the initiated, none but priests and Levites, to approach? They knew, he said, indeed, that rash amendments might be productive of evil, and had accordingly provided ample means of precaution. The House cannot alter the Constitution; Congress itself cannot do it. It can only propose and recommend amendments to the States. With these preventives against precipitate movements, the representatives of the people, as well as the people themselves, instead of being warned to depart, should be invited to approach and examine the instrument, with the same honesty of intention which actuated its framers, and, if it be found defective, boldly to advise its amendment.

Amendment to the Constitution.

It was, he said, a doctrine long, too long, established in some countries, that every thing relating to the Government was too sacred for the view of the people; a doctrine which, he hoped, would never flourish on this side the Atlantic. Priests and politicians united their tender cares for the welfare of the human race, and accordingly the Bible was prohibited by the one, and the book of laws by the other. He highly appreciated the motives of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. REID) but his remarks on this part of the subject reminded him of the habitual answer given by the ministry of a certain country to every application for reform. The national reputation abroad, he said, was, by them, made an excuse for the oppression of the people, and the excellency of the abstract principles of the Constitution for the corrupt practices of the Government.

I am, said Mr. G., as zealous for the preservation of State rights, and will oppose any infringement of them with as much zeal, as the gentleman from Virginia. He would not consent to any measure which would impair their independence as recognised by the principles of the Constitution. That gentleman has shown that, should the proposed amendment be adopted, it may happen that the votes of the small State of Delaware will neutralize those of Virginia or New York. He has even demonstrated that, should the Electors of New York give a majority of but one vote for a particular candidate, those of Delaware might give a majority of four to the other, and thus secure his election. Sir, all this may happen, and where would be the harm if it should? Is it proper that one vote in any State should overbalance and overpower four votes in another? What matters it, whether the Electors of this or that State be divided or in the minority, so long as the majority of the people of the United States prevail? Sir, said Mr. G. I have the honor of being one of the Representatives from a State which has been called, sometimes seriously, sometimes, perhaps, laughingly, but I trust always truly, a great State. The intrinsic excellence of her soil, and her internal as well as external advantages, must ever preserve her a great State in point of population. But, of what advantage will this kind of greatness be to her, should jealousies be excited, should discord prevail, and should the Union be dissolved? He trusted that it was a proposition which would not be controverted on that floor, that the greatness of every State depended on the preservation and harmony of the Union. Why, then, he asked, should we, under the pretence of preserving State rights, seek an unnatural advantage, the exercise of which can only serve to cherish faction, foment discord within, excite jealousy without, and jeopardize the best interests of the country? It is enough that the Constitution guaranties to us the advantage of a superiority of numbers, by giving us a proportionate superiority of votes. It is a miserable ambition, he hoped it might not prove a fatal one, that seeks the temporary disfranchisement of a great minority of our fellow-citizens, for the purpose of showing our power to a smaller member of the Confederacy. Do gentlemen fear that party concert cannot be preserved, if Electors of President and Vice President be chosen by districts? The members of the House were thus chosen, in all the larger States, during periods of the greatest excitement, and the Journal will show that the Administration never lacked support.

It has been thought proper, said Mr. G., to point out the possible inconveniences of the proposed method of choosing Electors of President and Vice President. He did not consider argument of this kind very conclusive, because all human institutions and plans are, from their origin, in a greater or less degree defective. We were, he said, to search for and adopt the least objectionable one. The present system is liable to the same inconvenience as the one proposed; for, although New York should give all its votes for one candidate, Pennsylvania or Virginia might give theirs to another, and thus enable Delaware and Rhode Island to turn the election. So far the two modes present the same objections. The present system, however, furnishes others of a still weightier character. Let us suppose, after the manner of the gentleman from Virginia, that the votes of the several States were so distributed that one-half of the votes of the State of New York, if given to a particular candidate, would secure his election. Suppose that candidate to be favored by Virginia, and, further, that it should so happen, as it certainly may happen, that all the votes of the State should be given to his opponent. Let us suppose, moreover, that the Legislature which appointed those Electors was chosen several months before, at a time of public excitement, and that, in fact, they did not express the sentiment of the people, and that, had the Electors been chosen by districts, a majority of them might have given a different vote. What would gentlemen say to such a state of things? Mr. G. thought that, under such circumstances, they would gladly have exchanged the insignificant State right of altering, from year to year, the mode of choosing Electors, for the permanent benefit of enabling the voice of the people to be heard.

I am ready to acknowledge, said Mr. G., that uniformity and permanency in the mode of appointing Electors is of more consequence than the mode itself. If gentlemen choose to have them elected by a general ticket, let it be so. It was the present variety of modes, adopted by the different States, and the power of change to suit the times, against which he objected. Some States appoint their Electors by districts, some by general ticket, and some by their Legislatures. Virginia, at first, adopted the former mode, but changed it afterwards to that of a general ticket, in order to throw her whole weight into the scale at a particular election. Other States may make changes in this particular as well as Virginia, and for a similar purpose. What will be the result? The objects of party may be attained. A particular candidate may succeed by a particular manœuvre; but the effect of such practices cannot fail to be injurious, if not fatal, to the liberties of the people. Aristocrats and monarchists have never been able to combat successfully the principles upon which our Government rests: but they have asserted that such a Government cannot long exist. Their predictions have hitherto been verified by the event. The safety of a republic does not essentially depend upon the particular form of its government, or upon particular laws; for what are forms and what are laws to a degenerate people, without force to maintain them? It does not depend on an armed force, for republics will not, and ought not, to endure the rigorous police nor the pensioned spies which infest a community under a monarchical form of government. On the contrary, our security consists in the intelligence and virtue of the people, and in the favorable opinion which they entertain of the purity of our institutions, in practice as well as in principle. When the Constitution ceases to be revered by them, it will no longer be worth preserving. It is, then, of the greatest importance that the election of a citizen to fill the high and responsible office of President of the United States, should be the effect of the free, unbiassed, and unbought will of the people.

It may happen that a single State, by changing its mode of appointing Electors, will give a turn to the election. If it happen once, it may happen again. Will the people bear with this? They surely will not. If they are compelled to submit, they will lose all confidence, not in the Government only, but also in the efficacy of the Constitution. Is such the end for which our ancestors resisted the usurpations of Great Britain? And is such to be the practical result of our boasted freedom? Shall we not be content with the legitimate superiority which a numerous population gives us; but must we also adhere to a system by which a great State may accidentally acquire an unjust and odious advantage, and by which she may also be made to suffer with her sister States? The object does not justify the risk, and, the sooner it is abandoned, the better it will be for the country.

Mr. G. said that alarm had been expressed at the increasing influence of the General Government. He was glad, he said, that these expressions proceeded from the quarter they did. The General Government possessed patronage; and this patronage, properly exercised, might prove salutary, by cementing the bonds of our Union. Its abuse was, indeed, to be dreaded. In his opinion, the amendment proposed would, instead of increasing the influence of the Executive, curtail it in a salutary manner. How was the National Government to influence the elections in the different States? Its officers may, indeed, exert themselves, and even make an improper use of their official influence to promote the views of a party; but, against this, separately considered, we had the security of that mass of patriotism and intelligence which pervades the community. No, sir, said Mr. G., it is not at the polls of election that this kind of influence is most to be dreaded. A whole community is not to be bribed. Can we say as much, he asked, of a Legislature, consisting perhaps of no more than one hundred and fifty men, and governed by a caucus composed of little more than one-half its numbers? It was here, he said, that foreign and sinister views had full scope; and it was here that the violence of party brought forth its fruits in perfection. If, said Mr. G., there be a member of this House who feels himself inclined to oppose the proposed amendment in order to secure the supremacy of a party, let him reflect that the same weapons which he now makes use of for the harmless purpose of defeating an opponent, may, by some future party, be turned against the liberties of the country.

In conclusion, Mr. G. said that he felt bound to support the amendment, as well on the broad principles of justice, as to secure the Constitutional independence of the States and the preservation of the Union.

Mr. Ross, of Ohio, assigned at length the reasons which influenced him to oppose this resolution; first, because, in one part of it, respecting Representatives, it was wholly unnecessary, and in the other part, respecting Electors, inexpedient.

Mr. Strong, of New York, next spoke, in opposition to the resolution, on the grounds generally taken in opposition to it, and with the additional reasons that the proposed amendment goes to affect the powers of the people, and should therefore be approached with more hesitation than if it related to any of the powers of the Government, and should not be touched at all unless under an indispensable necessity.

Mr. BREVARD said, that he had intended on this occasion, as on others, to have refrained from taking any part in the debate, as he had generally found, that what occurred to him, as necessary or proper to be said, was as well or better said by others. But, as it was his misfortune not to agree with some of his friends and colleagues, and other members of the House, for whose opinions he entertained great respect and deference, he thought it due to them and himself to assign some of the reasons which influenced his conduct. In doing so, he said he would be as concise and as little tedious as possible; for, said he, I am desirous of avoiding what I conceive to be a great evil here, namely, a profusion and waste of words; involving what is much to be regretted—a loss of precious time, and an useless expenditure of public money. For time is money, and the economy of time is important.

Mr. B. said, he had ever held in the highest estimation, in reverence, that instrument which it was then proposed to alter, for the purpose, as it was said, of amending it. He had always believed that it was our highest political interest, and therefore a duty incumbent upon us, to cherish a veneration for this instrument, and inculcate it in others. He therefore regarded as a species of sacrilege every attempt to change or alter any of its features on any pretence whatever.

JANUARY, 1821.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

He was not ignorant, he said, that the Constitution contained a provision for its own amendment; that, in virtue of this provision, it had been altered; and that the alteration then proposed was in conformity to this provision. But, he said, he was not entirely satisfied that every innovation and change which had been made was an improvement which would be sanctioned by time and experience.

This Constitution, he said, was formed at a most propitious period, and under circumstances peculiarly fortunate. Those who formed it brought to the work more of pure unmixed patriotism, and less of human passion, prejudice, and interest, than had ever happened, or would, perhaps, ever happen again on any occasion of equal importance.

We owe it, said he, to the virtue and the wisdom of those enlightened patriots to believe that what they did was not done without consideration; and, also, to those able men, who afterwards severely examined and finally approved it, to believe that it is as perfect as human wisdom and skill can make it. In his judgment then, he said, it would be unwise and unsafe to abridge, enlarge, or otherwise change any of its provisions, without the most evident and urgent necessity, and without the clearest and most perfect conviction of the utility and safety of the measure.

It is not, he said, for every cause, productive of possible evil, which the speculative mind of man may discover, and would guard against by anticipation, that this invaluable charter is to undergo a change at the will or the caprice of the Legislature.

He did think it important that this charter ought to be held in high and dear respect by the people of the United States; not as imperfect, uncertain, and mutable—but as perfect—clear as light—and as stable as the hill of this Capitol.

He was not, he said, for removing one barrier of the Constitution, and replacing it by another, on any pretext, however plausible it might appear at first view; and he would not incline to do so till he could clearly discern and appreciate the consequences of such a change. With the lights he then had, Mr. B. said, he could not clearly see that the alteration proposed might not produce, eventually, full as much harm as good.

There was, perhaps, he said, evil to be apprehended in either view of the subject. On which side the evil was most likely to preponderate, was, to his mind, at least problematical. He was, therefore, for preserving the Constitution inviolate, until there should be a necessity more pressing than any that, to him, was then perceptible, for amending it.

It is better, said he, to bear those ills we have, than to fly to others that we know not of. It will be time enough when some serious evil is felt, or seen to approach so near as to be distinctly observed, and to threaten our peace and safety, to prepare the necessary defence against it.

The nature and magnitude of the evil, said Mr. B. will then more clearly suggest the appropriate safeguard.

The Legislature of each State, Mr. B. said, now has the power of prescribing the times, the places, and the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives; but Congress may make any alteration as to the times, and the manner, but not as to the places of election. In the election of President, the Legislature of each State is empowered to direct the manner of appointing Electors. An opinion, said he, is entertained by some, that the power vested in the Legislature of each State, of directing the manner of appointing Electors, does not imply the power of appointment by the Legislature itself, in exclusion of popular election. He would not, he said, on this point (as he did not think it necessary) deliver any opinion. His friend from New York, (Mr. SRRONG,) who sat near him, had argued it with ability and success. The power and the duty, Mr. B. said, of expounding the Constitution in relation to that point belonged to the Legislature of each State, when required to act in obedience to its provisions; and he did not doubt they would act with proper deliberation and caution.

Mr. B. said, it is a principle which lies as the foundation of all our institutions, political and civil, that the will of the majority shall govern. When, said he, we advert to the nature and character of the Federal compact, and take into consideration that it was formed by the people of the several States, composing separate and distinct communities—that the ends for which it was contrived were the defence and safety of each and every of these distinct communities, as well as the defence and safety of them all, and the maintenance of the Confederacy—we will be induced rather to incline in favor of preserving the power, which the several States now have, of regulating the subject under consideration, than of depriving them of it, and vesting it in the Congress. Occasions may render it necessary for the States to exercise it, and the time has been when, in some of the States, it had been considered of the utmost importance to the public welfare to exercise it by providing against division, and insuring unanimity in the choice of Chief Magistrate of the Union. Mr. B. said, he was by no means clear that this power ought not to rest where it now resides, although it might, possibly, sometimes be abused. Every thing of human invention, however excellent, however admirable and beneficial, is liable to abuse. An argument derived from the possible abuse of a power, was not a sufficient argument against its legitimate exercise. He said he would not go into detail—that had been done by others better qualified for the task. He could, he said, add little by way of illustration to what had been already advanced.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, expressed the grounds of his hostility to this resolution, which he considered as proposing a pernicious innovation on the Constitution, under the influence of fanciful and theoretical notions, under circumstances of the House and of the country not favorable to a correct decision.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, opposed the resolution on principle, and on the ground of the im-policy of lightly invading the present provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, defended the resolution, on the ground of the necessity of some change in the Constitution, (he did not pronounce this the only change which could be made, or the best, though he inclined to think it the best,) to guard against the effects of intrigue on elections.

Mr. WHITMAN, of Massachusetts, strongly supported the resolution on its known merits, and on the ground that the amendment which it proposes to the Constitution involves no innovation, but to restore to that instrument a feature in regard to Electors, which it originally possessed, which had been taken from it by construction. The delivery of Mr. W.'s speech occupied nearly an hour.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, spoke decidedly in support of the resolution, as calculated to restore to the people the exercise of the sovereign power, of which they had in practice been divested, contrary to what ought to have been the construction of the Constitution.

The question on the passage of the resolution was then taken, and decided as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of New York, Archer of Maryland, Baker, Ball, Bayly, Beecher, Bloomfield, Brown, Brush, Burton, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Claggett, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Crafts, Crowell, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Davidson, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Fisher, Floyd, Foot, Ford, Gross of New York, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hendricks, Herrick, Hobart, Hooks, Jackson, Johnson, Kinsey, Kinsley, Little, Lincoln, Livermore, Lowndes, Maclay, McCullough, McLane, of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Mercer, Metcalf, Monell, R. NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Baldwin, Barbour, Brevard, Burwell, Case, Clark, Crawford, Darlington, Dennison, Dickinson, Earle, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Forrest, Garnett, Gray, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hardin, Hibshman, Hill, Hostetter, Jones of Virginia, Lathrop, McCoy, McCreary, Marchand, Meigs, S. Moore, Murray, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parker of Virginia, Patterson, Philson, Randolph, Reid, Rhea, Rogers, Ross, Sergeant, A. Smyth of Virginia, Southard, Storrs, Strong of New York, Tarr, Terrell, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Udree, and Wallace—54.

Two-thirds of the members present not having voted in its favor, the resolution was of course declared to be rejected.

FRIDAY, January 26.

Mr. GORHAM presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Massachusetts, praying that measures may be adopted by the Government of the United States, in concert with the Governments of other civilized and Christian nations, to abolish the practice of privateering, or capturing and condemning private property in time of war ; which petition was referred to the Committee of Commerce.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1821 ; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Samuel T. Anderson, accompanied by a bill for his relief ; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to establish an additional land office in the Territory of Michigan ; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRUSH, from the same committee, reported a bill granting certain islands in the Tennessee river to the State of Alabama ; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act for regulating process in the courts of the United States ;" which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table. The bill is as follows :

Be it enacted, &c., That in all suits and actions in any district court of the United States, in which it shall appear that the judge of such court is any ways concerned in interest, or has been of counsel for either party, or is so related to, or connected with, either party, as to render it improper for him, in his opinion, to sit on the trial of such suit or action, it shall be the duty of such judge, on application of either party, to cause the fact to be entered on the records of the court, and also an order that an authenticated copy thereof, with all the proceedings in such suit or action, shall be forthwith certified to the next circuit court of the district ; and if there be no circuit in such district, to the next circuit court of the State, and if there be no circuit court in such State, to the most convenient circuit court in an adjacent State ; which circuit court shall, upon such record being filed with the clerk thereof, take cognizance thereof in the like manner as if such suit or action had been originally commenced in that court, and shall proceed to hear and determine the same accordingly. And the jurisdiction of such circuit court shall extend to all such cases so removed as were cognizable in the district court from which the same was removed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 9th instant, requiring him to state "when and why the agency of the Treasurer of the United States for the War and Navy Departments was first established, and whether the same may not be discontinued without any detriment to the public service ;" which report was read, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Lotteries in the District of Columbia.

H. OF R.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to remove the land office in the district of Lawrence county, in the Territory of Arkansas," was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of John Coffee;" "An act explanatory of an act for the relief of James Leander Cathcart," passed May 15th, in the year 1820; and "An act for the relief of Nicholas Perkins;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Morgan Brown;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Charles Townsend and Jonas Williams; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. HILL reported the resolution submitted in the said report, with an amendment, to wit: strike out the word not before the word allowed, so as to make the resolution read, "Resolved, That the claim of Charles Townsend and Jonas Williams, of Buffalo, in the State of New York, ought to be allowed."

And on the question to concur with the Committee of the Whole in the said amendment, it was determined in the negative.

The resolution submitted in the said report was then concurred in by the House as follows:

Resolved, That the claim of Charles Townsend and Jonas Williams, of Buffalo, in the State of New York, ought not to be allowed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish the district of Pearl river; which was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the entry of merchandise imported into the United States from any adjacent territory. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of John Webster; which was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Baltimore; which was read and concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of John Coffee;" "An act explanatory of the act for the relief of James Leander Cathcart," passed May 15th, in the year 1820; and "An act for the relief of Jacob Perkins;" were severally read the first time.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Nathan Ford," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

DISTRICT LOTTERIES.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, who were instructed, on the 8th instant, to make certain inquiries respecting the lotteries authorized by the act of the 15th of May, 1820, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose," made a report; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The report is as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing them to "inquire into and report to the House the number of lotteries which have been instituted in the District, by virtue of an act which passed the 15th of May 1820, 'to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose;' the objects for which the moneys are to be raised; the amount of each scheme, and the total nominal value of the tickets offered for sale; the rate of reduction proposed to be made from the prizes; and the gross amount of the proceeds of the said lotteries, which will come into the hands of the managers; and, also, whether the condition of the said act of incorporation has been complied with, so far as it respects the authority to raise money by lotteries;" have, accordingly, had the said resolution under consideration, and respectfully report:

That, under the act of incorporation referred to in the said resolution, one lottery only has been authorized by the Corporation of the City of Washington; but the committee presuming it to have been the purpose of the resolution of the House of Representatives to ascertain how the power to raise money by lottery has been hitherto exerted by the Corporation, have extended their inquiry to the lotteries authorized by an amendment of the former charter of the Corporation.

The terms of that amendment which, as far back as the 6th of May, 1812, vested in the City Corporation the power of raising money by lottery, are, in substantial import, the same with those of the renewed charter, except that in the latter the duration of this power is limited to ten years. In both, it is subjected to the control of the President of the United States; and every resolution adopted by the Corporation, in pursuance of this power, has been subsequently approved by the President.

The first resolution of the Boards of Aldermen and Common Council of the City, in which its legislative power is vested by its charter, authorized the raising of ten thousand dollars by lottery, "for building, establishing, and endowing two public school-houses on the Lancasterian system," and received the approbation of Mr. Madison on the 23d of November, 1812.

Seven other resolutions, each giving power to raise by lottery a like amount, have emanated from the same authority since the above period; one of these resolutions having been approved in every subsequent year, except the year 1813, and the last on the 31st of October, 1820.

The three resolutions next following the first, add to the objects of public utility sought to be provided for by that resolution—a penitentiary and a city hall.

H. OF R.

Lotteries in the District of Columbia.

JANUARY, 1821.

In pursuance of these resolutions, the managers, in whom the Corporation vested the power of carrying their purpose into effect, have contracted, at different periods, for the drawing of five lotteries, or classes of a lottery. The first of these authorized the sale of tickets to the amount of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and for this the Corporation was, by the contract of the managers with the lottery agent, to receive ten thousand dollars; but the managers have stated to the committee that, owing to a misunderstanding between themselves and the agent for that class, they have, as yet, received no part of that sum.

From the second and third classes, authorizing the sale of a number of tickets of the value of $300,000, the managers have realized $20,000, being $10,000 for each class.

From the fourth class, which is now drawing, and the tickets of which amount in gross value to $210,000, the managers will have received in course of the ensuing month $6,666 67; and from the fifth class, the tickets of which are computed at $400,000, they expect to realize the further sum of $13,333 33, being in all $40,000, from the authority granted by the resolutions of eight years.

Copies of the schemes of these lotteries have been submitted to the committee by the Mayor of the city of Washington, through whom the preceding facts have been collected. In all of them the rate of reduction from the prizes is fifteen per centum.

The committee having reported all the facts called for by the resolution of the House of Representatives, are required to pronounce an opinion on the question, "whether the condition of the act of corporation of the city of Washington has been complied with, so far as it respects the authority to raise money by lotteries."

As this question is likely to be involved in a judicial inquiry, now pending in one or more of the courts of the United States, the committee hope to be excused by the House for forbearing to express any opinion on it. They have annexed to this report the original correspondence through which the preceding facts have been collected; together with a copy of one of the contracts between the managers, appointed by the city corporation, and the contractor for drawing one of the lotteries authorized by a resolution of the corporation; and such extracts from the old and new charters of the city of Washington as may serve to illustrate the nature and extent of the authority vested in the corporation to raise money by lottery; in relation to all which they respectfully submit the following resolution to the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient for the House of Representatives to express any opinion on the question, whether the condition of the act of incorporation of the city of Washington has been complied with by the corporation, so far as regards the authority to raise money by lottery.

WASHINGTON, MAYOR'S OFFICE,
January 16, 1821.

SIR: Your note of the 12th instant has been received, enclosing a resolution passed by the House of Representatives of the United States on the subject of the city lotteries. I am now collecting the information you may require, and the moment it is obtained I shall transmit or wait on you with the same.

I have, &c. S. N. SMALLWOOD.
Hon. CHARLES F. MERCER,

WASHINGTON, MAYOR'S OFFICE,
January 16, 1821.

SIR: In compliance with your note of the 12th instant, submitting to me a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant, relative to the city lotteries heretofore authorized by Congress, I transmit letters, with other documents, from the register of this city and the president of the board of managers of said lotteries, which contain the information desired. As to the purposes for which the moneys are to be raised, I reply, that a penitentiary, two Lancasterian school-houses, and a city hall, are to be built out of those funds. The latter has been commenced on a magnificent scale, and is progressing with great rapidity, and, if not impeded by the acts and proceedings of the different States, as it respects our lotteries, we shall, in a few years, accomplish these desirable objects, and thereby improve and embellish the metropolis of the Union to a considerable extent, which, in a national point of view, is the property of the nation; therefore, it is reasonable to conclude, for reasons obvious to us all, that it would be the pride and interest of every man in the country to aid the inhabitants of this city in beautifying and adorning the metropolis of their Union. I beg you will excuse this small digression from the subject of your call.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

SAMUEL N. SMALLWOOD.

Hon. CHARLES F. MERCER,
Chairman District Committee.

WASHINGTON, REGISTER'S OFFICE,
January 15, 1821.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I herewith transmit to you a copy of the first resolution of the corporation authorizing the raising of $10,000 by lottery; and an abstract of all the succeeding resolutions. First resolution:

Resolved by the Board of Aldermen and Board of Common Council of the City of Washington, That it is expedient to raise, by lottery, the sum of ten thousand dollars (clear of expenses) for the following object, to the accomplishment of which the ordinary funds of the city are inadequate, viz:

For building, establishing, and endowing two public school-houses on the Lancasterian system, (one in the eastern, and one in the western section of the city,) the sum of ten thousand dollars.

Resolved, That the Mayor be, and he is hereby, requested to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States, and respectfully solicit his approbation thereto.

Approved, November 23, 1812.

Extracts from the old and new charters of the City of Washington, illustrative of its power to raise money by lottery.

That the said corporation shall have full power and authority to authorize, with the approbation of the President of the United States, the drawing of lotteries for the erection of bridges, and effecting any important improvements in the city which the ordinary revenue thereof will not accomplish, for the term of ten years: Provided, That the amount so authorized to be raised in each year shall not exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars, clear of expenses.

The said corporation shall also have power and authority to provide for the establishment and superintendence of public schools, and to endow the same; to establish and erect hospitals or pest-houses, watch and work-houses, houses of correction, penitentiary, and other public buildings, and to pass all laws which shall be deemed necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by this act in the said corporation or its officers. [Pamphlet copy, page 87 of the acts of the 1st session, 16th Congress.]

By an act to amend the charter of the city of Washington, which passed May 6, 1812, the corporation was vested with full power to authorize the drawing of lotteries, for effecting any important improvement in the city which the ordinary funds or revenue thereof will not accomplish: Provided, That the amount to be raised in each year shall not exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars: And provided, also, That the object for which the money is intended to be raised shall be first submitted to the President of the United States, and shall be approved of by him; and to pass all laws which shall be deemed necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers; and all other powers vested in the corporation or any of its officers, either by this act or any former one. [Vol. 11, Laws of the United States, page 153.]

WASHINGTON, January 14, 1821.

SIR: I have this moment received your communication of this morning, enclosing a resolution of the House of Representatives, and a letter of the Chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, on the subject of the lotteries authorized by the charter of this city, and, by direction of the board of managers of the lotteries, have the honor to state that the corporation has, by authority of the late and present charter, authorized, up to this period, the raising by lottery of $80,000, for the erection of two Lancasterian school-houses, a penitentiary, and a city hall, as will more fully appear by the enclosed letter from the register of the city.

That the board of managers have, by authority of the resolutions of the corporation, contracted for five classes of lotteries; that the first class amounted, in gross, to $150,000, for which the managers were to receive $10,000, but that, owing to a misunderstanding between them and the contractor for that class, they have not, as yet, received a cent; that, from the second and third classes, amounting in gross to $300,000 each, the managers have realized $20,000, being $10,000 for each scheme; that, from the fourth class, now drawing, amounting in gross to $210,000, the managers have received, and will receive in the course of the month of February ensuing, $6,666 67; that, from the fifth class, amounting in gross to $400,000, the managers expect to realize $13,333 83; that 15 per cent. has been the uniform deduction from all prizes, as will appear by the enclosed schemes.

I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.

R. C. WEIGHTMAN,
President of the Managers.

Contract for the fifth class of a lottery.

Memorandum of an agreement made this 7th day of October, 1820, between Roger C. Weightman, president of the board of managers of the lotteries authorized by a law of the corporation of the City of Washington, entitled "An act authorizing a lottery or lotteries in the City of Washington, for the purposes therein mentioned," by and with the advice and consent of a majority of the said managers, of the one part, and David Gillespie, of the city of New York, of the other part, viz :

The said Roger C. Weightman, as president, hath agreed to sell to the said David Gillespie the right and privilege of a lottery, for the purpose of raising $13,333 33, clear of expenses, as authorized in and by the said act of the corporation of Washington, he conforming, in all respects, to the provisions and true intent and meaning of the said act; that the said David Gillespie shall not publish the scheme of the said lottery until the same shall be submitted to and approved by the said managers, or a majority of them, nor until he shall execute and deliver a bond to the said managers, with sufficient security, in the penal sum of $20,000, to be approved of by the said managers, or a majority of them, conditioned for the true and faithful discharge of his duty in selling the tickets, the payment of the prizes, and for conducting the said lottery fairly and honestly, according to the true intent and meaning of this agreement, and of the said law of the corporation of Washington; that the said David Gillespie is to be at the entire expense of the said lottery, and shall, before the commencement of the drawing thereof, pay to the president of the said board of managers the sum of $13,333 33, being the full consideration for the said lottery to the said managers; that the said managers, or a committee of them, or such other person or persons as they may appoint, shall have the privilege at all times of examining into the state of the said lottery, which shall be drawn in the City of Washington, in the presence of at least three of the said managers, and shall be concluded within one year from the commencement of the drawing, and the prizes paid within the time limited in the said act of the corporation; that the scheme of the said lottery shall not exceed, in the gross amount, the sum of $400,000.

And it is the understanding of the parties that the said David Gillespie shall have the refusal of the lotteries for raising the balance of the money authorized by the said act of the corporation of Washington, paying at the rate of $3,333 33 for every $100,000 of the gross amount.

In witness whereof, the said parties have hereto subscribed their names, the day and year first above written.

DAVID GILLESPIE,
R. C. WEIGHTMAN,
President.

BALANCES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The House proceeded to consider the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer certain balances of appropriations to the surplus fund; and the amendment reported thereto yesterday by the Committee of Ways and Means was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in the settlement of the accounts of the Navy Department for services or supplies accruing prior to the first day of July, eighteen hundred and seventeen, the expenditures shall be charged to arrearages; and that the unexpended balances of any appropriations made for the naval service prior to that time may be applied to the payment of such expenditures without regard to the particular object for which such appropriations were made.

Mr. MEIGS moved further to amend the bill by striking out these words: "Of the moneys appropriated for the payment of the interest, and redemption of the principal of the public debt, one million five hundred and ninety thousand seven hundred and forty-five dollars and seventy cents;" so as to exempt this sum from being carried to the surplus fund.

And, the question being taken so to amend, it was determined in the negative. And the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time tomorrow.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, January 29.

Mr. WENDOVER presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, remonstrating against a proclamation of the Supreme Director of the Republic of Chili, dated the 20th of August last, declaring in a state of rigorous blockade all the ports and anchorages of South America, from Iquiqui to Guayaquil inclusive, embracing a range of coast more extensive than the whole Atlantic frontier of the United States, and praying that the naval forces of the United States, in the Pacific ocean, may be so augmented as to afford efficient protection to the commerce of the United States in that sea; which memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RHEA reported a bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of John Crute.

Mr. WHITMAN, from the committee appointed on the 11th instant, reported a bill to continue in force an act, entitled "An act regulating the currency within the United States of the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain," passed on the 29th day of April, 1816, so far as the same relates to the crowns and five franc pieces of France; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 11th instant, respecting the inspectors, weighers, gaugers, and measurers, employed in the custom-houses of the United States within the last five years, and accompanied with a statement of the names of the persons employed as agents for building and supplying lighthouses, revenue cutters, and marine hospitals, for the last five years, with the moneys paid to each; which letter and statement were referred to the Committee of Commerce.

Mr. FLOYD submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

JANUARY, 1821.

Seamen—United States Navy.

H. OF R.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of War be required to inform this House how many factors, or trading-houses, are now established in the United States, and territories thereof; the date of the establishment of each; the points at which they are located; the number of persons attached to each; the number of troops, if any, and other military protection allowed to each; likewise a detailed statement of the business done at each house for ten years last past, showing the amount of goods sent to each station annually; the expense of transportation there; the amount sold, and the receipts at each house, distinguishing between cash and peltries, and the expense of transporting them to Washington City; the price at which peltries have been sold at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; the expense of keeping up each trading-house, distinguishing between the salary of the factors and their assistants; the contingencies and the military protection; with a list of the Indians civilized and converted to the Christian faith by the operation of the factory system, from its establishment in 1796, up to this day; together with a statement of the entire amount of money drawn from the Treasury on account of the factory system, from its commencement until this time.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire whether there be any tracts or parcels of land belonging to the United States, and now or heretofore used as sites for forts, garrisons, or camps, and which are no longer necessary for such purposes, and may be sold without injury to the public service.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Nathan Ford," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Nicholas Perkins;" "An act explanatory of an act for the relief of James Leander Cathcart," passed May the 15th, in the year 1820; and "An act for the relief of John Coffee," were severally read the second time, and referred, the first to the Committee on Private Land Claims, the second to the Committee of Claims, and the third to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to establish the district of Pearl river;" "An act for the relief of John Webster;" and "An act to regulate the entry of merchandise imported into the United States from any adjacent territory;" were severally read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill authorizing a machine to be built for hauling up ships; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

An engrossed bill, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer certain balances of appropriations to the surplus fund, was read the third time; and, being on its passage, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, it was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

An act for the relief of sundry persons in Baltimore (for the detention of the ships sunk during the late war for defence) was read a third time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Claims, on the ground that it proposed to go too far in allowing for the whole time the vessels remained sunk, instead of such a time as might have been necessary to raise and repair them.

On request of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the motion was so varied by Mr. WILLIAMS as to embrace a reference to a Committee of the Whole, instead of the Committee of Claims, and was then agreed to.

SEAMEN—UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were instructed, on the 11th instant, to inquire into the expediency of limiting by law the number of seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to be annually employed in the service of the United States, and also into the expediency of reducing the number now actually in service, made a report thereon; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. The report is as follows:

That, by an act of Congress, approved the third of March, 1801, a Naval Peace Establishment was fixed by law, providing the number of ships which should be kept in constant service, in time of peace, and that the residue should be laid up in ordinary, with a sailing-master, certain petty officers, seamen, and marines, attached to each vessel thus laid up; authorizing the President to officer and man the vessels to be retained in actual service, as he might direct, limiting him, however, to two-thirds of the then present complement of seamen and ordinary seamen, (by which the committee understand the two-thirds of the then full crews of the ships retained,) limiting the number of captains, lieutenants, and midshipmen, to be retained in the navy service in time of peace, and authorizing the President to discharge all the other officers in the navy service of the United States. That, by another act of Congress, approved April 21st, 1806, the President was authorized to keep in actual service, in time of peace, as many of the frigates and other armed vessels of the United States, as, in his judgment, the nature of the service might require, and to cause the residue to be laid up in ordinary in convenient ports; and the President was authorized to officer and man the public armed vessels in actual service in time of peace as he might direct; but the act just referred to limited the number of captains, masters, commandant, lieutenants, and midshipmen; it limited, too, the number of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to nine hundred and twenty-five, and authorized the President to appoint, for the vessels in actual service, as many officers of the grades therein mentioned as might, in his opinion, be necessary and proper. That, by another act, approved March third, 1807, the President was authorized, in addition to the then present Naval Peace Establishment, to employ a number of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, not exceeding five hundred, should the exigency of the public service require it. That, by another act, approved January 31st, 1809, it was provided that, in addition to the frigates then employed in actual service, there should be fitted out, officered, and manned, four other frigates by name; and that the President might equip, man, and employ, in actual service, as many of the public armed vessels, then laid up in ordinary, and gunboats, as, in his judgment, the public service might require; and, for the purpose of carrying the provisions of the said act into effect, the President was authorized, in addition to the number of petty officers, able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, then authorized by law, to appoint, and cause to be employed, three hundred midshipmen, three thousand six hundred able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to be engaged to serve for a period not exceeding two years, but subject to be sooner discharged. That, by another act, passed June 28th, 1809, the President was authorized, in the event of a favorable change in the foreign relations of the country, to cause to be discharged from actual service, and laid up in ordinary, such of the frigates and public armed vessels as, in his judgment, a due regard to the public security and interest would permit. That, by another act of Congress, passed March 30th, 1812, the President was authorized to cause to be immediately repaired, equipped, and put into actual service, three frigates by name; and it was provided, that the officers and seamen of the navy might be increased so far as was necessary to officer, man, and equip the vessels so to be put into service. That, by another act of Congress, passed January 2, 1813, it was provided, that the President should cause to be built, equipped, and employed, four ships, to rate not less than seventy-four guns, and six to rate forty-four guns each; and the number of commissioned and warrant officers, petty officers, able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to be employed on board each of the said ships of seventy-four guns, was fixed by the act; the crew, so far as it consisted of seamen and boys, was limited to two hundred able seamen, and three hundred ordinary seamen and boys. That, by another act, passed March 3d, 1813, the President was authorized to have built, manned, equipped, and commissioned, for service, six sloops of war, and, also, to have built or procured, as many sloops, to be employed on the lakes, as the public service might require; and, by the second section of the last mentioned act, the President was authorized to appoint such officers, and to employ such number of seamen, as might be necessary for such vessels as were authorized by law to be put in commission, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The committee have thought it proper to give to the House a brief view of the progress of legislation in relation to this subject, and they believe the foregoing sketch substantially to present it. Upon a reference to the various acts of Congress before referred to, it will be found that, both in the years 1801 and 1806, there was a Naval Peace Establishment fixed by law, limiting not only the number of seamen and boys, but of officers also. It will be found, too, as your committee believe, by reference to dates compared with the history of the country, and indeed to the language of some of the acts of Congress themselves, that the subsequent provisions, in relation to the Naval Establishment of the United States, had reference directly to what either then was or probably soon would be, the relation of the country to foreign Governments; in short, that they looked directly to a state either of actual or probable war.

Your committee understand the resolution referred to them to relate to the number of seamen and boys necessary to be employed in time of peace, and whether that shall be fixed by law. In the present state of things the only limitation upon the number of seamen is to be found in the appropriation bill, which, in effect, annually limits the number to be employed by the amount of the appropriation annually made for that object. Your committee believe, that the proper office of the appropriation bill, is, as far as practicable, to provide means for objects authorized by existing laws; there are indeed, cases which, on account of the contingent or uncertain character of the expenditure, constitute exceptions to this rule; but, in general, the rule is considered as a sound one.

Your committee would further remark that, in investigating this subject, they have extended their inquiries beyond the mere scope of the resolution, into the propriety of fixing a Naval Peace Establishment, embracing as well the number of officers as ships to be kept in the service of the United States in time of peace; and they beg leave shortly to submit some of their reasons for thinking that there should be a Peace Establishment in the Navy as well as the Army. Although, by the Constitution of the United States, the President is commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy, yet it belongs to Congress to "raise and support" the one, and "to provide and maintain" the other; the power to provide and maintain implies that of determining the quantum; a question, the decision of which ought not to be left, in the opinion of your committee, to the Executive Department, and yet, in practice, it is in effect left to Executive decision; for, as has been before remarked, there being no permanent law in force limiting the number of officers, ships, or men, to be kept in service, the only limitation is in the amount of appropriation; and your committee believe that in practice the amount of the estimates has generally been appropriated, without any discussion in Congress as to the necessity of them. Whatever confidence we may have in the Executive, it seems not to be right, in principle, to leave to its discretion, in effect, the decision of a question which belongs to the Legislature.

Your committee believe that in Great Britain, though the number of seamen is not fixed by a permanent law, yet it is settled by the annual vote of Parliament. If there were probable danger of war, or difficulty in our foreign relations, it might not be expedient to fix the number of seamen by a permanent law, but, in the present circumstances of the country, it seems to your committee it may be done. It will be remembered it is a Peace Establishment which is contemplated; when war shall come, or even upon its probable approach, both the Army and Navy will doubtless be placed upon a footing suited to the then altered state of the country.

Your committee would further remark, that an additional reason with them for inclining to a Peace Establishment is to fix the number of officers who, they believe, in many grades, are too numerous, and yet for all whom, unless their number shall be reduced by law, an appropriation must be made.

Your committee are aware that this is a difficult and delicate subject; the officers of the Navy in the recent war not only distinguished themselves, but, by breaking the charm of invincibility belonging to the British Navy, contributed much both to our glory and our solid strength as a nation. The committee are also aware that many of them have devoted some of their best years to their profession; yet, if the interest of the country requires a reduction, painful as the duty is, it is one which ought to be performed. In relation to the number of ships to be retained in service, the reasons which would prove the propriety of fixing the number of seamen, would apply with full force to them; indeed, it is another state of the same question, in substance, since, if the number of seamen be fixed, no more vessels will be employed than they can man; and the fixing a certain maximum of seamen is considered a more judicious course than to fix the number of ships, inasmuch as the President will then be left at liberty to use such classes of vessels as may, in his opinion, be best adapted to the nature of the service; the aggregate of the guns, however, being limited by the number of men allowed to man them.

Your committee have said, that they consider the officers of many of the grades as too numerous; they will now proceed to state the grounds of their opinion. They have not for a moment entertained the idea of paring down the officers of the Navy to any thing like a mere sufficiency to officer the ships to be actually retained in service in time of peace; it is obviously impossible, upon this subject, to select any given number, and show that it is precisely the right one; some reasonable rule must be adopted.

Your committee have acted upon the principle that, whilst, on the one hand, the mere number of officers necessary for the vessels in actual service is not sufficient, with a view to the future progress and prosperity of the Navy, on the other, it would be entirely out of the question to employ, in time of peace, as many as would officer our whole Navy, built and to be built, in time of war. They have, therefore, selected what they consider a medium between these extremes; it appears, by the Naval Register of 1821, that the total number of guns of our ships, which are built, equipped, and launched, (which description includes the three line-of-battle ships Ohio, North Carolina, and Delaware, which are believed not to be equipped,) amounts to seven hundred and ninety-seven, of all classes of vessels, gunboats included.

Your committee have thought that, if we retained in service in time of peace a sufficient number of commissioned and warrant officers to officer all those upon the War Establishment, it would afford a liberal Peace Establishment. Bringing the number of officers to this standard, the committee find that there are various ranks in which the present number considerably exceeds that which would be required by the rule just stated; they will descend to particulars in a few grades, in which the excess is relatively most considerable; thus, upon this scale, there is an excess of fifteen post captains; of twenty masters commandant; of seventy lieutenants; of twenty-seven surgeons; of more than forty sailing-masters. There are, perhaps, two or three grades in which an allowance of a few more than even this scale would produce, might be judicious; amongst them, probably, might be placed the midshipmen, who may be considered as constituting the nursery of the future commanders of our ships; this, however, would only vary the result in an inconsiderable degree. The committee forbear to go into further detail upon this subject, because, if the House should adopt the principle, the detail could be presented in a bill.

As to the seamen, if it should be decided to fix the number by law, the resolution then directs the committee to inquire into the expediency of reducing the number now in actual service. Upon this subject the committee would remark, that it will be seen, by advert- ing to a letter from the Navy Department, under date of the 11th December, 1820, amongst the printed documents, that the whole force of the vessels of war in the actual service of the United States amounts to about three hundred and thirty-five guns, distributed as is mentioned in the same letter. Your committee incline to the opinion, that the following diminution of that force may be made without injury to the public service, viz: instead of corvettes and a sloop on the coast of Africa, whose object is the suppression of piracy and the slave trade, three of the schooners authorized by the act of the last session would be sufficient, making a deduction of 34 guns; instead of a 36 gun frigate in the Indian Seas, the corvette Cyane of 28 would be sufficient, making a deduction of eight. If to these deductions be added the force of the Macedonian and Ontario, of which the one is returning after being replaced by the Constellation, and the other is proceeding to take the place of the Peacock, amounting together to 54 guns, the whole force which would remain after these deductions from that now in service, would be 239 guns; but suppose an additional number of 36 guns to be included for any contingent service, such, for example, as the replacing of a vessel returning from a cruise, then the whole force which, according to the views before presented, would be necessary, would be 275 guns: to man this force upon a War Establishment, if the committee have not erred in calculation, would require 856 able seamen, 802 ordinary seamen, and 195 boys; to this add, according to a document of the last session, for the ships in ordinary, navy yards, and navy stations, 287 able seamen, 314 ordinary seamen, and 67 boys; and the aggregate is of able seamen 1,143, of ordinary seamen 1,116, and of boys 262; total of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, 2,521. The estimate from the Navy Department for the service of the year 1821, embraces 1,332 able seamen, 1,307 ordinary seamen, and 293 boys; making an aggregate of 2,932; from which it would seem that, if the force suggested by the committee be retained in service, there might be a reduction of about 411, viz: 187 able seamen, 191 ordinary seamen, and 31 boys.

Upon the whole view of the subject, the committee beg leave to recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That a Naval Peace Establishment ought to be fixed by law.

MISSOURI.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the resolution from the Senate, for admitting Missouri into the Union, with a caveat against the provision, if there be any, which conflicts with the Constitution of the United States, was taken up.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out the proviso (or caveat) from the resolution, but waived his motion for the present, to accommodate Mr. CLAY, who wished to address the Committee on the whole subject.

Mr. CLAY then delivered his sentiments at large on the present state of this question. He was in favor of the resolution from the Senate, and should vote for the resolution, even though more emphatically restricted against any supposed repugnance of one of its provisions to a provision of the Constitution of the United States, the existence of which however, he did not by any means admit.

When Mr. CLAY had concluded—

Mr. RANDOLPH renewed his motion to strike out the proviso, and spoke for about fifteen minutes in support of it.

Mr. LOWNDES deprecated the motion, as going to present to the House the naked question which it had already decided in the negative, and as preventing a decision upon the proposition as it now stands.

Mr. BARBOUR assigned the reasons why he should vote against the motion; himself regarding the proviso as useless and unnecessary, but willing to retain it to gratify gentlemen who were of a different opinion.

Mr. SERGEANT inquired whether it would be in order, this proviso being stricken out, to move to introduce a different one.

The CHAIRMAN decided that it would.

The question was then taken on striking out the proviso, and decided in the negative, 82 to 54. So the proviso was retained.

Mr. STEVENS assigned the reasons why he should vote against the resolution.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend the resolution by adding to it another proviso, that it be taken as a fundamental condition on which said State is admitted into the Union, that so much of the constitution as requires the Legislature to pass laws to prevent the migration of the free people of color thither, shall be expunged from the constitution of the State within two years from this time, in the mode prescribed for amending the constitution. [This would admit Missouri into the Union forthwith, on the condition stated.]

Mr. FOOT observed, that he could not consent that the question be taken on this resolution, with a certain prospect of its rejection, without making one effort for an amicable settlement of this distracting question. I have, therefore, said he, risen for the purpose of offering an amendment to the resolution—not with the vain hope that this particular amendment will be adopted, but with a sincere desire (if I know my own heart) to afford to gentlemen an opportunity of proposing such modifications of the amendment as will unite the votes of a majority of this Committee, who appear to be desirous of admitting Missouri into the Union upon terms which will not compromise principle.

It is due from me, and the Committee will expect, a candid and plain statement of my views of the effect which will be produced by its adoption. The majority of this House have already decided that the constitution of Missouri does not contain a provision which, in their opinion, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. It has not been proposed by any gentleman to revive the question of restriction, so much agitated at the last session; and it may be presumed no such intention exists. This amendment proposes the admission of Missouri into the Union upon a certain conditions. The act for the admission of Louisiana into the Union, furnishes a precedent for the course now proposed. The condition proposes that Missouri shall expunge the offensive article from her constitution, in the manner provided by her constitution for its amendment, and give sufficient time for the amendment, without the trouble and expense of calling a convention for the purpose.

Mr. BALDWIN having expressed his intention to vote for this proposition—

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the amendment by adding words to this effect: "so far as the same (the clause of the Missouri constitution) tends to 'deprive citizens of each State of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.'" This motion, however, he subsequently withdrew.

It being suggested, that other gentlemen had amendments which they wished to propose, and that it would be well to have them all presented to-day, so as to be examined and compared—

Mr. SERGEANT rose, as it might be supposed, from the question he had put, that he had an amendment to offer, to say that he had not; that he should vote for every amendment which should bring the resolution nearer to what he wished, but with a clear determination, for which he would hereafter assign his reasons, to vote against the resolution, however amended.

Soon after this, the Committee rose, without coming to any decision; and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 30.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to authorize the collectors of the customs to pay debentures issued on the exportation of loaf sugar, and spirits distilled from molasses; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was recommitted the bill reported on the 6th of May last, to repeal, in part, "An act to authorize the President and Managers of the Washington Turnpike Road Company of the State of Maryland to extend and make their turnpike road to, or from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, through the said District to the line thereof;" made a report thereon, recommending that the said bill be rejected, which report was read.

Whereupon, the question was taken, Shall the said bill be engrossed, and read a third time? and determined in the negative. And so the bill was rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred, on the 4th instant, the petition of the Mayor and Aldermen of the city of Mobile, reported a bill granting certain lots to the said Mayor and Aldermen; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to designate a place for a port of entry in the district of Miami, Michigan Territory; which was twice read.

Mr. SLOAN moved to refer the bill to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow; which being rejected, it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, made a detailed report upon the subject of the appropriations and expenditures upon the said buildings during the last year, accompanied with a bill making further appropriations for the same; which bill was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit; "An act for the relief of the representatives of Patience Gordon, widow, deceased;" an act supplementary to an act passed the 11th of May, 1820, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, the House proceeded to consider the resolution, yesterday submitted by him, calling for certain information in regard to the Indian Trading Establishments, &c.

After some remarks from Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, and Mr. SOUTHARD, in opposition to this resolution, on the ground that some of the information would be impracticable to obtain, and that, of what was practicable, the material part was already before the House; and some observations from Mr. FLOYD, sustaining his motion, on the ground of the necessity of full and accurate information to correct legislation on the subject of our relations with the Indian tribes—

The question was taken on agreeing to the resolution of Mr. FLOYD, and decided in the negative—63 votes to 55.

On motion of Mr. SLOAN, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the Connecticut reserve, in the State of Ohio, so much of the lands belonging to the United States in said State, for the use of schools, as may, with the grants heretofore made, be equal to that allowed to other parts of said State.

Mr. HERRICK submitted for consideration the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be reported to this House, whether any, and, if any, what, progress has been made by the commissioners appointed under the act of last session, for the purpose of surveying, marking, and locating a road from Wheeling, in Virginia, to the left bank of the Mississippi river, through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of the representatives of Patience Gordon, widow, deceased;" and "An act supplementary to an act passed on the 11th of May, 1820, entitled 'An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes;'" were severally read the first time.

The bill for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslonde; the bill for the relief of William T. Nimmo; the bill for the relief of Denis P. De La Ronde, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Comptroller of the Treasury, in obedience to the resolution instructing him to report whether, in the statement of balances which have been due more than three years, which accompanied his letter of the 27th of November last, there have been made the discriminations and suggestions required by the fourteenth section of the act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts; which report was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the funds applicable to the payment of the stock created by the act for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, passed the 31st March, 1814; which letter and statement were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MISSOURI.

The House having then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the resolution from the Senate, for the admission of Missouri into the Union, was resumed—the motion of Mr. Foor being under consideration; which motion is to strike out the proviso to the Senate's resolution, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Provided, That it shall be taken as a fundamental condition, upon which the said State is incorporated in the Union, that so much of the 26th section of the 3d article of the constitution which has been submitted to Congress, as declares it shall be the duty of the General Assembly "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, or settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever," shall be expunged, within two years from the passage of this resolution, by the General Assembly of Missouri, in the manner prescribed for amending said constitution.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, spoke as follows:

I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. B., to revive the discussion of the question of restriction, as it has been called, which was very elaborately argued and determined at the last session, nor for the purpose of provoking further debate upon the several questions, relative to the admission of Missouri into the Union, which have been thoroughly investigated during the present session. I am aware, sir, that the patience of the House, and I fear the patience of the people we represent, is much fatigued, if not exhausted, by the numerous editions of the same arguments which have been delivered upon the subject now under consideration. But, sir, as the subject comes from the Senate in a new shape, and as I seldom trouble the House on any occasion, I shall be permitted briefly to assign the reasons which will govern my vote on this question before the Committee.

Sir, the resolution under consideration, if possible, is more exceptionable than that which was reported by a committee of the House, and rejected. Those who doubted whether any provision in the constitution of Missouri contravened the Federal Constitution, might support the former resolution, but cannot, I apprehend, agree to the resolution from the Senate now before the Committee; because it admits and avoids the very point or matter in controversy. Sir, if you pass this resolution, you proclaim to the world a disregard of the sacred obligations imposed by the Constitution of your country. The language of the resolution implies your right to examine and judge of the constitution of Missouri, and, also, that it is, or at least may be, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and waives the solemn obligation of supporting that sacred instrument.

Sir, if we must receive Missouri into the Union, under her present form of government, I hope we shall not, by the admission, convict ourselves of a breach of the Constitution, and fix the mark of the beast upon our foreheads. The guilt of sinning against the Constitution of our country is not concealed by the magical proviso in the resolution, nor does it obviate in any degree the objection, or remedy the evil of which you complain. By this mode of procedure, if the constitution of Missouri had been throughout repugnant to the Constitution of the Union, or, as the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. STEVENS) said, a perfect monarchy, you might admit Missouri into the Union, protesting against the form of her government, or so much as might be supposed anti-republican in its features. Sir, I protest against this mode of legislating, by exclusions of conclusions, as it has been called by some learned doctors in politics, whereby the rights of citizens may be sacrificed, and the Constitution of the Union suspended.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) said, admitting the clause of the constitution of Missouri, respecting free negroes and mulattoes, to be incompatible with the Constitution of the United States, it could not be an objection to her admission into the Union; because the legislators of Missouri would be bound by an oath to support the Federal Constitution, which would be paramount to the oath to support their State constitution, and of course would never make any enactment pursuant to that clause. Besides, he said, if they did enact any law in pursuance of that clause in their constitution, it would be declared void by the courts of the United States. But, sir, though I admired the eloquence, the candor, and love of country, which that honorable gentleman exhibited in this discussion, I was not convinced by his argument.

The members of this House, as well as the legislators of Missouri, are under a sacred obligation to support the Constitution of the United States; and the act of Congress authorizing Missouri to form a constitution provides, in order to her admission into the Union, that her constitution shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. But, without this provision in the act, it is as much the duty of Congress to examine her form of government, and determine whether it is compatible with the Constitution of the Federal Government, as it is to consider the same question on the passage of any law. Congress is the proper tribunal to decide this question, and cannot absolve itself from this sacred obligation by leaving it to the courts of the United States. But, if it were in our power, I would not turn this question over to the Judiciary sooner than I would pass a law without inquiring whether it was within the Constitutional powers of Congress, and trust wholly to the courts. Sir, would you admit a new State under a constitution giving its legislature power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to raise armies and declare war, and trust to the judicial authority of the United States to vacate the laws which might grow out of such powers, and to keep the administration of such State government within the pale of your Federal Constitution?

If the judiciary could remedy all the evils which may grow out of the constitution of Missouri, I am not disposed to neglect my duty, and disregard the rights which are guaranteed even to the black man. The rights of the colored citizens, and it has been demonstrated by my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. EUSTIS) that there are many such in the Northern States, are as sacred as those of the white citizens.

The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) said, that a limitation or restriction upon the power of the Legislature of Missouri might be imposed, by adding to the resolution under consideration a provision, that no law should be enacted under the clause in question, to affect the rights of citizens of other States. But, sir, that gentleman must be aware that such a provision, though it be made a fundamental consideration of the admission, can have no force or effect against her will. No act of Congress can qualify or make void any article of her constitution after or at the time of her admission. Such a provision is no more than a naked proposition, which Missouri will be at liberty to accept or reject, and without her assent would be inoperative and futile.

Sir, though I am sincerely desirous to terminate the discussion, and settle the question at the present session, I cannot adopt such a provision, and trust to Missouri to expunge the offensive clause in her constitution.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) said he was in favor of the proviso of the resolution from the Senate, though it was not only unnecessary but unmeaning. He was willing, if I understood him, to encumber the resolve of admission with as much surplusage, as gentlemen could hang upon it, if it would afford any relief to any scrupulous mind.

Sir, I cannot doubt that the clause in the constitution of Missouri, which requires the Legislature to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from going to and settling in that State, is wholly incompatible with the Constitution of the United States, which gives the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, notwithstanding the construction given to that article by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY.) Had not that honorable gentleman represented this article in the Constitution of the United States as equivocal and uncertain, I should have supposed it beyond the art of logic or subtlety of metaphysics to mislead any one who read it, or to pervert its very obvious signification.

Sir, I consider this article one of the most important provisions in the Federal Constitution, and believe that no principle could be adopted by any of the State governments, which would more certainly defeat the great objects of the Confederation than that to which I have referred in the constitution of Missouri. The right, which every citizen of every State has of emigrating to and becoming a citizen of another State, is the bond of social intercourse and harmony among the several States. Without this privilege, each State would become a distinct nation of people, of peculiar habits, of separate interests, and singular character. Not only the laws, but the passions of the people of each State would soon be in martial array against one another. Without this right, of what avail is the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States and with the Indian tribes? In short, sir, without this right, trivial as it may seem to some gentlemen, how long would this boundless empire exist as a republic?

I will not trespass longer on the patience of the Committee, because I most ardently wish that we may speedily terminate the present discussion.

As I prefer the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, to the resolution in its present form, I shall vote for it, reserving the privilege of voting against the resolution finally, if it should be thus amended. But, sir, if none of the amendments which have been suggested should succeed, I shall offer, if I have an opportunity, an amendment, which I hold in my hand, to come in after the word "that," following the enacting clause in the resolution, by striking out the residue of the resolution, and is in these words, viz:

"Whereas so much of the constitution formed by the people of Missouri, by virtue of an act of Congress passed March, 1820, as requires the Legislature thereof to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in this State, under any pretext whatever, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, the people of Missouri be, and they hereby are, authorized to form a new constitution, or to alter the constitution which they have already formed, in such way and manner as they shall judge most proper, and submit the same to Congress, for their consideration, for the purpose of being admitted into the Union."

I am willing, sir, to admit Missouri into the Union when her constitution shall be conformed to the Constitution of the United States, and I cannot perceive any serious inconvenience which can arise to her by a delay until another session of Congress. It is the fault of the people of Missouri that their constitution was not made in conformity to the Constitution of the United States, and I shall, without any fear of the consequences which the gentleman from Kentucky seems to apprehend, vote against any proposition for the admission of that Territory as a member of the Union at the present session.

Some conversation passed between Mr. LOWDES and Mr. FOOR, as to the mode of proceeding.

Mr. FOOR*observed he was very glad the gentleman from South Carolina had disclaimed any intention of applying his remarks to him. He appealed to that gentleman, or any member of this House, to point out a single instance in which any proposition made by him was designed or calculated, either to embarrass any subject or involve the House in difficulty, as suggested by the gentleman. He had uniformly opposed any attempt to effect an object by indirect legislation or by stratagem. He considered that the correct course in legislation was to meet every subject in an open, fair, and direct way, and he would never shrink from responsibility; and assured the gentleman his object in proposing the amendment to the resolution, in preference to making it a distinct proposition, was, that he considered this the most regular course which could be adopted, and, in his opinion, most likely to effect the object which seemed to be wished by a great majority of the House.

With these impressions he could not consent to withdraw the proposed amendment, nor for a moment abandon the hope that on this, as a basis, the propositions of gentlemen might, by affording an opportunity for a free interchange of opinions, eventuate in the adoption of some amendment to the resolution by a large majority of this House, by which Missouri might, during the present session, be admitted into the Union; and, as the difference between the two sides of the question seemed not insurmountable, since gentlemen had distinctly disclaimed any intention to revive the question of restriction, he could not but cherish the hope that confidence and harmony would soon be restored in the national councils and through the Union.

Mr. STORRS, after a few introductory remarks, moved an amendment to Mr. FOOR's amendment, which was, to strike out all of the latter, after the word "Union," in the third line, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

And to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State impairing or contravening the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured to citizens of other States, by the Constitution of the United States: And provided, further, That the Legislature acting under the constitution already adopted in Missouri as a State, shall, as a convention, (for which purpose the consent of Congress is hereby granted,) declare their assent by a public act to the said condition before the next session of Congress, and transmit to Congress an attested copy of such act, by the first day of the said session.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, he rose for the purpose of protesting against these proceedings, and opposing his voice to the assumption of enormous powers by this House; powers so great that the oldest statesmen, a few little years ago, would have trembled to assert. You have made deep inroads into the Constitution, and if you now assume the power to legislate over a new State, I know not how soon you will exercise it over others; and I, as a Representative from an old State, can never consent to such usurpations.

I know there is a North and South side to this question; but gentlemen are mistaken if they imagine our anxiety to admit Missouri so great, that we are willing to trample all the rights of the States under foot to effectuate that object. Have not members from the North as much interest in admitting Missouri as we have? Have they not as much to hope from the continuance of this Union as we have? And ought they not to be as solicitous on all these points as ourselves? I have seen, with infinite pain, the different attitudes in which gentlemen have placed this subject, who seem not to believe that any limitations exist upon the powers of this National Government, as it is called, and no pause is seen in their exertions to give it the power of such, and law, history, and England, continually recurred to for confirmation. I wish it were possible for gentlemen of the present day to expunge from their memory the progress of European liberty and institutions, and take our own, unconnected as we find them. Then we would find a number of States, or separate, independent, and distinct nations, confederated for common safety and mutual protection, taught wisdom by the eternal feuds of Spain, England, France, and Germany, now consolidated into large empires. These States, before the Confederation, could make war or peace, raise armies, or build a navy; coin money, pass bankrupt laws, naturalize foreigners, or regulate commerce. Why can they not do it now? Informed by Europe, they knew jealousies would arise, and constant strife render armies in every nation necessary to their defence, which would endanger their liberties at home.

These States, then, in their sovereign and independent characters, were willing to enter into a compact, by which the power of making war and peace, and regulating commerce, possessed alike by all, should be transferred to a Congress of the States, to be exercised with uniformity, for their mutual benefit; thus avoiding the evils of superannuated and enslaved Europe. These two were the only powers ever intended to be granted by the States. All other powers conferred by the compact are necessary to carry these two into execution. But could it ever have been imagined by these independent nations, that they were granting any power but that which was necessary to act upon foreigners—in war, to defend the whole—in peace, to regulate the commerce of the whole?

The States have been satisfied that while they enjoyed the proud feeling of managing their own affairs in their own nation, by means of their assemblies, which ought to be the highest and most honorable stations known in this country, their agents here were superintending the military defences of them all, and regulating their commerce. Little could they have imagined that their agents would have erected this Congress of the States into a great National Government, and exercise, exclusively, all the power granted by the compact, but, also, by construction, exercise all that which was reserved to the States, and now even attempt to expunge a clause from their constitution.

The voice of the States has been raised against this assumption of power, and this abuse of the trust reposed in Congress, by the passage of a sedition act, and a bank. They have been told that "the subject would admit of a doubt." The next effort has been to construct roads and canals, and boldly plunge into the heart of the States. Complaint was answered by, "the subject would admit of a doubt." Then, if discontents manifest themselves, we are told that things called Kings or Emperors, beyond seas, (where some of our citizens are very fond of going, and always come back worse than they go, save that they learn all about etiquette,) will believe Republics cannot last long, or that men cannot govern themselves; and this is reason for submission.

The States have borne all these wrongs, and are not content. The great political necromancers abroad are persuading them that the power of this body is competent to prescribe conditions even to a State, and that she ought not to be permitted to admit such persons as she might choose should be taken into her territory, "let the consequences be what they may." Now, indeed, it is asserted that she does not possess the power to prohibit the entry of any who choose to go there. I must frankly own, sir, with this view of the subject, I am at a great loss to know what has become of the States. They once existed; they once had rights. Now, indeed, they have Legislatures, which, if this doctrine continue without the bayonet, will leave us the idea of something visible, but not tangible, and even that, I presume, will, in a short time, like the white lady of Avenel, vanish into moonshine.

Having prescribed conditions at the last session, says one gentleman, upon which Missouri should come into this Union, have we not, therefore, the power of looking into her constitution? This terrific power is derived, says he, from the simple expression in the Constitution of the United States which says, "New States may be admitted by Congress into this Union." The same gentleman has said, if we send Missouri back to form another constitution, when she comes here again she will have more respect for us. This will admit of no reply. That gentleman, as well as one from New York, thought the offensive clause in the constitution of Missouri would be abrogated by the Constitution of the United States, which was paramount; yet the one thought we ought to act upon it, because we had it before us; the other, to relieve the judges from an odious duty.

Sir, this is both kind and generous; but, for my own part, I have seen so many odious things since I have been in Congress that I am well inclined to permit the judges their share of this.

That gentleman asked, who it was but the poor, the friendless, and the ignorant, that suffered by this injustice and oppression? And why is it that men have been immortalized for opposing governments, but because they took upon themselves the burden of defending these miserable beings, too ignorant to do themselves justice? I had thought, sir, the champions of liberty, who have been venerated for their deeds, were those who established or affirmed the great principles of liberty, without reference to an individual. In this instance, however, I think it seems like going into a foreign land, and I am inclined to believe it is a good maxim to let every people pursue their own happiness in their own way. If we have power to admit a State, (for surely we can admit none else,) we may reject an application for admission. What then is the fact? That a State applied for admission into this Union, and was rejected. Is she not then a foreign State; or, at all events, a State not in this Union?

In vain, sir, is it to feel for the Constitution of the United States, when gentlemen, even in their arguments, admit it to be paramount to all State laws and constitutions. Has it not already destroyed some of the clauses in different constitutions of the States—North Carolina and Virginia, for example, which existed long before this was formed? And may it not do the same for Missouri? I, sir, will vote for any thing declaratory of the powers of Congress, which gentlemen's tender consciences may suggest; but, voting for expunging a clause in the constitution of a State, I will not agree. This would, in my opinion, be overthrowing, at one blow, the settled principles of this country, and I hope there is not yet a gentleman who would seek immortality by that road. Would any attempt to cause a State to allow greater privileges to their free negroes and mulattoes than the same States allow their own? By what rule is it a free negro of New York has more rights in Missouri than the native free negro of Missouri has, or that the same negro has even in New York? Do gentlemen think Missouri will tamely submit to be the subject of legislation, and have an article of her constitution expunged by Congress? If she will, I have mistaken the stuff of which she is composed, and, when convinced of that fact, I would think her unworthy of a place in this Union, and would adopt the opinion of some gentlemen in this House, that this republic ought not to extend beyond the Mississippi.

Who is there that ever believed negroes and mulattoes were ever parties to the compact? Who is there that believes they ever had any rights but such as the indulgence of the States permitted? Could not the States now seize their persons, and make them slaves? None will doubt. But, says one gentleman, they could buy land, and ought they not to be permitted to live upon it? Could not an Indian, or even a slave, buy land, and will not the same argument apply? I cannot believe, for a moment, that any reliance is placed upon such arguments as these. If gentlemen choose this course to free the judiciary from so odious a task, or because it is convenient being now before us, let me say, that it is usurping the powers of the judiciary, and overthrowing whole States.

I hear of immortality. There is a strange something in that word, which operates alike on all, from the plain Quaker to the proud laurel planted upon the rock of St. Helena. What is immortality? A word, a sound—it is no more! Who now enjoys Cæsar's fame and immortality? Is it Cæsar or the scavenger of Rome? Sir, it is anybody's, 'tis nobody's—'tis your's, 'tis mine, 'tis every one's—it is but a word.

But, sir, is there not another kind of immortality, or, as I would think, word, in the world? Catiline! I do not say this to alarm the feelings of any one here. I hope there are none such; but, should ills and evils come upon this country, when they could be so easily avoided, I know not what qualifying term the future historian of this country will give to that word. Let us not be deceived. There is great danger in any measure which might, even by possibility, overthrow the peace of a community. Let us be solicitous to enjoy the distinguished respect of those about us, whilst alive, for the dead are all equally provided with plenty of immortality.

We are told it is proper to reject the applications of this State; and, if other steps are to be taken, it is time enough afterwards to consider them. This is the proper period to determine what should be done. Will you have another republic west of the Mississippi, or will you compel Missouri to return to her territorial condition? The one course is calculated to embody ideas of evils not less great, though more gradual in their approach; the other, all the horrors of revolution. Tell us, then, the course to be pursued. Surely, no gentleman is willing to take a step without distinctly seeing the consequences which are to flow from it, and be ready to meet them. Can the mind of any man picture to itself a community of Americans, born to liberty, with the rich inheritance and blessings of this Constitution, with an organized government, and arms in their hands, brought so low as to crouch to the injustice of a body possessing no power but to "admit them into this Union." Reject them if you will—let them remain a foreign Power, as they would be, if rejected. And let those who opposed the purchase of Louisiana now reflect, and draw consolation from the reflection, if they can, that their persevering hostility has at length divided this Union. Sir, I, for one, must deprecate the consequences; but it is time we know the worst; and no time better than the present. If the doctrine held by a member last session, that "the Constitution of the United States did not sanction slavery, but only forebore to meddle with it," is the ultimate end of these proceedings, we cannot too soon know it. Though I have great doubt whether all the enjoyment of pomp and place, in this imperial city, could compensate for the gnawing recollections that it had produced the ruin of the country—this is immortality!

Mr. COBB assigned the reasons why he could vote for neither of the amendments.

Mr. ROSS stated the reasons of his opposition to the resolution from the Senate in any shape it was likely to assume.

Mr. HARDIN, in an earnest desire to see the question settled, was willing to agree to both the amendments.

Mr. RHEA, after making some remarks, moved the Committee should rise, with a view to demanding the previous question, which would preclude all debate and amendment, and present to the House a naked and direct question on the resolution from the Senate.

Mr. CLAY earnestly opposed this course, as going to close the door on the spirit of accommodation.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

JANUARY, 1821.

The motion for the Committee to rise was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. CLAY, then, after an earnest appeal to all parts of the House to bring to the future discussion of this subject minds prepared to harmonize, and forever settle this distracting question to mutual satisfaction, and expressing his desire more fully to examine Mr. STORRS's proposition, to see whether he could bring his mind to assent to it, as he wished to do, moved that the Committee now rise, in order to have the several propositions for amendment printed.

This motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY then gave notice he should again call up the subject to-morrow.

Mr. LOWNDES wished it deferred until Friday next, to give more time.

Mr. CLAY said he would compromise with his friend for Thursday. He did not like the idea of taking up this question on Friday.

Mr. COBB said that he proposed, at a future day, to offer the following amendment, which he now read, to follow the word "Union:"

"That the Legislature of the State of Missouri shall pass no law impairing the privileges and immunities secured to the citizens of each State, under the first clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States."

This amendment was ordered to be printed, as well as the others.

WEDNESDAY, January 31.

Mr. MACLAY, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Guthry, deceased; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Solomon Prevost, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, also made a report on the petition of Noel Destrehan, legal representative of Edward McCarty, deceased, accompanied with a bill for the relief of the heirs of the said McCarty; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

Mr. WILLIAMS also reported a bill explanatory of an act, entitled "An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and Richard O'Brien, late American Consul at Algiers;" which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill from the Senate for the relief of Robert Purdy.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of Jesse Powell, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRACY laid upon the table a paper in the shape of a bill "providing for the indemnity of certain citizens of the United States for losses sustained by the destruction or loss of property during the late wars with Great Britain and with the Seminole Indians;" and, on his motion, it was ordered to be printed, with a view hereafter to call for its consideration.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of the Treasury submitting copies of the instructions given to the commissioners appointed under the act of the 15th of May, 1820, authorizing the location of a road from Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, to a point on the left bank of the Mississippi river, between St. Louis and the mouth of the Illinois river, and copies of the report made by the said commissioners to the Treasury Department, of the progress they have made in the execution of the duties prescribed by the said act, together with maps of the country through which the location is to be made.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1821.

The Message was read, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. Whereupon, Mr. HERRICK withdrew the resolution submitted by him yesterday.

Mr. S. MOORE submitted the following, which he wished to propose as an amendment to the resolution respecting Missouri:

"Strike out the proviso attached to the resolution from the Senate, and in lieu thereof insert the following, viz:

"Provided, That the following conditions, be taken as fundamental conditions and terms upon which the said State is incorporated into the Union, viz: That the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution, submitted by the people of Missouri to the consideration of Congress, shall, as soon as the provisions of said constitution will admit, be expunged, or so amended that it shall not be applicable to citizens of any State in this Union. And that, until so expunged or amended, no law, passed in conformity thereto, shall be construed to extend to any citizen of either State in this Union.

This amendment was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. FISHER, the Committee on the Judiciary were directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing by law the executors of John B. Mebane, late a deputy collector of internal duties and direct taxes in North Carolina, to collect whatever arrearages may yet be due him from individuals, and for which he has accounted with the principal collector.

The House proceeded to consider the bill confirming the location of the seat of government of the State of Illinois, and for other purposes. Whereupon, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Baltimore, were discharged, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Eli Hart.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of the representatives of Patience Gordon, widow, deceased;" and "An act supplementary to an act passed on the 11th May, 1820, entitled 'An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes,'" were severally read the second time, and referred, the first to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, and the second to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COLUMBIAN COLLEGE.

The House, on motion of Mr. MERCER, proceeded to the consideration of the bill to incorporate the Columbian College, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STORRS stated a number of objections which he had to the bill, as it now stood, and particularly dwelt on its having originated with a religious society, and that clause of it which proposes to give to this corporation a general capacity to hold lands, from which might be inferred a capacity to hold them in any State in the Union; concluding by suggesting certain alterations which he proposed to make in the constitution of the College, should the bill pass, though opposed himself to the passage of the bill in any shape. Mr. S. moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions:

1st. To reduce the number of trustees for the said institution to twenty-one.

2d. That the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, Navy, and State Departments, the Attorney General of the United States, and the Judges of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the time being, shall be respectively ex officio trustees of the said institution.

3d. The vacancies in the said Board of Trustees shall be filled by the same body.

4th. That a visitatorial power over the said institution shall be vested in a joint committee, to be appointed by the Senate and House of Representatives.

5th. To fill up the Board of Trustees to the number of twenty-one.

Mr. MERCER opposed the recommitment, as inevitably leading to a rejection of the bill; particularly as coming from a gentleman who had declared that he should vote against the bill in any shape. Mr. M. protested against this bill being rejected on the ground of hostility to the establishment of any literary institution in this District, which the gentleman from New York had so broadly avowed. He went into a general view of the subject, vindicating the bill, and asserting the right of the people of this District to expect from Congress, their sole legislators, that they would at least be allowed to educate their children within the District if they chose, and that they should, therefore, be enabled to secure and properly administer the funds they might establish for that purpose, &c.

There then arose, on this subject, a debate which occupied the whole of the remainder of the day's sitting, which was desultory in its nature and comprehensive in its objects, embracing the general powers of Congress to confer power by granting acts of incorporation, as well as the merits of this particular bill, and even the Missouri question, somehow or other, wedged its way into the debate.

Messrs. SERGEANT, MEIGS, CULPEPER, and CUTHBERT, sided with Mr. MERCER, in opposition to the amendment, and Mr. STORRS replied.

The motion of Mr. STORRS was negatived.

Mr. BALDWIN, to obviate the objection which existed to the bill, on the ground of its supposed comprehensiveness, moved to amend it by adding thereto the following:

And, provided, also, that nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to authorize said College to purchase or hold any real estate out of the District of Columbia, without the consent of the Legislature of the State within which such real estate shall be situated.

The bill being on its third reading, an unanimous consent only could make the amendment; and, objection being made, it fell of course.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to make the above amendment to the bill.

Here ensued a further debate, in which Messrs. CLAY, BALDWIN, BARBOUR, MERCER, TUCKER, WARFIELD, and BRUSH, took part.

The amendment was objected to both by friends and adversaries of the bill; by its friends, as being unnecessary—by its enemies, on the ground that its insertion would leave an implication that, without its insertion, the College would have had the power proposed to be denied.

The opinion recently given by celebrated counsel on the operation of lotteries authorized by Congress became the subject of incidental remark. The greatest respect was professed for the counsel in the case, but not much for their opinion. The matter, however, was not so much argued as alluded to.

The motion of Mr. CAMPBELL was negatived, 71 votes to 60.

The bill was then read the third time, and the question was taken on its passage, by yeas and nays, and decided: For the bill 79, against it 60, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the bill was passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William T. Nimmo," was read the third time; and the question stated, Shall it pass? Whereupon, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 1.

MR. LIVERMORE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to alter and establish certain post roads; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

MR. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of State to issue a patent to Thomas Oxley; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

MR. MONELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed, on the 19th of December last, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, regulations can be adopted, consistent with the interest of the Government, whereby the soldiers of the late war who have not received their bounty lands can be better provided for than under existing laws, made a report, accompanied with a bill further to regulate the issuing of patents of military bounty lands; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill regulating the payment of debts due from the purchasers of the public lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a list of all the lands and buildings which have been purchased by the United States for military purposes, from the first day of July, 1800, to the present time, the cost of each site, and the buildings, as far as practicable, together with remarks on the estimated present value of the same, &c., prepared in obedience to a resolution of the 14th ultimo; which letter and list were ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from Ethan A. Brown, Governor of the State of Ohio, transmitting a report of the joint committee of both Houses of the General Assembly, on the subject of the proceedings of the Bank of the United States against certain officers of the government of that State, in the circuit court of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MR. McLANE offered the following paper, as an amendment which, when the subject came up, he proposed to move to the resolution for the admission of Missouri into the Union:

Provided, That nothing in the constitution of the said State of Missouri shall be construed to authorize or make it obligatory on the Legislature to pass any law denying to the citizens of each State any of the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States: And provided, further, That no law of the said State shall be construed to deny to the citizens of each State any of the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

And the same was referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act concerning Thomas Shields and others," in which bill they ask the concurrence of this House. The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MR. BALDWIN laid before the House sundry documents in relation to the trade of the United States with the empire of China; the state of sundry manufacturing establishments within the United States, and other papers, illustrative of the principles contained in the report of the Committee on Manufactures, which was accompanied by the bill to regulate the duties on imports, and for other purposes; which documents were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of MR. RANKIN, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of changing an appropriation made by an act of Congress of the 27th of March, 1818, for the purpose of "repairing and keeping in repair that part of the road leading from Columbia, in the State of Tennessee, by the Choctaw Agency, to Madisonville, in the State of Louisiana, which lies between the southern boundary line of Tennessee, and the Indian boundary line in the State of Mississippi," so as to apply so much thereof, as, under the direction of the Secretary of War, may be found necessary to open a road from a point on the United States military road at or near Columbus, in the State of Mississippi, through the Choctaw nation of Indians, to Turner Brashears's stand on the old road leading from Natchez to Nashville.

MR. STORRS submitted the following order, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table until to-morrow:

Ordered, That, during the remainder of the present session of Congress, business referred to Committees of the whole House shall be called for consideration in the following order:

1. Private bills which have passed the Senate, and have been reported favorably by a committee of the House.
2. Private bills reported by committees of the House.
3. Bills and resolutions of a public nature.
4. Bills which have passed the Senate, and have been reported against by a committee of the House.
5. Reports unfavorable to petitioners.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslonde; the engrossed bill for the relief of Pierre Denis de la Ronde; the engrossed bill confirming the location of the permanent seat of government of the State of Illinois, and for other purposes, were severally read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

H. OF R.

WILLIAM T. NIMMO.

The engrossed bill for the relief of William T. Nimmo, was read a third time; and, on the question of its passage—

Mr. NEWTON spoke in support of the bill. From what he said in favor of it, the bill proposes to indemnify Mr. Nimmo for the building, on the bay shore below Norfolk, usually known by the name of the Pleasure House, which was burnt by the enemy during the late war, on the ground, as alleged by the petitioner, and contended by Mr. N., that the building was occupied as a military post.

Mr. FLOYD having called on Mr. MERCER, who was performing military duty at Norfolk about that time, for information on the subject—

Mr. MERCER stated the facts within his knowledge upon the subject, which were, that the building had been occupied as barracks or lodgings for a vidette, the outguard of the Army, and was destroyed, as was universally admitted at the time, from mere wantonness, or on the pretence of retaliation. Mr. M. drew a distinction between military posts and fortified places, destroyed in legitimate warfare, and mere barracks or houses occupied as such, destroyed wantonly, or on the plea of retaliation. Mr. M. was opposed to indemnifying the losers in any of the whole class of cases of the latter description, including those on the Niagara frontier, &c. He paid a high compliment to the personal character and merit of the claimant in this case, and expressed his satisfaction that such a case had presented itself, that he might vote upon it on principle, to show what his opinion was on this subject, where his feelings would lead him to vote differently if he could.

Some further debate took place on this subject, in which Messrs. McCoy, METCALF, MERCER, NEWTON, and RICH, engaged.

The question being taken on the bill, it was rejected, by a vote of 78 to 50.

MISSOURI.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution from the Senate, declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, and the amendments proposed thereto.

The whole day was spent in animated debate, and interesting proceedings.

The amendment moved by Mr. FOOT was, to strike out the proviso of the resolution from the Senate, and, in lieu thereof, to insert the following:

“Provided, That it shall be taken as a fundamental condition, upon which the said State is incorporated in the Union, that so much of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution which has been submitted to Congress, as declares it shall be the duty of the General Assembly ‘to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever,’ shall be expunged within two years from the passage of this resolution, by the General Assembly of Missouri, in the manner prescribed for amending said Constitution.”

Mr. STORRS had moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the whole of it, after the word “Union,” in the third line, and inserting the following:

“And to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State, impairing or contravening the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured to citizens of other States by the Constitution of the United States: And provided further, That the Legislature acting under the constitution already adopted in Missouri as a State, shall, as a convention, (for which purpose the consent of Congress is hereby granted,) declare their assent, by a public act, to the said condition, before the next session of Congress; and transmit to Congress an attested copy of such act by the first day of the said session.”

After much debate, the motion of Mr. STORRS was negatived—80 votes to 61.

Mr. HACKLEY then moved to strike out all Mr. FOOT's amendment, after the word “Union,” and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

“And to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State, to prevent such free negroes or mulattoes from entering into, and settling in, said State, as may be citizens of any of the States of the Union: And provided, further, That the Legislature, acting under the constitution already adopted in Missouri as a State, shall, as a convention, (for which purpose the consent of Congress is hereby granted,) declare their assent, by a public act, to the said condition, before the next session of Congress; and transmit to Congress an attested copy of such act by the first day of the said session.”

After debate, the motion of Mr. HACKLEY was negatived—70 to 66.

Mr. COBB then moved the amendment previously suggested by him, viz: to strike out so much of Mr. FOOT's amendment as follows the word “Union,” and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

“That the Legislature of the State of Missouri shall pass no law impairing the privileges and immunities secured to the citizen of each State, under the first clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States.”

After debate, this motion was negatived—74 votes to 65.

The question was then taken on Mr. FOOT's motion to amend as above, and decided in the negative by a large majority.

Mr. McLANE then moved his amendment, as stated; and then, after having previously several times refused to rise, a motion to that effect prevailed, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 2.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to repeal an act passed the 26th of April, 1816, increasing the compensations of inspectors, measurers, weighers, and gaugers; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORREST, from the Committee on Agriculture, made a report on the memorial of the United Agricultural Society of Virginia; which was committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WARFIELD submitted for consideration the following resolution, which was read and ordered to lie on the table one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish this House with a statement of the annual expense of the Marine Corps at the city of Washington; the manner in which the said corps are employed; the annual amount paid to each officer, distinguishing their pay from their perquisites and emoluments; also, the duties required to be performed by each officer attached to said corps.

Mr. RICH rose to say, that, in consequence of the great length of time which has been taken up in discussing the proposed reduction of the Army, and other subjects, and the limited period of the present session, he had come to the conclusion not to ask for the further consideration at the present session, of the resolution which he had submitted, some time ago, proposing the prohibition of the importation of certain articles of foreign growth or manufacture. He hoped, he said, that he might be indulged in the further remark, that, being fully satisfied, that, should the condition of the country remain unchanged, its resources must gradually melt away and disappear, he should, if here at the next session of Congress, at an early day call the attention of the House again to this subject; and, should he not be here, if he had any influence with his successor, it should certainly be employed to induce him to move for the consideration of the subject.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing imprisonment for debt, in all cases of process issuing from the courts of the United States, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. NELSON said, as the resolution proposed an inquiry only, it would be unnecessary for him to enter into an argument to show the propriety of its adoption. The distress which pervaded the country, he said, was known to every one, and its situation demanded relief, as far as it was in the power of this House to afford it. It had already too long been a stain on the statute books of the country, that men were liable to be imprisoned, not for crime, but for their misfortune. He hoped it would not be suffered to continue so longer.

Mr. WOOD inquired whether it was proposed to include the courts of the United States within this District.

Mr. CAMPBELL expressed his hope that the proposed inquiry by a committee would be made. He had long formed the opinion, on much reflection, that, as far as Congress had power in this respect, it ought to be exercised in the abolition of imprisonment for debt.

Mr. NELSON said the resolution, as to its object, spoke for itself. If Congress had any power over the subject in the States, he would have made his motion universal. But, as far as we have power, said he, I would exercise it, as well in regard to the courts of this District as to the other courts established by the authority of the United States.

The motion of Mr. NELSON was agreed to, and a committee of five ordered to be appointed accordingly; and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, Mr. STORRS, Mr. HEMPHILL, Mr. ROSS, and Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, were appointed the said committee.

REPORT ON GOLD COIN.

Mr. WHITMAN, from the select committee, appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the relative value of the gold hereafter to be coined at the Mint of the United States, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill. The report and bill are as follows:

The committee who were directed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the relative value of gold hereafter to be coined at the Mint, have attended to that subject, and beg leave respectfully to report that they are of opinion the value of American gold, compared with silver, ought to be somewhat higher than by law at present established. On inquiry, they find that gold coins, both foreign and of the United States, have, in a great measure, disappeared; and, from the best calculation that can be made, there is reason to apprehend they will be wholly banished from circulation, and it ought not to be a matter of surprise, under our present regulations, that this should be the case.

There remains no longer any doubt that the gold coins of the United States are, by our laws, rated at a value lower than in almost any other country, in comparison with that of silver. This occasions the gold to be constantly selected, when it can be obtained, in preference to silver, whenever required for remittance from this to foreign countries; and, at the same time, prevents those who have occasion to remit to the United States from doing it in gold. Hence there is a continual and steady drain of that metal from this country, without any correspondent return, which must continue while there remains any of it among us. The importations of it will be confined to small quantities, and from countries from which nothing better can be obtained.

There have been coined at the Mint of the United States nearly six millions of dollars in gold. It is doubtful whether any considerable portion of it can, at this time, be found within the United States. It is ascertained, in one of our principal commercial cities, quite in the vicinity of the Mint, that the gold coin in an office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States there located, in November, 1819, amounted to $165,000, and the silver coin to $118,000. That, since that time, the silver coin has increased to $700,000, while the gold coin has diminished to the sum of $1,200, one hundred only of which is American. And it is stated that the vaults of the State banks in the same city, having a capital in the aggregate, as is believed, of nearly eight millions, exhibit a similar result. It is scarcely to be doubted, that, on examination in the other commercial cities, similar additional proof would be furnished.

It now becomes a question of serious import, to be decided by the nation, whether a gold currency be at all desirable, or whether it should wholly give place to silver? By some a silver currency is deemed the most eligible. They contend that our circulating metallic currency should be ponderous, and inconvenient of transmission; that it would, in such case, remain in the country and stationary.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

On the other hand, it is believed, by your committee, that a more portable currency may be, on many accounts, and, in many instances, must be, much more convenient, and in some cases absolutely necessary. It cannot be denied, that the lighter and smaller the currency, in proportion to its value, the greater will be the accommodation in the negotiations between the great extremes of the Union. In proportion to this facility the price of exchange will be lessened; commercial transactions would thus be carried on at an enhanced profit to all concerned. Moreover, in time of war, it will never fail to become requisite to make use of specie in payments and remittances; and these will be demanded, almost exclusively, at the extreme borders and frontiers of the Union. In such case gold furnishes a medium which will not only be light and convenient, but which can be transmitted with secrecy, thereby avoiding the risks incident to war and commotion. Those who carry their recollections back to the incidents of the late war, cannot fail of being forcibly impressed with this idea.

Our empire is widely extended, and becoming more so; and, at the same time, sparsely settled. The transmission of large sums, especially in time of war, if in ponderous silver, must be extremely inconvenient, and oftentimes attended with great danger. It would seem, therefore, that, as currency, the gold coin has, in this country, manifest advantages over that of silver.

But there is another particular not unworthy of consideration. We have before stated that the gold coins are worth, in foreign countries, more, in comparison with silver, than in our own. The average of this increased value is believed to exceed six-tenths of a dollar in every fifteen dollars. In Spain and Portugal, three half eagles are worth sixteen dollars; in Cuba, seventeen; in the West Indies, generally, sixteen; in England, fifteen and one-fifth; in Holland, fifteen; and in France, fifteen and a half. These calculations may not be precisely as stated, but are believed to be nearly accurate.

In the United States, before the establishment of the present Government, it has heretofore been ascertained by a committee of Congress, that, by custom, the value of gold has been considered as equivalent to about fifteen and six-tenths of its weight in silver. This, without doubt, arose from finding this to be the average of the different values affixed to the gold in different foreign countries.

Why it was thought proper, on establishing the Mint of the United States, to reduce this value to fifteen for one, it is not now material to inquire. It is sufficient to know, from unhappy experience, that its tendency is to rid us of a gold currency, and leave us nothing but silver.

The merchants, if they have occasion to import specie, and cannot obtain silver, are compelled to import gold, at a loss of from two to ten per cent. If they have a remittance to make, they will, if possible, exchange silver for gold, as, thereby, they will gain from two to ten per cent., according to the value of gold in the country to which the remittance is to be made.

An occurrence, strikingly illustrative upon this point, is stated in an elaborate report of a former committee, on the subject of the currency, to which your committee would beg leave to refer, as affording much useful information on this subject generally. The Bank of the United States entered into a contract with Messrs. Baring & Co., of London, for the supply of two millions of dollars in specie, in equal parts, as near as might be practicable, of gold and silver, at the American standard. The amount was, accordingly, furnished; but not a dollar of it in gold; although gold is the currency of Great Britain, and silver is admissible there, as a tender, in but very small sums.

It will, of course, be objected, that if we should now render gold four per cent. better, we shall, thereby, put into the hands of its present holders a clear net gain to that amount, provided they hold it with an intent to use it in this country. But it is not perceived how this will injure the public or individuals. And it will not be regretted by the benevolent that individuals should be benefitted if no one be injured. If, however, individual wealth be a public blessing, all will be benefitted. At any rate, this is an incident utterly unavoidable, to a certain extent, in this case. It must be submitted to; as, otherwise, a positive national evil, of great magnitude, as your committee deem it, must be encountered.

It will, moreover, be objected, that speculators will take advantage of the unwary, and, ere they will have been apprized of the increased value of their gold, will have purchased it of them at the former rate. This, however, your committee believe, will, in a great measure, be counteracted by a provision in the bill, accompanying this report, that the coin at its increased value shall not be a legal tender, until the first of July next. In this way, those who would buy it with a view to speculation would sustain a loss of interest amounting to nearly or quite as much as would otherwise be gained by the purchase.

If it be expedient to adopt the measure in contemplation, the present is the moment when it can and ought to be done. The longer we continue under the present regulation the worse will be our condition and the greater the injury we shall have sustained.

Your committee, therefore, in conformity to the foregoing sentiments, ask leave to report a bill.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the eagles hereafter to be coined at the Mint of the United States shall contain two hundred and thirty-seven grains and ninety-eight hundredths of a grain of pure, or two hundred and fifty-nine grains and sixty-one hundredths of a grain of standard gold; and the half eagles and quarter eagles the same proportion of fine or standard gold; and the said eagles, half eagles, and quarter eagles, so to be coined, being of the weight aforesaid, shall, from and after the first day of July next, pass, and be a legal tender in the payment of all debts and demands whatsoever, at the rate of ten dollars for each eagle, and in that proportion for half and quarter eagles; and, when of less than the weight aforesaid, being of the standard fineness, in proportion to their weight.

The bill was twice read and committed.

MISSOURI.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the Senate's resolution for the admission of Missouri.

The following amendment, proposed on yesterday by Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, being under consideration, viz: to strike out the proviso to the resolution as follows:

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give the assent of Congress to any provision in the Constitution of Missouri, (if any such there be,) which contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

And, in lieu thereof, insert the following:

Provided, That nothing in the constitution of the said State of Missouri shall be construed to authorize or make it obligatory on the Legislature to pass any law denying to the citizens of each State any of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States: And provided, further, That no law of the said State shall be construed to deny to the citizens of each State any of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.

A long debate took place, not so much on this particular amendment as on the whole subject of the evils of slavery, the rights of the South, the balance of power, the nature of the obligations and benefits of the Union, &c.

Mr. CAMPBELL rose and said, he was not ignorant of the anxiety of gentlemen on all sides of the House, to have the question now under discussion determined. Notwithstanding he felt this anxiety in common with others, he hoped a disposition to cultivate patience a little longer would be indulged, particularly when a member, not in the habit of obtruding, wished to be heard.

Mr. C. said, the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) who presented the amendment now under consideration, had evinced so much candor, and so often repeated his invitations to those disagreeing with him on the main question, to meet him in the spirit of amity on his proposition to amend, that he would offer his reasons why he could not. What, Mr. C. asked, is the object of the amendment? If he understood its import, it is intended, at least indirectly, to alter the constitution of Missouri. If not to expunge the exceptionable clause, certainly to give it, or any act passed in conformity thereto, such an interpretation as the convention never intended. Whence does Congress derive this immensity of power? Or on what occasion has the employment of it been indicated? This doctrine is very different from that for which the gentleman at the last session so ably contended. At that time it was alleged we had no right to intermeddle with the constitution of a State about to apply for admission into the Union. If Congress be competent to interfere in any way with one clause of the constitution of Missouri, an interference with another, and indeed with every other, would be equally admissible. Mr. C. said, he considered the amendment a perfect cypher, and so would it, if adopted, be deemed by the people of Missouri. To any such modification their consent would be indispensable. And how was this to be obtained? Mr. C. said, he knew of no way but through another convention, and he defied gentlemen to point out any other legitimate mode. Mr. C. said, Missouri is unrepresented here; and if she were, who could believe her representation vested with power to enter into any compact binding on her, relative to her constitution?

The gentleman who had just resumed his seat, (Mr. ALEXANDER,) has importuned his opponents to vote for the amendment, and terminate this unbecoming strife. Mr. C. said, he admired the disposition of the gentleman, and so far as it respected himself he would gratify him in his wishes, were it possible, without a dereliction of what he believed to be duty. That he might now be distinctly understood, he declared his unwillingness to vote for any amendment which could be offered, and which would result in the admission of Missouri at this time. This unwillingness he expected to continue, unless arguments were offered sufficient to produce a change. He would go further, and candidly acknowledge he was unable to imagine a proposition for which he could vote, that would be in accordance with the desires of his Southern friends.

Mr. C. said, it had been remarked by many of the friends of Missouri, and by none with greater energy than by a distinguished member from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) that if the constitution of Missouri be incompatible with the Federal Constitution, it is so far void, and the legitimate tribunal for the decision of the question is the Judiciary. This is a position, he said, to the correctness of which he could not in conscience subscribe. It was so repugnant to his views that he must reject it as most dangerous in practice. By an act of the last session we authorized the people of Missouri to form a constitution, which, among other conditions, was required to be in conformity to the Constitution of the United States. A constitution has been framed and submitted to us for inspection—inspection for what purpose? Certainly that we might decide upon its provisions, which, if not repugnant to the rule prescribed, she would be entitled in good faith to admission—if repugnant, she must suffer rejection, with however much pain accompanied. To come to a decision in this manner, Mr. C. said, he conceived it to be the duty of Congress; a duty, from the performance of which, he could assure gentlemen he felt no disposition to shrink by remitting it to the Judiciary. Is not the question fairly before us, and how can we evade a direct and unequivocal answer, regardless of consequences? Should Missouri be admitted, and that part of her constitution to which objection is made be brought to bear upon the rights of an individual, he believed the court ought to and would interfere. This he had always understood was peculiarly the province of the judicial department, where the constitutionality of an act was called in question. It was a power which he hoped would always be prudently exercised.

Mr. C. said, he was willing, if it were thought necessary, to vote for another act or resolution to enable the people of Missouri to call a convention to form a new constitution, or to alter the present one in such a way as to obviate objections. Or if she chose to do this without the assistance of Congress, he for one would not be disposed to take advantage of the circumstance.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Mr. C. said, as he now had the opportunity, he would declare, he had yesterday listened to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) with impatience. That gentleman had assigned sundry reasons why the subject should be postponed until the commencement of the next Congress, when it could be settled more to the satisfaction of the nation. He thought the question was fully understood, as well as the bearings it would probably have upon our national character; and he for one was prepared to decide the naked proposition of admission or rejection. The gentleman has alluded to a strife for power, and if he understood him, he meant a power which was to be acquired by a new party. Such considerations, Mr. C. said, should have no influence on him in pronouncing judgment on a Constitutional question. What, he would ask, could the new party, which it is supposed is now springing up, profit him, or the State which he assists to represent? Should it increase and attain full stature, could the Northwest expect favors which are now denied?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. S.) has, at least, intimated a wish to see the old question of restriction revived. With him, Mr. C. said, he could not accord in opinion on this subject. He should regret to see a question reagitated which had, in some degree, become odious. His opinion might be different, could he discover that any practical benefit might result. Whatever the success of such an effort might be in this House, he felt confident that gentlemen could predict, with certainty, its fate elsewhere. Every one must know that the Senate would give it a veto. And why, he would inquire, should we engage again in so unprofitable a consumption of time? Duty did not appear to require it; neither did he believe that it was the wish of the nation, particularly when the session was so near its close. Mr. C. said he would not assert that he would never vote for the restriction. Circumstances, at some future period, might indicate the propriety of considering such a provision; but he was sure that period would not arrive until a great change had taken place in the other House.

Mr. CAMPBELL rose and said, the observations which he had some time ago submitted, had drawn upon him the reprehension of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NELSON,) and, in his estimation, made it his duty again to ask the indulgence of the Committee. This he did with reluctance, but he felt no disposition that an attack should be made upon him from any quarter unrepelled.

Mr. C. said the gentleman had, in a very forcible manner, charged him with evincing such a temper towards Missouri as did Great Britain towards her colonies; those colonies which contended for and effected their emancipation from bondage. Mr. C. said this allegation was not well founded. He was perfectly willing that Missouri should be represented, as much so as the gentleman himself, whenever she exhibited to us a constitution which he could, under the sanctions of the oath which he had taken on becoming a member of this House, pronounce to be compatible with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. C. said, when he alluded to the circumstance of Missouri being unrepresented here, he was endeavoring to combat the doctrine of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) who contended that, if she were admitted on some such condition as he suggested, she was bound absolutely, from the moment of her admission, for its performance, and he meant no reproach upon her or her friends.

The gentleman (Mr. N.) has told us, said Mr. C., what may properly be considered the laws of the land. He has declared that all resolutions and acts of Congress, made in conformity to the Constitution, could not be otherwise than obligatory; for such they were declared to be by the Constitution itself. This, said Mr. C., is true; but he would ask the gentleman, whether, if this amendment were changed into the restrictive principle, and adopted, it would be considered by him as coercive on Missouri? [Mr. NELSON explained, and denied the analogy of the cases.] Mr. CAMPBELL said, he understood what the gentleman had said, but was utterly at a loss to comprehend the want of analogy. The adoption of either would, if gentlemen were correct, be the same thing in effect. One would be adding a provision not now in the instrument, the other expunging one already in it. Mr. C. said he would assert that the amendment must be either efficient or inefficient; if efficient, it is intended so far to change the constitution of Missouri as to annihilate the objectionable clause, or to render any act passed in obedience thereto altogether inoperative and harmless; if inefficient, in whatever garb it may be dressed, or with whatever plausibility urged, he could not give it his support. His own sentiment was, that this amendment, or any similar one, would be as ineffectual in the construction of the constitution of Missouri as our naked opinion, or the celebrated one given in the lottery case.

The gentleman (Mr. NELSON) has expressed his astonishment at the course pursued by the representation from Ohio, inasmuch as their own constitution and laws embrace the very principle which they are so determined on denying to Missouri. Mr. C. said, he would admit that the constitution of Ohio denied to persons of color the right of suffrage. With this provision he was satisfied, and he doubted not the ability of the convention to sanction it, as well as to define the qualifications of an Elector. With the correspondent clauses of the constitution of Missouri, Mr. C. said he found no fault, and he thought on this account he ought not to be exposed to censure. He said he would also admit that a law had been passed, many years since, in Ohio, the object of which was to restrain the migration of free persons of color to that State. This act, he understood, had been decided to be unconstitutional, and he never heard that its provisions had, in one instance, been enforced. The constitution of Ohio forbids any person convicted of an offence being sent out of the State as a punishment. Hence, Mr. C. said, the courts have decided that an immigrant black, who had failed to comply with the act adverted to, could not be removed. If the regulations of Ohio on this subject had been such as the gentleman supposed, Mr. C. said he doubted not the settlement of a colony of two hundred and seventy black emigrants from Virginia, in his district, would have been prevented. These could not have been considered citizens of any State, and they formed a population whose vicinity was dreaded by the surrounding country.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NELSON) has expressed his regret at the disappearance of the old political distinctions, as others are generated in this unpleasant contest, much more ruinous to the Republic, as they are to be marked by geographical lines. Mr. C. said, if this were to be the case, it would likewise be to him a source of grief. It would be, he confessed, a calamity long to be deplored; but, in forming an opinion on a grave Constitutional question, under the solemnities of an oath, he considered a departure from honesty as still more calamitous. He thought that the violation of the charter to which every member of this great federal family owes obedience, was one of the most terrible disasters that could betide this country, particularly when that violation takes place in Congress. The gentleman's expectation of a strife for power in the East may be realized; but whatever motives might be ascribed to members from that quarter, he was strongly inclined to be charitable, and to believe them to be such as had been professed. True, Mr. C. said, if this irksome contest were long continued, some demagogue, under the garb of patriotism, may avail himself of the turmoil, and establish himself in power, which it will not be easy to demolish. However, considerations of this kind were but secondary, and could not authorize the desertion of evident duty.

The gentleman has expressed, in the strongest terms, his apprehension that the principles advanced by the friends of restriction are to produce most fearful consequences in the South; that the scenes of St. Domingo, with all their horrors, are there to be exhibited. Mr. C. said he hoped the day which would give birth to these distresses was remote, if it were ever to be, and that nothing which had been uttered within these walls would accelerate its arrival. He, for one, had no inclination to disturb the relation subsisting between master and slave, or to render the condition of the latter more intolerable, by augmenting his impatience of bondage. As a human being, the black man had rights, but an attempt, on his part, to assert them, would be an addition to his misfortune. To the helots of this country he was willing the recitation of the songs of Aleman and Terpander should be strictly forbidden.

Mr. C. said, whatever fault the gentleman might find with his notions of freedom and slavery, he would inform that gentleman he was principally indebted to Virginia for them. They are such as have been advanced and defended by Jefferson, Tucker, and the authors of the memorable ordinance of 1787.

Mr. REEA said, the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." This provision evidently intends that such new State is formed, and does exist, not formally only, but in fact, completely organized, and in full operation, as a sovereignty, acting in pursuance of a constitution ordained by the people of such new State. Such a State is Missouri, erected under the authority of an act of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories." It may here be noticed, to prevent misconception, that the words "and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories," do not refer to the State of Missouri, but to the Territory particularly adverted to in the eighth section of that act, passed on the 6th March, 1820. The seventh section of that act provides, "that in case a constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of the said Territory of Missouri, the said convention, or representatives, as soon thereafter as may be, shall cause a true and attested copy of such constitution, or frame of government, as shall be formed or provided, to be transmitted to Congress." In pursuance of that act of Congress, a convention of the people of Missouri did make a constitution and frame of State government; and thereupon that frame of government was put in force, so far that the same has been completely organized, and in full operation. And "the said convention, or representatives," have, in pursuance of the said act of Congress, caused a true and attested copy of the said constitution, or frame of State government, to be transmitted to Congress, and it has been received.

The State of Missouri is denied admission into this Union, by reason of objections to that constitution, particularly because that constitution provides, in the 26th section of the third article, that "it shall be their duty, (to wit, the General Assembly,) as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary, first, to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever." And, for this, the opposition say, that the State of Missouri ought not to be admitted into this Union. Mr. R. said that the opposition to admitting the State of Missouri might see in that constitution a humane and noble principle inserted, to wit: that, by that constitution, it is made the duty of the General Assembly of that State "to oblige the owners of slaves to treat them with humanity, and to abstain from all injuries to them, extending to life or limb."

An attempt is made to bring the Constitution of the United States to bear against the admission of the State of Missouri into this Union. On this point, it is right to examine what are the objections which that Constitution expressly declares shall be taken against the admission of a new State into this Union. The Constitutional objections are expressly declared in the 3d section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States, and enumerated as follows, namely; "but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress." If there be any other objections expressly declared in the Constitution of the United States against the admission of a new State into this Union, let them be referred to.

The Constitution of the United States, in the 4th section of the 4th article, declares, that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government." Against whom is this guarantee provided? Is the guarantee against the State so guaranteed? And, if not, who is the guarantee against? Is the guarantee against a foreign or internal innovation? Is it against individual ambition, attempting the overthrow of the rights of man? In the illustration of that which is intended by the guarantee alluded to, it may be observed that a republican form or frame of government is that in which the people are sovereign, and have the right of self-government, and act accordingly, in legislation, to preserve their sovereignty and safety. On this principle all the States in this Union have acted, and continue to act, as sovereignties. The constitution of Missouri provides for that self-government, sovereignty, and safety, of the people who made and ordained it. The Constitution of the United States guaranties to the State of Missouri that republican right of self-government and sovereignty; and hence it is that the State of Missouri is an equal in this Union, and not a subordinate—subordination is inferiority. Do the gentlemen in opposition desire to put the State of Missouri under the control or dictation of the other States of this Union? If they do, the State of Missouri will demand the Constitutional guarantee.

The constitution of the State of Missouri is under examination in this House, composed of the representatives of the sovereign people of these United States; and, said Mr. R., we are examining whether the constitution of the State of Missouri is republican: that is, this House of Representatives are examining whether the people of Missouri are qualified to decide on their own business, and to know what will operate for their good; and, being of opinion that the State of Missouri is not a proper judge of its own sovereign attributes, this House will provide better for them. If this principle, said Mr. R., shall be insisted on, then let Congress at once command all the States of this Union severally to submit their respective constitutions, or frames of government, to the Congress of the United States for examination. I do not believe, said Mr. R., that the States will submit to such command—for one good reason, viz: that Congress has not any such power. In the sixth article of the Constitution of the United States it is declared that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Here, then, said Mr. R., is the great Constitutional principle eminently presiding over and controlling the constitutions and laws of the States respectively; and the judges shall be bound thereby. Hence is inferred, that, if any collision, real or imaginary, shall be pretended to be or exist between the Constitution or laws of the United States and the constitution or laws of any State of this Union, that the judges shall be bound by the Constitution and laws of the United States. And hence also is inferred, that, if there be in the constitution of the State of Missouri any thing contravening the Constitution of the United States, it is nudum vagem—void and of no effect, to all intents and purposes. But the rendition of such judgment will be by the Supreme Court of the United States, and not by Congress, who have power to enact laws, but will not be a tribunal to decide thereon, or on the constitutionality of the constitution or law of any State of this Union.

The second clause of the third section of the third article of the Constitution of the United States provides, that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

It is manifest that the power given by this clause of that section of the Constitution acts only on the territory or other property of the United States, in any State or Territory, and never can, by any construction, be made to act or operate on any thing but the territory or other property of the United States. The people of the State of Missouri are not the property of the United States; on them, therefore, that clause of that section cannot operate in that point of view, nor in any other, so far as relates to property referred to in that clause of that section. The State of Missouri, however, is very much interested in the last sentence of that clause of that section, which declares, "and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." This clause contains a Constitutional guarantee against a violation of any claims of the United States, or of any particular State, or of any State right. The State of Missouri has, in pursuance of the act of Congress alluded to, certain rights: the fifth section of that act provides, "that until the next general census shall be taken, the said State (Missouri) shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States." The people of Missouri, in virtue of said act, have formed a constitution, or frame of State government; they have agreed to the first second, third, fourth, and fifth provisions or conditions of the sixth section of that act; and having so done, the State of Missouri has claims against the United States. One of these claims is expressly mentioned in the fifth section of that act, which provides that, until the next general census shall be taken, the said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States. The Representative from the State of Missouri has attended since the beginning of the session of Congress, and is not yet admitted to his seat in this House. Are not the claims of the State of Missouri prejudiced thereby? But the State of Missouri has a claim of a higher nature; that is, a claim to be admitted into this Union as a sovereign State, on an equal footing with the original States.

MR. CUSHMAN, of Maine, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Not being habituated to parliamentary debate, and possessing a set of nerves easily disconcerted, I but seldom lift my voice for or against any thing. But, on this occasion, I have strong inducements to depart from my usual silence. Besides the right which I have, in common with others, of expressing my opinions, I now have reasons peculiar to myself. A man suspected of high crimes and misdemeanors—the high crime of a patriotic ambition—the misdemeanor of endeavoring to preserve the Union entire, by preserving the balance of its parts, may surely claim the right to be heard in his own defence.

I shall not, with intention, wound the sensibility of any one. But avoiding all “bitter words, which stir up strife,” I shall aim at that blandness of expression which may be adapted to the subject.

An honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (MR. HARDIN,) with his characteristic wit and pleasantry, has insinuated that he has at length found out the secret of our boasted humanity, and learned, from a letter, which he was pleased to call celebrated, that it resolves itself into a love of power, or a policy to restore the sceptre to Judah. I have read, sir, with some attention, most of the letters which have been circulated in the public prints. But in no one of them can I perceive a sentiment like that alluded to above. In one* of these letters, the writer seems to be of the opinion that this Union is virtually dissolved; in another there is an intimation that the next President is to make his entrance into this city, to be inaugurated in a style somewhat novel. The novelty of the scene, I presume, will attract much notice; and, being thus in season announced, will bring together a vast concourse of people from all parts of our country. In a third,† there is an allusion to an event which might arise from the question now agitated. But the change of power insinuated was not mentioned as a cause, or motive, or object of the present contest, but a probable result.

The honorable gentleman is assured that the writer had no such design as has been imputed to him. His solicitudes were not, lest the sceptre should depart from Judah, but lest Judah should be crushed under a weight of power, to be derived from, what some have supposed to be the seed of Cain, and others the descendants of Ham. He believes it to be in the order of nature, that the sceptre should depart from the North. From time immemorial, the march of empire has been westward. Even some of the celestial bodies, apparently, move in that direction. The sun, the most luminous of them, brightens in the east, moves over the globe diffusing blessings, and at length appears in the west in full glory. Thus it may be with the American Empire. It arose in the East, with a mild radiance—it has shone from the South in majestic lustre—and it will probably be seen in the West, in all the splendor and beneficence of its beams. Such glory awaits the West; which nothing is so likely to prevent as the dark cloud which hovers round its horizon. Should this be driven back by a strong gale of patriotism, all there would be peace, serenity, and joy.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that I am opposed to slavery in every form. And I contend against its extension on what I conceive to be the purest principles of humanity. It appears to me to be fraught with the most deleterious evils. It cannot but have an effect, in some instances, injurious to the finer feelings of the heart. I know, Mr. Chairman, that there are high-minded gentlemen, who not only seem to deny to the African the capability of becoming a citizen in this country, but also are inclined to refuse him a place on the roll of human beings. I shall attempt no learned analysis to prove that a negro is a man. I shall not contend that he is possessed of an organized human body, to which there is superadded a rational soul. The definition of man, by an ancient philosopher, is sufficient for my purpose—Animal bipes implume. If this definition be correct, it will follow that a negro is a man. He is certainly an animal with two legs; and though he may have something resembling wool, he is also without feathers—which corresponds to the definition given. And, if a man, he is “endowed with certain inalienable rights;” for, in the first article of the political creed of our country, it is declared to be a “self-evident truth that all men are created equal.” But, however this may be, it will be agreed that an African is endowed with a degree of sensibility—that he is susceptible of pleasure and pain—that many of the race are capable of strong sensations of gratitude and love. If so, these feelings, by their condition even in this country, must be injured to a degree at which humanity cannot but recoil. Who, unmoved, could behold the anguish of conjugal attachment, the yearnings of parental affection, the pathetic cries and tears of filial tenderness, which cannot but be felt and expressed, when husband and wife, parent and child, brother and sister, are forcibly separated from each other, and transferred, like beasts of burden, or as insensible property, from owner to owner! Sir, could I even reflect with indifference on such scenes of agony and human woe, I should be ashamed to claim kindred with the human race; and even blush to call God my Heavenly Father.

H. OF R.

Slavery, sir, in our country, admits of no apology but stern imperious necessity. There is no color of excuse by extending to increase the evil.

But, though I contend against the spread of slavery, on humane principles, yet I never insinuated that these were my only motives. I have also strong reasons of policy. It is not, in my opinion, wise or safe to spread over a new country a population which, instead of adding, must impair its physical strength. A slave is neither a soldier, nor a seaman, nor an artisan, except of the lowest kind. Many of them are but menial servants, who do not reproduce the food which they consume. The earth, in general, is not so well cultivated by slaves, nor made to exhibit those scenes of fertility and beauty which are to be seen where the owners are the cultivators of the soil. Nor can a section of country, where the population consists but in part of slaves, furnish such numbers, for common defence, as can be spared in a free State, where every able-bodied man is a soldier. It is known that in all our wars, some of the slaves are too much inclined to go over to the enemy. This, to be sure, is wrong—but it is in a degree natural. For, according to Mr. Jefferson, if a slave has any country, it is not that in which he is holden in bondage. Allured by the hope held out by an insidious foe, they are ready to engage in some work of mischief or blood. Hence, in times of danger or invasions, a country so circumstanced, instead of furnishing its fair proportion of soldiers to oppose a public enemy, might retain somewhat of its physical strength at home for purposes of safety—to suppress domestic insurrection—to protect their wives and children, their altars and their firesides. It would be peculiarly impolitic to place our frontiers—those inlets of an invading foe—in such jeopardy.

The territories of the United States, the common property of the nation, are to become constituent parts of our Republic. Every portion of the Union, therefore, must feel a deep interest, that the population of the States, which are to be formed out of these territories, especially if the West is destined to be the seat of the empire, should consist, not of slaves, who might endanger the public safety, but of citizens—enlightened, virtuous, enterprising citizens—able to contribute to the ornament and defence of our common country.

Honorable gentlemen need not peruse private letters to learn secrets. At proper times, and on suitable occasions, I shall be willing to avow my sentiments. Strong in my cause, and strengthened by the powerful auxiliaries of right, of reason, of justice, of humanity, and feeling, what is there to be feared? It is manly, it is noble, to take the open field, and to acquaint the adversary with the whole grounds of the controversy. It appears to be as ungenerous as it is useless, to display doubtful colors, or to maintain the conflict under masked batteries. For myself I have no hesitancy in saying, that it is in part, according to my view, on one side as well as the other, a contest for power. The States where slavery is proscribed cannot, consistently with their own interest, yield the point in dispute. By yielding, they part with the inheritance received from their fathers—a portion of their relative importance in this Union. As to the binding force of the celebrated compromise, I shall hold my opinion in reserve. But, considered as a bargain, it appears to me, on the part of the North and East, to be far from a wise one. It scarcely has a parallel in all history, except in the providence of an oriental huntsman, who, in very remote times, as we are informed, “parted with his birthright for a mess of pottage, or a morsel of meat.” By the accession of new States on the South or West, with the privilege of holding slaves by the power thus derived, the scale of empire is there more than on the poise. Every State added, with the like privilege, increases the weight in the preponderating scale.

It is, sir, in the nature of man, especially of irresponsible bodies of men, and all triumphant majorities are irresponsible when fortified by power, to be forgetful of right. Those but seldom obtain justice, who are not in a situation to cause its claims to be respected. The soundest maxims of policy require that no section of our country should gain such an enormous ascendancy as to give the law to the rest. It would, in time, crush the other under its feet. To guard against such an abuse, there should be preserved a balance of power—yes, sir, a balance of power. At the repetition of the phrase gentlemen seem to take the alarm. As if struck with a panic, they almost lose the balance of their minds, to say nothing of the harmony of their good feelings. The balance of power! exclaim gentlemen, in astonishment—as if they saw in it an ill omen, portentous of direful events—some dreadful calamity impending over our Republic. What do you mean, say they, by the balance of power? I mean, sir, in the nation, something like that equilibrium preserved in the natural world by the operation of the centripetal and the centrifugal forces of nature—the action of the one, and the reaction of the other. As on this equilibrium depends the order and harmony of the natural system, so on a balance of power resembling this depends the safety of our confederated Republic. But if gentlemen are displeased with this illustration, I will attempt another—I mean, sir, something in our Federal system, resembling the barriers which prevent the ocean from overflowing the land—fixed by the Almighty, when he said to its turbulent waters, “Hitherto thou hast come, but thou shalt proceed no further—and here shall thy proud waves be staid.” This balance of power has been highly useful in other countries. When it has been entirely broken down the consequence has been fatal to nations, as it has lately been seen in the convulsions of Europe. But fortunate, sir, for the world, by the magnanimous policy of the Emperor Alexander, this balance was restored, and nations, as the result, are beating their swords into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks, and seem to be inclined to learn war no more! I believe, sir, that a balance of power would not be without some salutary effect in this nation. It might restrain the intemperance of inordinate ambition in individuals, and check the proud assumptions of aspiring States. But, sir, to return from this seeming digression into which I have been led by the observations which have been made in the course of the debate, I have further to say, that the Northern and Eastern portions of this Union, for the purpose of preserving it entire, at the adoption of the Federal Constitution, submitted to an evil for which they could provide no speedy remedy. Our country was then bounded by the Mississippi, and little was to be apprehended, as the condition of the States was at that period, from an overgrown power, derived from a slave population. But could it have been foreseen that a territory west of that river, larger than the old thirteen United States, would have been added to our country, out of which new States, almost to infinity, were to be formed, with the privilege of holding slaves, I am persuaded that neither Massachusetts, nor any part of New England, and perhaps none of the now free States then extant, would have consented, on such terms, to have come into this Union.

There was, sir, in the North, at the adoption of the Federal Constitution, much sensibility on the score of slavery. This was only quitted by the belief then entertained, that, "though slavery was not smitten by an apoplexy, yet it had received a mortal wound, and would die of a consumption."

It is, sir, deeply to be regretted, that slavery has taken such deep root in our country that it cannot be soon extirpated. The correction of the evil, if it can be corrected, must be left to time and the wonder-working power of Heaven. Nothing can be farther from the free States than the design to meddle with the subject of slavery where it exists by Constitutional compact. But, to consent to its extension, is revolting to all the principles of liberty in which they have been educated. By opening a new market for this species of property the demand and the price will be increased, and additional encouragement given to continue this execrable "traffic in human blood."

Gentlemen expatiate on the hardships and humiliations endured by Missouri. I sympathize, sir, with the people of Missouri, and the more readily, because, having experienced similar misfortunes, I know how to feel for the disappointed. But what are the griefs and mortifications of Missouri, compared to those, of a like nature, endured by Maine for a series of years? Long and laborious were her struggles for independence, and for the right of self-government; and, though she lost no blood, she exhausted much treasure. Her progress was that of a ship, making its way against winds and tides, and a strong current; and when, by the ardor and perseverance of the crew she had surmounted these obstacles, and with full sail and joyful acclamation was entering the port, she was driven from the Federal wharf, and refused anchorage in the harbor of the Union.

This treatment was not for any alleged fault—for no repugnance, real or pretended, of her constitution to that of the United States. It was as painful as unexpected, and the more distressing to a generous sensibility, as it was not done by an enemy. It was the act of our friends—the friends with whom we had, in a common cause, lately fought and bled; with whom we had mingled our sorrows and our joys; the patriots and statesmen with whom we had taken wholesome counsel, and in whose company we had moved to the temple of liberty, and on its altar inscribed our civic vows. Notwithstanding the wounds which Maine received by the predicament in which her delegation was placed—wounds which, upon recollection, almost bleed afresh—the ardor of her loyalty is not abated; her affection for the National Government is not alienated. Her attachment to the Union is vigorous and strong. Her wealth and resources, such as they be, are ready to replenish your Treasury; her physical strength is at your disposal; her blood will generously flow in a righteous cause; and her brave and spirited militia, at the call of the Government, will promptly rally round the standard of the nation, either to "repel invasion, to suppress insurrection, or to execute the laws of the Union." I am persuaded, sir, that Missouri, less aggrieved, and with less cause of complaint, will not yield to the suggestions of passion, but profit by an example which, in circumstances somewhat similar, I am proud to propose to her imitation. Resentment for unintentional wrongs, though real, and inconsiderate modes of redress, do not savor of manly wisdom or patriotic virtue. To attribute such a temper and conduct to the people of Missouri, would be doing them the greatest injustice. Under the delay of their hopes and prospects, they will feel like patriots, and act like men, intelligent, dispassionate men. As I have this opinion of the good sense and patriotism of Missouri, if left to herself, I cannot be alarmed at consequences so often menaced. I believe that the evils predicted will have no existence but in fervid imaginations.

I have the honor, sir, to think, with the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr SERGEANT,) whose opinions, from his high standing in this House, and in the nation, are entitled to respect, that if the admission of Missouri into this Union should be a short time delayed, no essential injury or inconvenience would accrue, either to her or to the United States. She has already an organized government in operation, competent to all local purposes. The benefits of this she can quietly enjoy, as did Vermont her government, till all obstacles were removed to her becoming a member of this confederacy of States. Time and reflection, which produce great revolutions in human affairs, not unfrequently produce some changes in the minds of men. The people of Missouri will not deem themselves spurned at, or frowned upon, by the conduct of this House. No audacity is imputed to her; no censure is implied in withholding from her the object so ardently sought. On her part, it is candidly considered mere inadvertency; on ours, it is the result of principle, of the soundest maxims of policy, and of an adherence to the paramount laws of the land. For myself, sir, I wish to Missouri every species of prosperity and glory; and when she shall present herself with a constitution republican in spirit, as well as in name, I shall most joyfully hail her entrance into this Union.

From the sensations which I cherish, I cannot possibly believe that the delay which I have suggested, in order to give time for voluntary amendments in the constitution of Missouri, would lay a foundation for hatreds and ill-will, or cause those heart-burnings or alienations of affection among the members of this community, which some have so precipitately announced. After the feelings of the moment, engendered by the ardor of debate, shall have subsided, and sober reflection ensued, we shall respect each other the more for the adherence to principle, the firmness of character, the rectitude of intention, and ardor for the common weal, which, in the discharge of duty, may have been indicated or displayed. Upon the same principle that a brave man will respect courage in an enemy, sound patriots and able statesmen, with clear heads and good hearts, will habitually cherish a mutual regard, and reciprocate acts of civility. Local interests and discrepancies of views may occasion, at times, a coolness and reserve. But a congeniality of soul, a sympathy of affections, and a largeness of mind, will fix, among such characters, as has been seen among the sages and heroes of the Revolution, a lasting bond of friendship. At least, I may venture to affirm, that no such character, because not personally or sectionally gratified, will attempt to embroil this Union, nor sacrifice to his own resentments the peace, prosperity, and glory, of our beloved country.

Indulge me, sir, with a few observations concerning myself, which are forced upon me by allusions and insinuations which it is impossible for me not to understand. So unconscious am I of an intention to sow the seeds of discord, to foment divisions, or to "enfeeble the ties by which the several parts of our country are linked together," that I do not believe any thing I have said or written could be construed to have this tendency, unless seen by distempered optics, and through a medium which distorts the natural import. The whole history, sir, of my life, private, professional, and political, could it be known, would evince an ardent attachment to the Union, and a devotedness to the National Government. During times of alarm and danger, I supported the policy of the South. I supported this policy, because I believed it connected with the honor and interest of the nation. There is, sir, in the Library of Congress, the most ample proof of the exalted opinions which I entertained of Mr. Jefferson, and of my approbation of his administration—even at a period when some who now, revivied by Southern rays, are endeavoring to render me suspected, by means as indecorous as they are unjustifiable, held no undistinguished rank among the most virulent of his calumniators. For the North, I claim no superiority. To the South, I cheerfully attribute a fair portion of the talent, the wisdom, the patriotism, the virtue, the refinement, and, if you please, the good, the noble, and the elevated feelings of the nation. Am I an enemy to the South, because I cannot yield up every thing? May I not be permitted to retain some spice of mental independence? As a Northern man, may I not be allowed to indulge, without offence, my sensibilities and predilections, and to be alive to the interest of that section of the country with which I am more immediately connected, where are my affinities, my hopes, and enjoyments? Are these the crimes which have called forth such severe animadversions, for which I am virtually arraigned before the bar of public opinion? I glory in such crimes. If my neighbor, whom I highly esteem, informs me that I am to receive his will for my law, as the condition of his kind offices, I shall promptly give him to understand, that, as highly as I prize the amenities of life, on such terms I cannot accept his friendship. Would a wise man suffer his eyes to be plucked out, or a strong man his arms to be cut off, for the sake of living in peace with his assuming neighbor, who had neither the discretion nor politeness to conceal the feelings nourished in his heart? I repeat, sir, that the policy of cheeks and balances which I advocate is not alarming to this Union. This Union cannot be in danger by the strictest adherence to the principles on which it was founded, the inalienable rights with which all mankind are endowed by their Creator, "among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This basis of our republican system is a balance of power, and must be supported by a reciprocity of interests. As long as it shall remain on this stable foundation, and be thus supported, the winds may blow, the rains may descend, and the floods may come, but it will fall not, for it is founded and supported on a rock.

I cannot close, sir, without expressing my hope, that, as the Union is safe, the harmony of its parts will continue; that Missouri will weigh well the consequences of her own actions; that she will listen to the advice of her more dispassionate and less interested friends; that she will take counsel from wisdom, and not from passion; that, in fine, she will study and pursue her own interest and honor, as connected with the peace, prosperity, and glory of the United States.

Mr. TYLER said that he had, during the present session, maintained a profound silence on the interesting topic which had so long engaged the attention of the House and nation; that nothing but the exposé which had been made to the House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) could have induced him now to present himself to the notice of the House upon a subject so hackneyed. The remarks made by that gentleman were of a character so novel and alarming that it would not become him to pass them by unnoticed. The gentleman (Mr. SERGEANT) had talked about the balance of power. What is it that the gentleman means by this language? Had he well weighed it before he gave it utterance? To his mind the gentleman had conjured up a fearful fiend. He had told us that no danger was to be apprehended from keeping alive this question. He had cried "peace, peace," when he had presented himself as fighting under the banners of a fiend from which Mr. T. turned with fear and dismay. Look on the page of history, and tell me (said Mr. T.) what has been the most fruitful cause of war, of rapine, and of death? Has it been any other than this struggle for the balance of power? Desolation has, in all ages, marked its existence, and hecatombs of slaughtered victims have been raised to appease its fury. Sir, said he, it is a monster that feasts on the bodies of mangled carcasses, and swills on human blood. And has it come to this, that we are now to enter into this struggle for power? And against whom do gentlemen propose to carry on this war? Against brethren—members of the same common family. It might be natural to wish to elevate ourselves to a superiority of power in reference to foreign nations; but it is unnatural, to say the least of it, for one section of a common country to entertain a wish of the sort in reference to the rest. Equality is all that can be asked for, and that equality is secured to each State of this Union by the Constitution of the land. But what is the character of the power sought now to be obtained by the gentleman and his associates? Do they want to secure to the non-slaveholding States a preponderance in the National Legislature? We have been told correctly by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) that they already have the preponderance of twenty odd votes. This, then, it is obvious, cannot be the power, for the acquisition of which they are ready to undertake this crusade against the South and West. I, said Mr. T. follow but the inference which the member from New York (Mr. STORRS) has drawn, when I express the hypothesis, that it must be a power of a different character which gentlemen are in pursuit of. It may be their purpose to elevate to high stations some particular favorites. Some may be prompted by the "patriotic ambition" of the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. CUSHMAN,) an ambition which may be sorely disappointed by the settlement of this question at the present session. I will not ascribe any such motive to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have heretofore admired him for his talents, and I will not permit myself to indulge too hastily an unfavorable impression towards him.

But what can a majority of this House hope to gain by this unhallowed struggle? It is a game at which only a few can win, and all that will remain to the majority of the actors in this drama will be the slave-like privilege of worshipping at the feet of an idol. And has it come to this, that, instead of looking to the advancement of our country's happiness, we shall now use our efforts to advance the political views of an individual? I should be willing to sacrifice myself on the altar of my country, for the common good. I idolize the institutions of this highly favored land; but I never will consent to become the idolater of any man on earth. I know but of one rule to govern me in selecting men for office, and it is found in the wisdom, intelligence, and virtue of the candidate. Whether he be born in Massachusetts or Virginia, is a consideration unworthy of being taken into the estimate. If, then, there be a man in this House or nation, governed by motives of a different character, in the name of virtue and patriotism, I demand that he shall abjure them.

The gentleman, (Mr. SERGEANT,) as another reason for postponing this question to the next session of Congress, urged the propriety of submitting it to the people, and intimated that they might be dissatisfied with a decision now. No man, said Mr. T., holds in higher reverence the wishes of the people than I do. The wishes of my constituents on any subject other than a constitutional question, would be my law. But they have elected us to act for them, and on this subject they leave us uninstructed. While it would but answer the end of our agency here to bow to their will, when properly expressed, it would be worse than degrading for us to hesitate about acting, lest we might incur their displeasure. In such a case as this, what would be the weight of their displeasure? Our country is agitated from one end of it to the other; a state of things exists calculated to fill the mind of the patriot with awful forebodings of the future; a breach has been made in the affections of this people for each other, which every day serves but to enlarge. Is there a man who hears me, who would not be willing, like another Curtius, to devote himself to destruction to heal this breach? Would you prefer the ephemeral popularity of the hour to the renown which lasts for ages? Our lineage would give the lie to such a slander. No, sir; let us not delay to settle this question, and forever. The gentleman tells us the majority alone will make a sacrifice by voting for any proposition of compromise. What is the fact? The South contends that Missouri should be instantly admitted into the Union; the North cannot agree to this, because it describes something in the constitution repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The answer to this objection has been repeated over and over again. If such, in truth, be the fact, let her come into the Union, and the Constitution of the United States will vindicate its own supremacy. Your objection, however, still remains unshaken, and you propose that she shall be admitted, upon the condition that her Legislature shall pass no law violatory of the Constitution of the Union. We meet you on this half-way ground, and close in with your proposition. Now, sir, where is the sacrifice of principle on either side? You guard the Constitution from infraction, and we have no hesitancy in uniting with you in this good work. If, then, gentlemen are sincere in the objection which they raise, that objection may readily be removed, and I will still entertain the hope that this session will not terminate without the final adjustment of this odious subject.

The question being taken on agreeing to the proposed amendment, the Chairman pronounced the division to be in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 73.

The Committee then rose, and reported the amendment to the House; and the question being put on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, the vote was as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The resolution from the Senate being then again read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the State of Missouri shall be, and is hereby declared, one of the United States of America, and is admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give the assent of Congress to any provision in the constitution of Missouri (if any such there be) which contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

Mr. STORRS moved to amend the same as follows, viz: Strike out from the word "declared" the balance of the resolution, and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

"To be admitted into the Union as one of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, on the first day of the next session of Congress: Provided, That it shall be taken as a fundamental condition upon which the said State shall be incorporated into the Union, and to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof, this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State, which shall impair or contravene the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured by the Constitution of the United States to any persons who now are, or hereafter may be, citizens of other States, or to prevent such persons from removing to, and settling in, said State: And, provided further, That the Legislature, acting under the constitution already adopted in Missouri as a State, shall, as a convention, (for which purpose the consent of Congress is hereby granted) declare their assent by a public act to the said condition, before the next session of Congress, and transmit to Congress an attested copy of such act by the first day of the next session of Congress."

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the motion by striking out the words "on the first day of the next session," where they first occur; and the motion was agreed to—78 votes to 71.

Mr. FLOYD moved to amend the amendment so as to make it read "citizens of the United States," instead of "citizens of other States." This motion was negatived by 79 votes to 70.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend the proposed amendment by striking out of it the words "or to prevent such persons from moving to and settling in said State." This motion was negatived by 79 votes to 70.

Mr. BARBOUR then moved to amend the said amendment by striking out the following words, viz: "That no law shall ever be enacted by the said State which shall impair or contravene the rights, privileges, and immunities, secured by the Constitution of the United States to any persons who now are, or hereafter may be, citizens of the other States," and, in lieu thereof, inserting "that no law which may be passed by the said State shall be so construed as to impair or contravene the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured to citizens of the other States by the Constitution of the United States."

On the question being taken so to amend the amendment, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. CUTHBERT having called for a division of the question on Mr. STORRS's amendment, so as to take it first on agreeing to the following words:

"To be admitted into the Union as one of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, on the first day of the next session of Congress: Provided, That it shall be taken as a fundamental condition upon which the said State shall be incorporated into the Union, and to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State which shall impair or contravene the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured by the Constitution of the United States to any persons who now are, or hereafter may be, citizens of other States"—

The question was so taken accordingly, and decided by yeas and nays as follows:

So the first part of the amendment was rejected, and the remainder fell to the ground of course.

Mr. S. MOORE then moved to amend the resolution of the Senate by striking out the proviso thereto annexed, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That the following conditions be taken as fundamental conditions and terms upon which the said State is incorporated into the Union, namely: that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted by the people of Missouri to the consideration of Congress, shall, as soon as the provisions of said constitution will admit, be expunged, or so amended that it shall not be applicable to citizens of any State in this Union; and that, until expunged or so amended, no law passed in conformity thereto shall be construed to extend to any citizen of either State in this Union.

This motion was negatived—ayes 56.

Mr. CLAY, then, seeing that all effort at amendment had failed, and anxious to make a last effort to settle this distracting question, moved to refer the Senate's resolution to a committee of thirteen members.

This motion was agreed to, and the following gentlemen were appointed a committee accordingly:

Messrs. Clay, of Ky.,	Messrs. Archer, of Va.,
Eustis of Mass.,	Hackley of N. Y.,
Smith of Md.,	S. Moore, of Pa.,
Sergeant, of Pa.,	Cobb, of Ga.,
Lowndes, of S. C.	Tomlinson, of Con.,
Ford, of N. Y.,	Butler, of N. H., and Campbell, of Ohio.

SATURDAY, February 3.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John H. Mebane, deceased; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. SERGEANT also made the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the report of the Committee for the District of Columbia, upon the subject of lotteries, make the following report:

That they concur in the opinion expressed by the Committee for the District of Columbia, that it is not necessary or expedient for Congress now to interfere; they therefore offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was concurred in by the House.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the same committee, to which was also referred a bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act passed on the 11th day of May, 1820, entitled 'An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes,'" reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MALLARY, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States respecting the progress and expenditures of the Commissioners under the fifth, sixth, and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent, made a report, accompanied by a bill to establish the salaries of the Commissioners and agents appointed under the Treaty of Ghent; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs were discharged from the consideration of the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, respecting the exposed state of the commerce of the United States in the Pacific Ocean, and it was referred to the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting a list of the names of those persons who were indebted to his department on the 31st December, 1816, and the amount then due from each person; also, the names of those, who, since that time, have become, and were indebted to the said department on the 30th day of September last, and the amount then due from each person; prepared and rendered in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 30th of November last; which letter and lists were referred to the committee appointed on the 19th of December, to inquire into the concerns of the General Post Office.

The Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill to incorporate the United States Naval Fraternal Association for the relief of the families of deceased officers, were discharged, and the said bill was committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill to authorize the inhabitants of the District of Columbia to form a frame of government.

Mr. McLANE submitted the following resolution, which of course lies on the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the bounties and allowances paid to fishing vessels each year, from the commencement of the Government to the present time.

OHIO AND THE UNITED STATES BANK.

Mr. ROSS, after some remarks in favor of the propriety of the course which he was about to propose, founded on the importance of the subject to the particular State and to the Union, moved that the communication from the Governor of Ohio, received a few days ago, and the report of a committee of the Legislature relative to the controversy between that State and the Bank of the United States, be printed for the use of the members of this House.

Mr. TRIMBLE rose only to ask information from the Chair. He had no information of any case in which a paper of this description had been ordered to be printed. The object of printing a paper was to enable members to understand subjects pending before the House, and by it referred to committees, who would in due time report thereon. This subject was one upon which the House was not called upon to act in the usual course of legislation. He wished to know from the Chair, whether any case had occurred in which the House had ordered a paper to be printed, when it was distinctly understood that no legislative proceeding was in contemplation? and whether it was usual to print any paper, referring to the concerns of a corporation, and not the public interests? If there was any precedent, he would vote for printing the document, but if not, he would vote against it.

Mr. McCOR also opposed it, because the document was already ordered to be printed by the Senate, by which each member of this House would be furnished with a copy of it, and it was, therefore, unnecessary to incur the expense of having it printed again for this House.

The motion to print was supported by Mr. SLOAN, for the reason that the document was of great importance so far as regarded the question of State rights; and though he was aware that no legislative act would grow out of it here, it related to a controversy which had been much misrepresented, and was much misunderstood; and he hoped, in justice to the State, it would be permitted to be printed, that misconception might be as far as practicable corrected.

Mr. BALDWIN adverted to the resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, relative to the Bank of the United States, which had been referred to a committee of this House, at the last session, and were now before it; the document from Ohio was calculated to elucidate that subject, and therefore was a proper one to be printed for the information of members on the matter before them.

The motion to print the papers, was agreed to—ayes 63, noes 37.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to go into Committee on the general appropriation bill, but temporarily withdrew his motion, at the request of Mr. CLAY.

SOUTH AMERICAN STATES.

Mr. CLAY then rose to make a motion. It would be recollected, he said, by the House, that, by a majority very decisive, a resolution was adopted at the last session, declaring it expedient to make an appropriation, by law, for a mission to such of the Governments of South America as had established their independence. It remained for the House to carry that resolution into effect; and he thought that it was a solemn duty of this House to give complete effect to its own decision. He rose, therefore, to move that the resolution adopted at the last session be referred to the same Committee of the whole House to which was referred the bill making appropriations for the support of Government, that it might come up for consideration, in a regular manner, and a clause be inserted in that bill to accomplish the object of the resolution. Mr. C. made this motion to prevent the imputation of taking the House by surprise. Conceiving it proper to act in the spirit of that resolution, he now proposed the preliminary step.

The motion was agreed to without a division, though not without dissenting voices.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The House then, on motion of Mr. SMITH, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceeded to the consideration of the several appropriation bills referred to it.

The first bill taken up was the bill making appropriations for the public buildings, (according to the recommendations contained in the report of a select committee on that subject.) A good deal of discussion took place on some of the items of the bill, particularly that which proposed $7,000 for covering the President's house with copper. This, however, as well as the other appropriations proposed by the select committee, was eventually agreed to; and the committee proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1820.

On opening the first item of this bill, the Missouri question was discovered lurking in it!

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, having moved to fill the first blank in the bill with $314,866, to defray the expense and compensation to the Senate and House of Representatives, their officers, and attendants—

Mr. COBB moved to fill the blank with a smaller sum, presuming that the sum moved by Mr. SMITH was founded on estimates including the Delegate from Missouri. As there was no such Delegate recognised on the floor of the House, the appropriation ought to be diminished accordingly.

A good deal of desultory debate followed on this proposition, the leading features only of which are sketched below.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether the sum which he had proposed was intended to cover the pay for the Senators from Missouri.

Mr. SMITH said, the sum was proposed in conformity with the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, and was not predicated on any additional expenditure, as the State of Missouri had not been admitted. But at any rate the sum would be sufficient, because there was always, from the absence, the sickness at home, or the death of members, a considerable surplus left.

H. of R.

General Appropriation Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Mr. McLEAN said, the gentleman from Missouri did not present himself as the Delegate, but as the Representative from that State. Mr. McL. went on to remark, that this question about Missouri met them at every step, and in every shape; and it really would be better to postpone this bill, and, indeed, all other important bills, until that embarrassing question could be settled. With that view he moved that the Committee now rise, and report progress.

Mr. TYLER coincided in opinion with Mr. McLEAN, and hoped the motion would prevail, especially as the public interest could not suffer from a little delay in passing the bill.

Mr. BALDWIN hoped the Committee would not rise. The clause in question did not go into items at all, and it could not, therefore, well give rise to the question concerning Missouri, which had been started by the gentleman from Georgia.

The motion for the Committee to rise was negatived—ayes 31.

Mr. TRIMBLE spoke, to show that Mr. COBB would gain nothing, if he should even carry his motion to reduce the appropriation. The appropriation was made as though Missouri was a State; if she were not admitted into the Union as such, she must be abandoned altogether, or must be legislated for as a Territory, and that question would with more propriety come up in another part of the bill, making provision for the Territories. He thought it not necessary, therefore, to impede the bill by pressing this motion.

Mr. COBB observed, in substance, that the sum proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was either too large or too small. If intended to provide for Missouri as a State it was too small, as it did not provide for the Senators; and if otherwise, it was too large. He did not wish to bring up at all the question concerning the present character or condition of Missouri, but he did not think it right to appropriate for a Delegate unless for the Senators also.

Mr. LOWNDES remarked, that whether they took the larger or the smaller sum was immaterial, as either would be sufficient for the object in any event; there being always a balance of the appropriation left from this branch of the expenditure. The adoption, therefore, of either sum proposed, could involve no question relative to Missouri.

Mr. McCULLOUGH did not conceive that the appropriation involved the Missouri question at all. They made appropriations for the Senate and House of Representatives generally, without undertaking to say who were Senators and members. Such as were so would come forward and receive their pay, and no others. This appropriation was intended for the current year; if Missouri should be admitted, her members in both Houses would be paid of course; if not, the money would remain in the Treasury.

Mr. TRIMBLE said, the gentleman had told the Committee how the members were to be paid if that State should be admitted; but suppose Missouri should not be admitted, Mr. T. asked, how her Senators and members were to draw their pay then?

Mr. McCULLOUGH was understood to say, in reply, that if the State were not admitted her Senators could not be paid under this appropriation; and that it would require a special vote of Congress to authorize them to draw pay.

Mr. LIVERMORE, by way of obviating all difficulty, moved an amendment, containing a separate appropriation of the necessary sum for the Senators and member from Missouri.

This motion was agreed to—yeas 50, nays 44.

The Committee then proceeded with the bill; on many of the items of which, as usual, there was a good deal of debate, particularly in regard to the salaries of different officers in the Executive departments at the seat of Government; but no motion was made but the following:

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, objected to the appropriation for the salary of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, ($3,500,) which he thought entirely too high, considering the nature of his duties; he protested against abandoning the fortifications, and other useful establishments, for the sake of economy, and yet maintain such extravagance in the salaries of the civil officers. Mr. J. moved to reduce the appropriation to $2,500.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. COBB, ROBERTSON, and others, on the ground that the appropriation was authorized by law, and that if this, or any other salary was too high, the proper mode was to reduce it by law, and not by refusing an appropriation, so long as the expenditure was legally authorized.

Mr. JOHNSON finally withdrew his motion; and the Committee spent some time longer on the bill, and made considerable progress in filling up the items of appropriation. Before the bill was got through, however, the Committee was left nearly without a quorum, and the usual hour of adjournment having arrived, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

MONDAY, February 5.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Nathan Ford," made a report thereon, recommending that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which report was read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. Hooks, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him some days ago, calling for certain information respecting the Marine corps, and agreed thereto.

The House then took up the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill making certain appropriations for the Public Buildings; and, though not without considerable objections to some of the items, the report of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then again resolved into a Committee of the Whole, on the General Appropriation Bill for the current year.

H. OF R.

The discussion of the bill, or rather of particular items of it, occupied the whole day.

A motion was made by Mr. COCKE, to strike out the clause proposing an appropriation for the clerk to the Attorney General. On this motion there took place a debate, which ended in a rejection of the motion.

On the question to fill the blank reported by the committee, ($1 000,) it was decided in the negative. The blank was then filled with $800.

The appropriation of $1,000 for the salary of the reporter of the Supreme Court, was objected to by Mr. HARDIN, but was agreed to.

In the course of proceeding to agree to the several items of appropriation, as moved by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, it appeared, from the statement of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, that it was expected that our Minister to France might return within the present year, and, therefore, an appropriation was asked for an outfit for a Minister to France. It also appeared that, for the present, it was not contemplated to send a Minister to replace Mr. Graham, our late Minister to Rio Janeiro, but that the United States were to be represented there by a Chargé des Affaires.

In the course of the debate a motion was made, by Mr. TARR, to amend the bill, by inserting the following item:

"For the erection of a bridge over the Monongahela river, where the Cumberland road crosses the same, the unexpended balance of the money heretofore appropriated for completing the Cumberland road."

This motion gave rise to much debate; in the course of which it appeared that there remains, of the money appropriated for the completion of the Cumberland road, an unexpended balance of seventy thousand dollars. It is supposed that the proposed bridge will cost $40,000. The Secretary of the Treasury had not thought it proper to cause the bridge to be erected, without express authority from Congress.

The gentlemen who engaged in the debate were, Messrs. BALDWIN, ROSS, SMITH, of Maryland, HARDIN, TARR, MCCOY, MERCER, ROBERTSON, COBB, BRUSH, McLANE, SERGEANT, BROWN, CLAY, BEECHER, and RHEA.

Mr. McCULLOUGH moved to amend this amendment by adding the following: "and for repairing the road from Chambersburg to Pittsburg — dollars."

This motion was negatived.

Mr. ARCHER then, to obviate some difficulties which gentlemen had stated, moved to amend the amendment, by adding to it a clause to the following effect: "Provided, That the unexpended balance shall be sufficient to complete the bridge."

Mr. TARR accepted this amendment as part of his motion.

After further debate the amendment, as amended, was finally negatived, by 65 votes to 60.

Mr. RANKIN moved to amend the bill, by inserting the following clause:

"For opening, under the direction of the Secretary at War, a road from a point near Columbus, on the United States military road, to a point near Turner

Brashears' stand, on the old road leading from Natchez to Nashville, five thousand dollars of an unexpended balance of an appropriation made by an act of Congress of the 27th of March, 1818, for the purpose "of repairing and keeping in repair so much of the road leading from Columbia, in the State of Tennessee, to Madisonville, in the State of Louisiana, as lies within the Indian country."

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SILSBEE, aided by Mr. LINCOLN, the House agreed to increase the appropriation for the contingent expenses of Congress one thousand dollars, for the purpose of erecting a monument over the grave of the late Vice President Gerry, who died and was buried in Washington City, during his term of service.

At a late hour the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again, on motion of Mr. CLAY, who was prepared to move an amendment, respecting a mission to South America, but thought the hour too late, and the House too thin.

TUESDAY, February 6.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of sundry mechanics and others, concerned in building in the City of Washington, praying for the passage of an act giving mechanics, and persons furnishing materials for buildings, a lien on the property on which such house may be built, to secure the payment of their respective accounts; which petition was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of William Bartlett and John Stearns, and others; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Coffee," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire whether or not the Military Academy, under the existing laws and regulations, is consistent with the principles and policy of the Constitution and Government of the United States; also, to inquire into the expediency of repealing or altering the laws in relation to said Academy, and reducing the expenditures of the public money on the same.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the Committee of Ways and Means was instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, any clerk, or other officer of the departments, from entering, either directly or indirectly, into any contract with the Government of the United States.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings," was read a third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Samuel Tucker, late a Captain in the Navy of the United States;" and "An act authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States in the City of Washington;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed by three resolutions adopted by this House on the 3d ultimo, to inquire and report "whether, in their opinion, the permanent revenue is adequate to the expenses of Government; whether any measures are necessary to increase the revenue; and, if so, to report those measures; and into the expediency of prohibiting or imposing additional duties on the importation of foreign spirits, and imposing an excise on domestic distilled spirits," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table; and that 3,000 copies thereof be printed for the use of the members of Congress. The report is as follows:

That they have had these important subjects under their consideration, and have obtained from the several departments all the information which the officers at their head could furnish; yet, such are the difficulties that present themselves, that they enter into the discussion and the statements necessary to elucidate the subject with great diffidence. They may differ in opinion with gentlemen for whose talents they have the highest respect, and in whose integrity they have unbounded confidence; the subject is one, however, on which the best friends may fairly differ in opinion.

Is the permanent revenue adequate to the expenses of the Government?

The revenue is mainly bottomed on the duties arising on the importations of foreign goods; it is, therefore, dependent on fortuitous circumstances, which cannot easily be foreseen, and which may tend to its increase or decrease; there are some, however, which can, in a degree, be appreciated. The tariff of 1816 was expected to operate a loss to the revenue, by giving what was considered at the time sufficient encouragement to the manufactures of the country. A variety of causes, arising out of excessive and ruinous importations, and the time required for diverting one channel of commerce or supplies into another, has, until lately, prevented the effect from being materially felt. The operation of that tariff is now beginning to be known, and the effect on the revenue is believed to be considerable; its extent is, however, not completely developed. Its operation on a few of the principal articles may afford some idea of the increase of our manufactures, and the consequent decrease of the revenue resulting from the duties on the importation of such articles.

The tariff of 1816 increased the duty on brown sugar about 20 per cent., and gave a protecting duty to that article of 3 cents per pound. No material decrease has, as yet, resulted to the revenue therefrom. The tariff was enacted during the existence of the excise on domestic distilled spirits, and an additional duty was imposed for the protection of the domestic article. The excise on imported spirits was repealed; the duty was continued; and the duty on foreign spirits exceeds, at this time, the whole value of the domestic; the average duty on the imported being 43 cents per gallon, when the value in the market of the domestic does not exceed 33 cents the gallon. This has tended, it is believed, to decrease the consumption of foreign spirits, and, of course, the amount of the revenue. In 1818, the net revenue from imported spirits, after deducting the debentures, amounted to $2,616,186, and in 1819 to $1,959,125.

The tariff of 1816 raised the duties on cotton and woollen cloths from 12½ per cent., the duty imposed prior to the late war, to 25 per cent., and it valued all cotton cloths under a cost of 25 cents the square yard (although some cost as low as 6 cents) as if they had actually cost 25 cents, and charged the duty thereon accordingly. The result has been, that cotton goods imported from India, under a cost of 25 cents the square yard, pay a duty exceeding 60 per cent. on the average cost of those heretofore imported from that country, and above 40 per cent. on the average cost of similar goods when imported from Europe. The operation has had a salutary effect on our infant manufactures of cotton, which begins to be understood by the manufacturers. The importations from India of such cottons as are under a cost of 25 cents the square yard have almost ceased for consumption, and those from Europe have decreased, it is believed, to a considerable extent. The coarse cottons of our domestic manufactures have entered, it is believed, into the consumption of the nation, nearly equal to the wants of the people. The increase of our woollen manufactures has afforded a considerable quantity of woollen cloths for consumption, but we have no information on which to form a decided opinion as to its extent. Other important articles of domestic manufacture are silently entering into competition with those heretofore imported from foreign nations. These circumstances, added to the distresses of the people, and to the price of our exports, being such as in a great degree to affect the means of paying for imports, make it extremely difficult to form a correct estimate of the revenue which may arise hereafter from duties on imports, estimated on that which had been received in former years.

With these views, which the committee have deemed it proper to submit, they proceed to answer the first resolution.

They are of opinion "that the revenue which will be received in the present year will be adequate to the expenses of the Government;" and, should no change take place, the revenue will, in their opinion, during the years 1822, 1823, and 1824, be not only equal to the expenses of government, but afford such a surplus, applicable to the payment of the loan of the last year, and any that may be authorized for this year, as will, before the first day of January, 1825, fully repay the amount borrowed. The House will remember that, as the appropriation bills have not passed, the real or true expenses of Government cannot be correctly stated. The committee are compelled, therefore, to bottom their statement on the estimated expenses, as submitted to Congress, which will, it is confidently believed, be reduced at least one and a half million of dollars.

It is now reduced to a certainty that the actual receipts from the customs into the Treasury, during the year 1820, has been $15,005,328, which amount, it is humbly conceived, may be safely relied on as the receipts for the present year. The committee are of opinion that the receipts of 1821 (from that source) will exceed that amount. They form that opinion from the following circumstances, to wit: the bonds for duties in the Treasury amounted, on the first day of October, 1820, to nearly the same sum as those in the Treasury on the 1st of October, 1819; that from those of 1819 an extraordinary deduction was made by the more than common amount of debentures issued on the reshipment of goods during that year; that a similar amount of drawbacks, it is believed, will not occur during the present year, and, of course, that the revenue from imports will be greater in 1821 than that of 1820; and, in this opinion, they are confirmed by the following view of the customs for the present year: Bonds in the Treasury on the first day of October, 1820 - - - - - $18,770,000

Add thereto the amounts of receipts into the Treasury from bonds taken during the last quarter of the year 1820, and taken, or to be taken, during the two succeeding quarters of 1821, which, bot-tomed on the receipts into the Treas-ury for actual receipts from bonds taken during the fourth quarter of 1819, and the first and second quarters of 1820, are estimated to give, for the present year, the sum of - - - - - 4,437,205

The committee have submitted the preceding view of the customs for 1821 for the consideration of the House, but would not be willing to pledge themselves for the result. The items they believe to be correct; and the present appearance of our commerce, becoming less unfavorable, warrants them in the belief that the revenue from customs for 1821 will not be less than sixteen millions of dollars. They, however, deem it more safe to assume the receipts of the present on that of the preceding year, and therefore submit the following statement:

Estimated receipts for 1821.

Excess of receipts over payments - - - $151,311

The preceding statements show that there will be an excess of receipts over the expenditures, even if the whole amount estimated for by the different De-partments should be granted and expended. But it is known that the amount is estimated on the pre-sumption that all the expenditures authorized by law will be required. This, however, in time of profound peace, has seldom been the case. The reform in the army, and reduction from the estimates of the several Departments, will amount at least to one and a half million of dollars, and thus confirm the opinion ex-pressed by the committee, "that the revenue for 1821 will be fully adequate to the expenses of Government for that year."

The committee submit their views for the succeeding years of 1822, 1823, and 1824, to prove the opinion that the revenue will be fully equal to the payment of the expenses of Government during those years. In addition to the statement given of the receipts from customs for the year 1821, and with the view of further elucidating the subject, they submit the following statement of the receipts derived from the customs, land, &c., for the years 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820; three of those years are known to be the minimum years, the fourth not uncommonly productive.

In 1817 the customs produced net -	$17,524,778
In 1818 the customs produced net -	21,828,431
In 1819 the customs produced net -	17,116,702

$71,475,239, averaged on four years, gives for one year - - - - - $17,868,809

Although your committee think it probable that the average receipts from the customs, during those four years, will be realized for the years 1822, 1823, and 1824, yet, under the uncertainty arising from the view already given, they consider it more safe to as-sume a less amount, and therefore submit the follow-ing statement of receipts and expenditures as one which they have full confidence may be relied upon for 1822, 1823, and 1824.

leaving a surplus of $5,673,324 per annum, from which will be deducted the interest on any loan that may be authorized during the present year.

The preceding view will show that the committee, in answer to the second question, to wit: "Whether any measures are necessary to increase the revenue?" are of opinion that the revenue is amply adequate to the expenses of the Government, and, of course, that no measure for its increase is necessary.

To the third resolution, to wit: "Is it expedient to prohibit or impose additional duties on the importation of foreign spirits, and to impose an excise on domestic spirits?" the committee answer, that the revenue from imported spirits amounted in 1818 to $2,646,486, and in the year 1819 to the sum of $1,959,125; and it is believed that that of the year 1820 will not amount to the sum received in 1819. But the committee are of opinion that the imposition of an excise, at this time of extreme distress, would be unwise, and is not demanded by the condition of the Treasury; and that, if imposed, it would be difficult to collect; and, if collected, it would, in some parts of the Union, be in paper little available to the Treasury. They therefore submit their opinion against any immediate imposition of an excise on domestic spirits, or of any new duty on, or prohibition of, the importation of foreign spirits.

The committee have thus far confined themselves to the answering of the three resolutions referred to them, they have, however, deemed it not improper, whilst on the subject, to submit their views of the financial state of the Treasury.

The demands on the Treasury, necessary to complete the payments for the year 1820, are—

For civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous -	$855,905 00
Public debt - - -	2,076,913 15

From which must be deducted, agreeably to the same letter, the amount of money in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent for that Department, on the 1st of January, the sum of -	251,565 30
	$440,720 45
From which is to be deducted—	5,055,366 17
Amount of money in the Treasury on the 1st day of January	$1,076,271 18
Less the notes of insolvent banks, which will not be available during the present year - - -	600,000 00
	Leaving of available funds in the Treasury, on the 1st of January - -
	$476,271 18
Balance against the Treasury, on the 1st day of the present year - -	$4,579,094 99

The committee believe the above statement to be accurate, and that the balance against the Treasury on the first day of the present year amounted to the sum of $4,579,094 99; that balance will, it is believed by your committee, be reduced by retrenchment in expenditures, as already stated, to an amount not less than one and a half million, which will reduce the actual deficit to be provided for to the sum of three millions seventy-nine thousand ninety-four dollars and ninety-nine cents; say three millions seventy-nine thousand and ninety-four dollars and ninety-nine cents. But if the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury should prove correct, to wit: That the customs of 1821 will produce only fourteen millions, then the two years will show the following result:

Deficit, as above, on the 1st January	$4,579,094 99
Excess of expenses over receipts in the year 1821, estimated on the demands made by the several Departments, conformably with the existing laws -	854,017 00
	$5,433,111 99
From which deduct amount of expected retrenchment - - -	1,500,000 00
	$3,933,111 99

The item of $854,017 will be found in the difference of $1,005,328 between the Secretary's estimates of the receipts from customs in the year 1821, and that of your committee; from which must be deducted the excess of receipts over expenditures of $151,311, in the view they have taken above of the receipts and expenditures of 1821, which will leave the item of $864,017.

In this last view, bottomed on the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury for the receipts in the present year, there appears to be an actual deficit in the two years of 1820 and 1821 of $5,433,111 99, from which the committee believe that there may be deducted for retrenchment $1,500,000, which will leave the sum of $3,933,111 99 to be provided for.

The committee have deemed it proper to give to the House these two views of the subject. If the estimates of the Secretary of $14,000,000 from the customs should prove correct, the amount to be provided for will be, as already stated, $3,933,111 99.

If that of your committee should appear to the House as one to be relied upon, then the amount to be provided for will be $3,079,094 99. The committee ask leave to observe that a more accurate view of the actual amount to be provided for will be taken by your committee, if the appropriation bills shall pass in time to afford the opportunity.

The House have been correctly informed by the Secretary of the Treasury, that it requires time to transfer the money received in the Western States and in Louisiana, to the Treasury, for which the Secretary asks the aid of $600,000; that difficulty will, in the opinion of your committee, be surmounted by the amount of appropriations which will remain unclaimed at the expiration of the present year. The unclaimed demands of appropriations at the expiration of each year have, on an average of years, amounted to about three millions of dollars; but, as the appropriations for the present year will be of a kind that will be called for to a greater proportionate amount than those of former years, it would be unsafe to calculate on a larger amount than that which would afford the time necessary to draw the funds from the States mentioned; but to that amount, say six hundred thousand dollars, and to meet unforeseen demands on the Treasury, the committee are of opinion that the appropriations unexpended at the end of the present year will be amply adequate, and therefore they do not recommend any provision therefor.

The House will duly appreciate the difficulties under which the committee have acted, and will pardon unintentional errors, if any. The committee will only add, that they have used every exertion in their power to arrive at a correct view of the important subjects submitted to their consideration. All which they respectfully submit.

REDUCTION OF SALARIES.

Mr. CULBRETH, from the committee appointed on the 13th ultimo, to inquire if any, and what, salaries in the civil department may be reduced, consistently with the public interest, reported a bill to reduce the salaries, and fix a maximum of the compensation of certain officers and other persons employed in the civil department of the Government; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, in lieu of the salaries now allowed by law to the following officers, and other persons, employed in the civil department of the Government, there shall be paid to them, quarterly, the following annual salaries, respectively, and no more; that is to say, to the Secretary of State, five thousand dollars; to the Secretary of the Treasury, five thousand dollars; to the Secretary of War, five thousand dollars; to the Secretary of the Navy, five thousand dollars; to the Attorney General, three thousand dollars; to the Postmaster General, three thousand five hundred dollars; to the Assistant Postmaster General, and additional Assistant Postmaster General, each two thousand dollars; to the Commissioners of the Navy Board, each three thousand dollars; to the Naval Constructors, each two thousand dollars; to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, three thousand dollars; to the Librarian, one thousand dollars; to the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, one thousand five hundred dollars; to the Superintendent of the Patent Office, one thousand dollars; to the clerk of the Attorney General, five hundred dollars; to the clerk of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, five hundred dollars; and to the clerk of the Superintendent of the Patent Office, five hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the salaries of each of the officers and clerks of the Senate and House of Representatives, and of each and every other officer, clerk, or other person, employed in any of the public offices, at the Seat of Government, not herein particularly designated, shall be reduced twenty per centum from the respective amounts now allowed by law.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the annual salaries and other compensation or emoluments, now allowed by law to each or any of the following officers, after deducting therefrom the necessary expenditures incident to their respective offices, shall exceed the following sums: that is to say, to the Collectors of the Customs, four thousand dollars; to the Naval Officers, three thousand dollars; to the Surveyors of the Customs, two thousand five hundred dollars; to the Registers of the Land Offices, two thousand five hundred dollars; to the Receivers of Public Moneys at the several Land Offices, two thousand five hundred dollars—the several surplusses shall be accounted for, and paid by them, respectively, to the Treasury of the United States: Provided, always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to fines, forfeitures, and penalties, under the revenue laws of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the salaries of Military and Naval Storekeepers shall be limited not to exceed six hundred dollars each.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the operation of this act shall commence and take effect from and after the fourth day of March next, and that so much of any and every act, heretofore passed upon the subject, as is inconsistent with, or repugnant to the provisions herein contained, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, from and after that date.

SOUTH AMERICAN STATES.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the General Appropriation bill.

Mr. CLAY moved the amendment, which he a few days ago intimated it to be his intention to propose to the bill, and was as follows:

“For an outfit and one year's salary to such Minister as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may send to any Government of South America, which has established and is maintaining its independency on Spain, a sum not exceeding $18,000.”

Mr. CLAY followed his motion with a speech of more than an hour's length in its support.

Mr. LOWNDES submitted briefly the reasons why he conceived the adoption of the proposition at this time inexpedient, and the mode of obtaining the object improper.

[The following is the substance of the remarks made by Mr. ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, on the 6th and 9th of February, on the motion to appropriate eighteen thousand dollars for an outfit and salary for a Minister to South America.]

I regret (said Mr. ROBERTSON) the necessity which impels me to a participation in this discussion. While my feelings strongly incline me to silence, my judgment commands me, in self-justification, to obtrude on your patience a brief explanation of the reasons which influence my vote. If I could support the motion, I would be content with a silent affirmative; but, feeling it my duty to oppose it, it is proper, and perhaps necessary, that I should vindicate myself, lest some persons, recollecting the vote which I gave last Winter on the South American resolution, and, not understanding the intent and import of that vote, and the operation of that which I am now required to give, might charge me with inconsistency—with dereliction of principle, or the influence of motives inconsistent with the character which, if I have earned, I am unwilling to lose.

Whatever my conduct on the subject might (if unexplained) indicate, to those who do not understand the real character of the resolution of last session, and the tendency of this motion, or who will not analyze them, I flatter myself that all who will take the pains to comprehend them fully, will see in it consistency instead of inconsistency—constancy to principle, instead of any aberration from it, and a just attention to my own constitutional rights and duties, instead of an encroachment, either wanton or inadvertent, on those of a co-ordinate department of the Government.

However paradoxical it may appear to a superficial observer, yet, I feel a strong confidence that a thorough knowledge of the design and effects of the two propositions will, while it approves the vote which I gave on the resolution, maintain the propriety of that which I shall give on this motion, and show, not only that both will be excusable, but right, and that the latter is required by a regard as well to consistency as propriety.

I have not changed any opinion which I entertained last Winter, in relation to this subject, nor am I less animated now by the feelings and wishes which I then cherished. But I think that the resolution then, and the motion now, are radically different.

The motives which recommended the adoption of the former, cannot be connected with the latter; indeed they will not justify it. They do not even exist. All the ends which the resolution was designed to produce, have been accomplished. If this motion be intended for the same purposes, it is unnecessary; if, for others, they are ascertained to be either impracticable or unconstitutional in their operation. Wherefore, I believe that, while the resolution was justified by the ends it was intended to answer, this motion is indefensible by the same consideration, or by any argument of expediency or constitutionality. This I expect to show. The one was auxiliary, the other will be supererogatory or coercive.

I do not mean to say that such is the object of the motion, but that such must and will be its operation and construction. And this is confirmed, not only by the nature of the proposition, but by some traits of the eloquent speech just concluded by my colleague (Mr. CLAY) in support of his motion. The only feature which I shall now take notice of, is his declaration, that "the resolution of last session was an expression of public sentiment which no monarch in Europe would ever have dared to disregard."

This indicates that he is surprised that the resolution did not induce the President to recognise the Patriots, and that he intends, by this motion, (if adopted,) to urge him still more persuasively to do what he is unwilling to do. This would be a reasonable inference from the remark. Yet I hope such a construction was not intended; because it argues a spirit of dictation and unconstitutional coercion; and I am sure that such a sentiment was not only not expressed last Winter, but was disavowed; and I am equally sure that, if it had not been disavowed, the resolution could not have been adopted. The tone of the speech made at the last session, in favor of the resolution, by its mover, was materially different from that which characterizes the one which he first made to-day in support of his motion. Then, he announced his object only to be an abstract expression of our sympathies with the Patriots, for their encouragement, and of our will for relief to the Executive: and he positively disavowed any wish that it should be construed into dictation or even a recommendation to the President. Now he seems to consider it as an enunciation of public sentiment which the President was bound to obey; and, consequently, that its reiteration now may be coercive. Although this discrepancy will tend to show the reasons of my vote last session and now, yet I regret that it has occurred; because the design which it might indicate, in my colleague, is inconsistent with the elevation of character which so pre-eminently distinguishes him, and the candor and disinterestedness which have so signally marked his political career. I wish not to be misunderstood. I do not intend to intimate that he has any other object than what he has announced. I am not willing to suspect him for any other. But others, less friendly to him, when they observe the tone of his speech, delivered to-day, and its discordancy with that of last Winter, and examine the character and effect of his motion, might apprehend that the motives which stimulate his efforts are not such as become him, or ought to be encouraged.

Before I state my objections to the proposed appropriation, and the circumstances which distinguish it from the resolution adopted last Winter, I must notice the speech to-day, for another purpose. It intimated that the vote on this motion will be a test of the feelings of this House towards the Patriots, and of its opinions on the subject of their recognition. This might have been one of the effects of the resolution—but this motion cannot draw the line between the friends of the Patriots and their enemies; because, however friendly we may be to the success of the Patriots, we cannot do them any service by the adoption of the motion. Whatever we may think about their recognition, we cannot recognise by any vote we can give: and because this motion will be opposed on grounds which have no connexion with our feelings or opinions in regard to the South American struggle. Besides, in regard to myself, I must say that I feel as much solicitude for the independence of Spanish America now as I ever did; and I have given some evidence of the deep interest I have felt on that subject. While I am not an enthusiast or madman on that interesting subject, I have no doubt that I feel as sincere and patriotic an anxiety about the ultimate results of the great struggle in South America as any prudent or rational man does or ought to feel, in this House or this nation. It is, indeed, as it has been so feelingly denominated by its distinguished advocate, (Mr. CLAY,) "a great, a glorious cause." It is a cause interesting to all mankind, and peculiarly so to the votaries of freedom: a cause on the issue of which are staked the dearest rights of the civilized community. In such a cause the people of this country are not, cannot be indifferent. No, sir; they feel a deep and lively interest in every incident of its progress. No one is more gratified than I am with the intelligence of the splendid conquest of Lima by Cochrane, just announced with such inspiring eloquence by my colleague. I hope that it may be true, and that the principles of enlightened liberty may march onward and triumphantly in the South, until they shall have extirpated every remnant of royalty, superstition, and despotic hierarchy, and until the whole population of Spanish America shall not only achieve their independence, but establish civil institutions, habits, and manners, adapted to secure to themselves and their posterity the full fruition of all the blessings of free government and free religion. This is a consummation most devoutly to be desired by all philanthropists of the world, whatever may be the various speculations about the capacity of the South American Spaniards to sustain free and liberal institutions until they shall have become more enlightened in the principles of civil and religious liberty; and I pray that it may soon be effected, and that the day may not be distant when the whole South American population may be seen worshipping as freemen, in the temple of freedom, and bowing as Christians at the altar of a Christian God. No man, in his sober senses, feels more anxiety for such a result than I do—not only on account of its beneficent effects on the people of the South, but also on account of the magic impulsion it would give to the people's cause, in "the great moral battle" in which the present generation are engaged, by encouraging, and inspiring, and invigorating the friends of human rights throughout the world.

But, whatever may be my feelings, my wishes, or my prayers, in so good and so great a cause, I do not consider myself permitted, by considerations of duty or prudence, to express them in this appropriation bill. I can see no desirable or Constitutional purpose to be effected by the success of the motion; and I think I can see a mischievous tendency in it.

If we could, by such an effort, achieve the independence of Spanish America, or even render it any essential service, without transcending our authority, or endangering our own safety, I would be one of the last men in this House to refuse or withhold my approbation and most cordial support. I would act with as much decision and alacrity as would become so good a purpose. But, if those who advocate the motion think that its success will contribute to accomplish, or even facilitate, the enfranchisement of South America, or that it is prudent, or safe, or Constitutional, for us to adopt it for that purpose, or any other which it can effect, I think they will find, on a careful examination of the whole subject, that they are mistaken, and that the only tendency of the measure (if it have any) will be to distract our own councils, or embarrass and coerce a co-ordinate department of the Government.

If the ends designed to be effected by the vote of last session, be the only ones which the motion to appropriate is intended to accomplish, there can be no necessity to adopt it. I see nothing to be gained by it. The avowed purposes of Congressional interposition have been accomplished. The opinions and feelings which prompted me to vote for the resolution of last session, and which I still cherish, do not require me to vote for this motion; and, when I look at the inevitable tendency of the motion, if adopted, (and if it shall have any effect at all,) I feel sure that it is inconsistent with the opinions, and motives, and purposes, avowed last session. I then went as far as I thought I had a right to go, and as far as I intended to go; I cannot be lured or forced any farther.

I acted last Winter under the influence of the motives and for the purposes then avowed by the advocates of the resolution; and, if any others had been avowed, especially such as I fear will be imputed to this motion, I would not, I could not, have supported the resolution. I cannot with certainty say what were the motives of all those who constituted the majority on that resolution, but I hazard nothing in speaking of those which, and which alone, were avowed, and those which were disavowed; which avowals and disavowals I then thought, and still believe, influenced, if not all, at least a majority of those with whom I then co-operated. And I believe I will be supported by the recollection of those who were here at the last session, when I say that those avowals and disavowals indicated a policy and a purpose which did not recommend any ulterior measure on our part, and which will not justify it now. I shall, therefore, advert to the declarations of last session, and to the character and effects of the appropriation proposed, for the purpose of showing not only that the course I am about to pursue is consistent and defensible, but that it is the only one which can be in consonance with the motives and purposes which were announced at the last session, and under the influence of which I then acted, and shall still act.

The Executive is, by the Constitution, vested with the exclusive power to nominate and to receive foreign Ministers. It will not be denied that, in the exercise of this highly responsible power, he should be free and independent, and that, so far as he is the depository of power, he, and he alone, should exert it; and that he, and he alone, is responsible for the manner in which it is exerted. No one department of the Government should embarrass, dictate to, or control any other, in the exercise of its Constitutional rights and duties. This is the theory of the Constitution, and a due and uniform adherence to its maxims is necessary to the preservation of the Constitution itself. Whenever any department is under the influence of any other, either openly or covertly exercised, the checks and balances of the Constitution are destroyed, and there is danger of a virtual metamorphosis of the Government, by a concentration of powers which are distributed in such a manner as to prevent such a tendency, if exercised honestly and independently by their Constitutional depositories.

H. OF R.

South American States.

In the exercise of the power to nominate Ministers, therefore, the President should not be instructed or awed by the House of Representatives. This view will show that the resolution of last session could not have been intended to have any coercive or dictatorial operation or construction. But this idea is fortified by the avowals and disavowals made by its mover and others who advocated it. It was adopted in the spirit of confidence in the Executive, and of co-operation with him, and acquiescence in whatever course he might, in the exercise of his own discretion and more informed judgment, think it most expedient to pursue, and not in a tone of dictation, or for the purpose of changing his opinion, or relaxing his resolution. It was not intended even to whisper advice, otherwise those who voted for it would have transcended their authority, because this House is not, and ought not to be, the adviser of the Executive. Doubts were said to exist whether the President was not deterred from sending a Minister to Spanish America, by an apprehension that public sentiment would not sustain him, and that this House would refuse an appropriation. It was also urged that the President had not the right to recognise the independence of a new Government without the assent of this House as well as of the Senate; and this is my own opinion. For the purpose, then, of giving him a pledge that public opinion would be with him, and that we would give him the money, provided he, with all the information he possessed, should think it expedient to send a Minister, and for the purpose of giving our assent to recognition, as far as we were or might be concerned in it, and not to command, or even recommend it, the resolution was introduced and adopted. It was intended only to strengthen, embolden, and disembarass the President, by an assurance of our support, and not to censure or persuade. As far as the subject of recognition was affected, these, I affirm, without fear of contradiction, were the objects, and only objects, of the resolution. At least, they were the only ones that influenced me, and the only ones that were avowed, and I assert that all others were positively disavowed. I would have opposed the resolution if I had suspected that it was intended to have, or could have, either in construction or operation, any other effect on the Executive than a simple declaration that we were willing to appropriate money, and to support and co-operate with him, if he, acting alone on his own opinion and his own responsibility, should think fit to send a Minister to Spanish America, and that we gave our assent to recognition, leaving him free to discharge his power, in relation to it, in his own way, and according to his own wishes and opinion. And I venture to say, that, if any other design had not been disavowed, the resolution would have been rejected.

All that I intended, and all that I believe the majority intended, by the vote of last session, so far as the subject of recognition was concerned, was to say to the Executive: "We do not know what you are willing to do towards the Patriots; we do not even pretend to know or to say what you ought to do; but, lest you may be embarrassed by doubts as to public opinion, we inform you, that we will be content if you, with all the information you have, determine to recognise their independent existence; and, so far as we may have a right to participate with you in the exercise of this high power, we give our assent to any act you may do, having confidence that any decision made by your discretion and wisdom, will be a correct one; but we do not wish you to understand that we advise you to any particular course. You must act on your own information and responsibility; we will furnish you with the means."

Sir, this was the language used in debate, and this was the language of those who adopted the resolution. Further than this I did not intend to go—further I could not go.

It was declared, that such an assurance to the Executive was one object of the resolution, and that another, and the only other, was to give encouragement to the Patriots, by giving them some testimony of our good feelings and wishes towards them. It was said, that such an expression of our disposition in their favor would have a great "moral effect" in their struggle, and would animate and invigorate them. So far as I could produce such a result by any abstract vote, without entangling ourselves in the contest, I was glad to have an opportunity to do it; and with that view, in addition to those I have mentioned, I voted for the resolution with pleasure and alacrity.

I was willing, as far as such a resolution would operate on the spirits of the Patriots, to inspire them with confidence, and stimulate them to new and more vigorous and persevering efforts. But I did not intend to pledge the United States to recognise their independence, or give them any aid; nor did I intend to make any appropriation after the adoption of the resolution, unless it should be called for by the President; and, although the resolution itself might authorize a different inference, the avowals that were made, and the nature of the objects to be obtained by its adoption, will abundantly show, that no more was intended by it than I have stated. The form was immaterial, so that the ends could be accomplished, and this was frequently mentioned in argument. Perhaps the form was liable to as few exceptions as any other which could have been devised. It only meant to give support to the Executive, and encouragement to the Patriots; we had no right or motive to do more. I trust that I have now shown satisfactorily the character and intent of the resolution; and, in doing so, I flatter myself that I have also justified the support which I gave it, by exhibiting the avowed objects of its adoption, all of which were constitutionally attainable, and right and proper, because within our power, and well intended.

South American States.

But the reasons which would justify, and even render necessary, that vote, do not apply to the motion now under consideration, and cannot warrant, but do forbid, its adoption; because, by the resolution, all the ends have been achieved which were intended, and the adoption of this motion cannot be necessary to effect the same results, but must (if it have any practical operation) produce such as were never designed before, and such as we have no right to attempt. I repeat, that the objects of the resolution were, first, to animate the Patriots by an abstract proposition of our wishes for their success; and, second, to inform the President of our willingness to support him, as far as we had the power, in any measure which he, in his own opinion, might think it most expedient to adopt towards the Patriots, and to give our assent to recognition, as far as it might be supposed that we had a right to act. And here I beg leave to say, that this latter consideration had great influence on my vote. I did think, and still do, that the Executive should never recognise the independence of any new Government without the assent of this House. It would not be permissible for me here to make an argument to prove the correctness of this opinion. I will only observe, that it is in accordance with that expressed by my colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) and is fortified by one of the ablest arguments of one of the most enlightened statesmen who ever adorned this country. I will inquire, whether this doctrine was not urged as a reason why it was our duty to pass the resolution? Was it not said, that the Executive could not, would not, act without having our assent? I will now appeal to the author of the resolution, and of the motion now before us, to say, whether any other motives for the adoption of his resolution were avowed than those I have mentioned, and whether all others were not disavowed? I know he would answer affirmatively. These then are the reasons which rendered proper the vote of last session; and I declare that, if we had never yet passed a resolution on South American affairs, I would now vote for one with the same motives which induced me to vote for it last session. But having, by the adoption of that resolution, done all that was necessary, I see no motive to do any thing more, and think I see unanswerable objections to an attempt to go farther than we have gone. By going further we have no desirable or legitimate end to attain, and that is always a good objection to any species of legislation. But this is not my only objection.

And here may be seen the ground on which I feel bound to oppose the appropriation. If, instead of the resolution of last session, the motion had been made which is now offered, or if, immediately after the adoption of that resolution, we had been asked to make the appropriation, I should, for the reasons which induce me to vote for the resolution, have given such a measure my entire assent and most cheerful support; because then it could not be known what would be the President's determination on the subject of the mission, and it was immaterial, as was alleged in debate, whether the appropriation preceded the nomination of a Minister, or the nomination the appropriation. But the time which has interlapsed since the adoption of the resolution has given us indubitable evidence of the course of policy which the President is resolved to pursue. The motives, therefore, which recommended the resolution do not exist, and I can see no object to be attained by the appropriation, unless it be intended, by being used as the echo of public sentiment, to drive the President from the course of policy which he deems most expedient, and has determined to observe. If we could reasonably doubt whether the Executive has resolved not to send a Minister to South America, or whether he understood the resolution of last session, or whether he requires an appropriation before he can make up his mind, then we should have some pretext for making the appropriation. But is there a member on this floor who has the remotest doubt on this subject? Can any man tell me that he is not convinced that the President does not intend to nominate a Minister to the South; or that he has any hope that he intends to do so on the event of an appropriation; or that he would have done it heretofore if an appropriation had been made; or that he wants any further expression of public sentiment than that which he has received on that subject? No, sir; we have the strongest reasons to impress the conviction that he neither expects nor wishes an appropriation; that he needs no further information or assistance from us; and that if we had made an appropriation last Winter no Minister would have been sent. Did we not, by the resolution which was adopted, tell him that we would assent to recognition? Did he want more, if he had been disposed to send a Minister? Is it usual to vote an appropriation for a mission before it is called for? Why, then, did he not send a Minister? There is but one answer; it is, because he did not think it wise and prudent to do so. He has called for an appropriation for an outfit for a Minister to France to succeed Mr. Gallatin. Why has he not called for one for a Minister to South America? It is, because he intends to send a Minister to France, and has determined not to send one to South America. Having, then, given the Executive all the information and assistance which were necessary to exempt him from doubt or embarrassment, as far as we are concerned, and knowing, as we do, that he has, after having carefully considered our resolution and weighed all the arguments for and against a mission to the South, resolved against it, I would ask, what is the object of this motion? Is it to inform the Patriots of public feeling in this country? We have done it; and it is not necessary or dignified to repeat it every Winter. Is it to give assurance of our support to the Executive? We have done it. Is it to recognise the independence of any of the South American provinces? As far as we have any power on that subject, we have exercised it. All these ends have been effected by the resolution of last session.

Then, for what purpose make the appropriation? I hope there is no illegitimate object. But, whatever the object be, it is either unnecessary or unauthorized. It is unnecessary, if it be no other than that for which the resolution was adopted. If it be for any other, I repeat that it is not only unconstitutional, but inconsistent with the ends of that resolution. For, whatever may be the purposes intended by the motion, it can have either no effect, or a coercive one. And if this latter be either the design or the tendency of the motion, even those who are most anxious to have the Patriots acknowledged, cannot, if they revere their own Constitution, and understand its theory and principles, be willing that such an end should be produced by such means. The Constitution has distributed the sovereign power among three departments; and made each independent. On this distribution of power, and independence of its depositories, depend the preservation of the Constitution, and the conservation of all the rights which it was made to guard. And the moment one department can successfully encroach on and control, directly or indirectly, either of the others, the equilibrium of the Constitution is destroyed, and its theory changed. However flattering it may be to our pride, that the Judiciary should decide, and the Executive act, in all cases confided to their discretion, exactly as we wish, or as we would do if we had the power, yet, if this conformity be produced, not by their own uncontrolled judgments, but by a wish to gratify us, or a fear of offending us, they are not the Ministers of the Constitution, but the humble instruments of our own will. It is just as improper that we should control the Executive as that he should control us. We should all confine ourselves strictly to our sphere, and submit cheerfully to the conduct of each, as long as it is within the scope of the Constitution. I do not fear that the President will be alarmed by this motion, if it be adopted, into an abandonment of the policy which the suggestions of his own judgment have recommended to him. If he should be, he is unworthy of the high trust confided to him. But its tendency, without any adequate object, will be to annoy and embarrass him; and the example will be deleterious, because it may, in worse times, serve as a precedent to sanction similar measures, intended for sinister purposes, (for which this is not,) and crowned with fatal success. We should never countenance any measure, however good its motives, which may have such a pernicious tendency. I am unwilling to believe that any one here will vote for this motion in the hope that it will embarrass, coerce, or reproach the President. But I think that all will acknowledge, that, if it should not have this effect, it can have none all. It might, indeed, have the effect of rendering the President obnoxious to popular resentment, by showing our impotency and his pertinacity, and by implying distrust in him, and reproach for the course which he pursues. And it may have the further effect of inducing a belief that we think he has wantonly disregarded the voice of public sentiment, and have determined to goad him with it until he shall be forced to obey it. No statesman can desire such consequences. Why, then, when we know that the President does not intend to send a Minister, are we required to make an appropriation? And this he has told us, by his conduct, as unequivocally as the plainest language could speak. For reasons satisfactory to himself, he has, on his own responsibility, after deliberating on our resolution, and consulting the lights he possesses, and carefully, and no doubt anxiously, weighing the whole matter, come to this determination. And, however some gentleman may regret this determination, we cannot control it; we should not attempt it. We have discharged our duty to the Patriots and the President; we have done all we could rightfully do; we agreed to make an appropriation, if he would take it; he will not use it. What more can we, should we do? If we could force the President to recognition, what will the country gain by it? And what may it not lose?

I would dictate to, I would coerce the Executive, or any other man or men, however exalted, as promptly as any other individual would, if I had the right to do it, and could thereby achieve any desirable end. But I cannot vote for a proposition which can produce no practical good, and may do mischief by its operation, its construction, or its example.

I have another objection to this motion: It is, that it will force the President, when the bill shall be presented to him for his signature, either to reject the whole appropriation, or, by his signature, give his assent to this appropriation for a Minister. And, in the latter event, he might be supposed to be bound to send a Minister, because he had approved an appropriation for that purpose. Sir, we act on our own responsibility; let the President act on his. I am not willing (if I had the power) to take it from him, or to impose any more on him than the Constitution imposes. Let him, with the exception of Constitutional restraint, and that of his own conscience and judgment, be as free as air. It is our interest as well as his that he should be. Let us attend carefully to our own duties, and enjoy our own privileges, and permit him to enjoy his rights and discharge his duties in his own way, without interference, dictation, or annoyance. This policy is safe to all. Any other is dangerous. If we repeatedly press this subject on the Executive, the inference will be that we do it to coerce him.

I have thus crudely endeavored to show my objections to this motion, and the consistency of my conduct. My opinions may be wrong, yet they are my opinions, and may justify or condemn my course. But I submit it to the candor of those who hear me to say, whether the vote I gave at the last session, and that which I shall now give, are not in perfect consonance, and whether any other course would not be incongruous? Is it consistent with the vote of last session to make this appropriation? We gave the vote last Winter for the information and support of the President, and would not have adopted it for any other or stronger purpose. We know now that he needs no further appropriation, if we make it. How can we consistently, then, with the objects of the vote of last session, adopt this amendment?

South American States.

Sir, the appeal which has been just made to us by my colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) is as sensibly felt by me as by any other member of this House; and no one would promote his personal interests, or gratify his feelings, where it could be done consistently with public duty, sooner than I would. I know he will acknowledge the sincerity of this declaration. He is not without proofs of it. But whatever may be my inclinations, personal considerations must give way when they carry me to the boundaries of my power, and encroach on the confines of principle. I voted with my colleague last Winter, for the reasons which I have mentioned with increased pleasure, because I was aiding him in that which was to him a splendid triumph, and one which was achieved without sacrifice of principle. I knew that he would soon leave us, (which I regret,) and I was anxious that he should retire with honor and applause; and, in regard to that retirement, (which I hope will only be temporary,) I thought it but due to his distinguished services that his country should say to him, as Jove did to Hector—

"Yet live, I give thee one illustrious day,
One blaze of glory, 'ere thou fad'st away."

Sir, the vote of last Winter, by giving success to his exertions for the Patriots, did crown him with laurels. I would not wither them, or pluck one leaf from the bright wreath. I wish they may flourish and be forever green. But I cannot water them by the vote I am about to give. I am sorry the motion is made. I hoped that the subject was buried last Winter, and that it should not be resuscitated. To carry the motion can confer no additional honor on the mover; to lose it, may diminish the glory of the triumph he has won. If he would be content with an abstract expression of our feelings towards the Patriots, although it is unnecessary and superfluous, (having done this before,) I would vote for it, because it will speak only what I feel in common with my constituents, and will not be liable to the principal objections which I have to the proposition which he has made. And why would not such a resolution satisfy all his wishes? Why annoy the Executive, session after session, with our opinion and advice, when we know that he does not desire them, and will not conform to them? And why do this, too, when every legitimate or desirable object has been already achieved, and can be again effected, if desired, as far as the Patriots are to be benefited, in the manner which I have just suggested?

I have been charged with fastidiousness and metaphysical distinctions. I will only say, that the reasons of my vote belong to my judgment and conscience. My feelings towards the Executive can never induce me to give a vote which my judgment disapproves. It will be well if all others are in the same situation. No personal considerations influence me. I hope I stand on higher and prouder ground—on ground consecrated by principles and not men. I do not court Executive smiles—I do not fear Executive frowns. I have nothing to gain by the one—nothing to lose by the other. And on this subject I need only refer to my course in this House for four years. When I believe the Executive wrong I oppose him; when right, I defend him: and while I would never oppose a measure which my judgment should approve merely because the Executive might be opposed to it, I would never advocate one which my judgment should not approve, merely to annoy or embarrass him.

I have not said any thing about the policy of recognition, because I rose only to vindicate my own vote, without intending or expecting to influence those of other members; and because the whole decision of that subject belongs to another department, from whose judgment, right or wrong, there is no appeal. And this shows the inefficacy of our argument on that point. I am, therefore, surprised to hear arguments intended to prove that it is right to recognise, and appeals made to our feelings to enlist us in the cause of recognition. If we intend to do no more than our duty, these arguments and appeals are unnecessary; for we know that we cannot recognise more than we have already done. All must now be done by the President.

But while on this subject I beg leave to say, that I have no reason to believe that the cautious course which the Executive has observed towards the Patriots has been unwise. He understands the whole subject, and I have no doubt the motives and reasons which have directed him are good and disinterested. And I must say, too, that I have no reason to believe that the people are dissatisfied. It is true, that they feel a deep solicitude for the success of the Patriots, but it does not follow that they condemn their Government for not entangling itself with their destinies. Having already, through their proper organs, expressed their feelings, they are content to leave the decision to the discretion and judgment of that department to which they have confided all the power that now remains to be exerted; and with whatever decision it shall make, I believe they will be satisfied. For myself I can say that, having discharged my duty, I am willing that the President should freely discharge his. With whatever he shall do I shall be content. I do not wish to control his conduct—I am unwilling to be responsible for it.

But, before I sit down, I declare that, if the President should determine to send a Minister to any of the Patriot Governments of South America, no man will be more gratified than I shall be; not only because such an event might animate the Patriots, and facilitate and confirm their triumphs, but because, after the prudent, cautious policy of the Executive heretofore, it would be the strongest and most satisfactory evidence of their capacity, moral and physical, to maintain their independence, and to preserve and enjoy its rights and its blessings.

When Mr. R. had taken his seat—

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, advocated, decidedly and earnestly, an immediate and unqualified recognition of South American independence.

Mr. STEVENS, of Connecticut, followed on the same side, and spoke at some length in support of the amendment.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, also advocated, at some length, the adoption of the proposition.

Mr. CULPEPER, of North Carolina, stated succinctly why he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. CLAY again occupied the floor some time in reply to Mr. LOWNDES, and in a zealous support of the proposition.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, briefly offered the reasons which influenced him to oppose the proposition.

The question was then taken on adopting the proposed amendment, and decided in the negative. For the amendment, 73; against it, 77.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill and the amendments made thereto to the House.

Mr. CULBRETH moved to lay this bill on the table, before the amendments were acted on, with the view of first acting on the bill reported by him to-day to reduce the salaries of the officers and clerks in the civil department of Government; but, before this motion was decided, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 7.

A new member, to wit: from North Carolina, WILLIAM S. BLACKLEDGE, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Jesse Slocumb, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. FORREST, from the committee appointed on the 4th of December last, to inquire respecting certain loans of lead and gunpowder by the ordnance department to certain individuals, made a report thereon, giving the view which the committee entertain of the transaction, but not recommending any interposition on the part of this House; and the report was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, detailing their operations subsequent to their report dated the 5th of February last; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Commodore Tucker, and the bill authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States in the city of Washington, were twice read, and committed.

Mr. ROBERTSON submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing at some eligible place on the Western waters a military academy.

And the question being taken on agreeing thereto, without debate, it was decided in the negative.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the collectors of customs to pay debentures on loaf sugar, and spirits distilled from molasses, exported. The committee having filled the blanks therein—

The bill was reported to the House, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House, on motion of Mr. STORRS, went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the petition of Alvin Bronson, (who, having a boat in the public service on Lake Ontario, during the late war, which was sunk by the commanding officer to save the boat and its cargo of munitions from capture by the enemy, but was captured notwithstanding, now prays compensation for the said boat.)

Mr. STORRS opposed the report very zealously, and concluded a long speech against it by moving to reverse the report and instruct the committee to prepare a bill for the relief of the petitioner.

Messrs. McCoy, EDWARDS of Connecticut, and METCALF, argued at some length to sustain the report, and to show that the petitioner was not entitled to relief either under the claims law of 1816, or any other rule, as the boat would inevitably have been captured, if it had not been taken into the service of the United States.

Mr. STORRS rejoined at great length, but his motion was ultimately negatived; and the House concurred in the report of the Committee of Claims.

The House then, on motion of Mr. ANDERSON, went into Committee, and took up the bill for the relief of Robert Buntin, which it considered, and agreed to report.

The Committee then took up the bill further to regulate the issuing of patents for soldiers' bounty lands.

The discussion of this bill occupied the House until 4 o'clock; in which Messrs. MONELL, COOK, HARDIN, McCoy, FULLER, and RHEA engaged, and in the course of which Mr. McCoy, to destroy the bill, moved to strike out its first section. Before this motion was decided, the Committee rose, and reported their proceedings to the House; when it obtained leave to sit again on the last bill, and that for the relief of Robert Buntin was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. COCKE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the first day of May next, there shall be paid to the officers of the Army the following salaries, in lieu of their present pay and emoluments, to wit:

To a Brigadier General three thousand dollars per annum; to the Paymaster General, two thousand four hundred dollars; to the Adjutant General, two thousand dollars; to the Inspector General, two thousand dollars; to the Assistant Adjutant General, one thousand six hundred dollars; to the Assistant Inspector

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That when an officer chooses to draw rations or forage in kind, there shall be deducted for the same, from his compensation, a sum equal to the contract price of such rations or forage.

The bill was twice read, and committed.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the general appropriation bill, and the amendments made thereto by the Committee of the Whole—the motion being still pending which was made by Mr. CULBRETH on yesterday, to lay the bill on the table, with the view of taking up the bill to reduce the salaries in the Civil Departments of the Government.

The motion to lay the appropriation bill on the table was opposed by Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, and STORRS, and was advocated, for the purpose proposed, by Mr. COCKE. The motion was negatived, without a division.

16th CON. 2d SESS.—34

The discussion was renewed and continued some time on some of the items which had been the subject of debate in the Committee—particularly the appropriation for opening a road from the United States' military road in the Mississippi Territory, to the old road leading from Natchez to Nashville, which was defended by Mr. RANKIN, at some length, and in the discussion of which Messrs. STORRS, BUTLER of Louisiana, McLEAN of Kentucky, and RHEA, engaged. In the end, this appropriation was negatived. The amendments having all been disposed of—

The bill was, on motion of Mr. SMITH of Maryland, laid on the table, with the view of affording to Mr. CLAY an opportunity of renewing, in the House, the motion unsuccessfully made by him in Committee of the Whole, on Tuesday; that gentleman being now absent on the committee appointed on the Missouri subject—which committee obtained leave yesterday to hold its sittings during the sessions of the House.

In the course of the day, Mr. BARBOUR gave notice that he should on to-morrow move to go into Committee of the Whole on the subjects relative to the Navy.

Mr. BALDWIN gave notice that he should on Monday next move to go into a Committee of the Whole on the tariff and auction duties' bills; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 8.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of James Morrison; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, submitted for consideration the following resolution, which was read and ordered to lie on the table one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the progress which has been made by the Board of Engineers in determining the sites, and plans of the fortifications of the coast of the United States; the sites which may have been selected; the estimate of the expence in completing the several works; the number of troops necessary to garrison them in peace, and in war; the progress made in erecting the fortifications; the advantages resulting from the system when completed, particularly in reducing the expence of defending the Atlantic frontier.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Robert Buntin;" and "An act to authorize the collectors of customs to pay debentures issued on the exportation of loaf sugar, and spirits distilled from molasses;" were severally read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The resolution was read and concurred in by the House. Mr. CLAY, Mr. SERGEANT, and Mr.

VAN RENNELAER, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

THE NAVY.

The House, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which concludes by recommending to the House the adoption of the following resolution :

Resolved, That a Naval Peace Establishment ought to be fixed by law.

Mr. BARBOUR, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, rose, and in a speech of considerable length, submitted his reasons in favor of fixing, by law, a Peace Establishment for the Navy, and for making the reductions therein which are suggested in the report.

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, replied to Mr. BARBOUR, in a speech of three quarters of an hour, of which the following is only a brief sketch. He said that the Peace Establishment of the Army, as far as it was practicable, was fixed by the annual appropriation; but that there was a wide difference between the circumstances which rendered a Peace Establishment proper for the Army, and those which apply to the Navy. That the Army, in time of peace, had little occupation, except in maintaining the several frontier posts, and sometimes to check a predatory irruption of savages. On the other hand, said he, the Navy may be considered, in some degree, as engaged in perpetual active service, as arduous and indispensable as actual war. On the coast of Africa, in the Pacific ocean, and often on the Mediterranean, this service was little different from war itself. The Naval Establishment, fixed during Mr. Jefferson's Administration, had been found very inconvenient, and had been gradually abandoned. On the return of peace, when the Army was placed on a Peace Establishment, it was considered unwise to limit the Navy, either as to ships, officers, or seamen, except by the actual appropriation. By this system, when any emergency called for an additional force, during the Summer, or before the session of Congress, the Executive could, forthwith, despatch such as he deemed necessary, without convening the Legislature. But what could require, at this moment, such an establishment, Mr. F. said, he was unable to comprehend. Did any one doubt the prudence of the Executive, and his disposition to reduce the expenses of the Navy, and all others, as much as possible? Let gentlemen advert to a document of the last session, by which it appeared that the number of seamen in service at that time was 4,354, whereas the number for the present year is only 2,932, a reduction of about one-third. Surely, said Mr. F., such a sudden reduction ought to satisfy the gentleman from Virginia of the disposition to retrench. But the report proposes a further reduction to about 2,500. Now, Mr. F. continued, this would be extremely pernicious to our commerce in several quarters of the world, and no less so to our naval reputation. Instead of sending only schooners of 12 guns each on the coast of Africa, which are liable to be overpowered by a combination of slave ships, which are often of considerable force, it is proper to send, at least sometimes, even larger vessels than we have hitherto employed.

In the West Indies, Mr. F. said, especially in the Windward islands, our commerce, during the past year, from May to November, was almost defenceless. The depredations committed in the neighborhood of St. Thomas had been such as greatly to diminish and discourage almost the only profitable commerce with the Spanish Main adjacent to those islands, it being well known that St. Thomas was a free port, and consequently a convenient depot and general rendezvous for our merchantmen. We have official documents to confirm this statement, and from merchants resident there with whom he had conversed. He was assured that much greater annoyance had been suffered, and that many lives had been sacrificed by those merciless pirates. In the Pacific, Mr. F. said, besides our whale fisheries, we have had a valuable trade; and, although a gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) had lately styled the merchants engaged in that commerce "a few adventurers from Boston," he would assure the Committee that they were honorable adventurers, engaged in a lawful traffic, and their laudable exertions, while they were gradually reviving the capital, and increasing the resources of their country, were restoring the revenue and the credit of the Government. He was sorry, Mr. F. added, to hear such men stigmatized as "adventurers," because they complained of the paper blockade of Lord Cochrane, as the outrage of an unprincipled freebooter. Except Callao, the port of Lima, the Chilean fleet had never attempted actually to blockade a single port; and he was sorry that any gentleman should treat a remonstrance against such a measure with disrespect. The presence of a respectable force in the Pacific would prevent Lord Cochrane, and those with whom he acted, from daring to invade our rights, whether in capturing ships, or enticing or kidnapping our seamen. It was not intended, nor was there any danger of involving us in a war with these Patriots, so much the object of regard. Our officers were limited by their instructions, and no one doubted their faithful and discreet observance.

With regard to reducing the officers of our Navy, Mr. F. said, we could not do it without a dereliction of the great system which we had commenced in 1816, of the "gradual increase of the Navy." If the Committee were prepared for this, it might be in their view consistent to dismiss the officers; but the nation, Mr. F. said, he was convinced, would raise its voice against such an abandonment. It would dishonor us in the eyes of the civilized world, and afford a precious triumph to our enemies. By comparing the complement furnished by the Navy Department for the ships now in service, it appears that when the seventy-fours and frigates provided for by law are finished, a greater number of officers will be required to bring them into service than are now in commission. It was easier, Mr. F. said, and would require a shorter time, to build ships than to train officers fit to command them. The officers of the Navy who had reached the higher grades had, without exception, been in service from their earliest youth, and, without such actual experience, and passing through all the grades, they could not be qualified to command. This, though in some measure true of officers in the Army, was far more so in the Navy; and, indeed, he believed, scarcely an exception existed in the last war. In the highest grade known in our Navy, the pay was hardly equal to the salaries of chief clerks in the departments; and, after having spent their lives in the service of their country, it is proposed, by this report, to dismiss them without ceremony or regard. He could not agree to the justice of this, and he was confident it would be as destructive to the naval force as it would be disgraceful; for what father, after seeing such a termination of the labors and of the glorious career of one-half our officers, in a few short years after their wounds are healed, will permit his sons to engage in such a service? It would be madness. When war shall come hereafter, and war must come, however we may deprecate its horrors, our country will too late repent this act of ill-timed, of wasteful retrenchment. Mr. F. concluded by saying, that the measures proposed by the report and resolution were peculiarly inexpedient towards the close of the session, when the other public business would leave little time to arrange the details of any bill which could be introduced with the view proposed by the majority of the Naval Committee.

Mr. SILSBEE, of Massachusetts, spoke much at large in reply to Mr. BARBOUR, and in opposition to the report of the committee, and a reduction of the Navy.

Mr. BARBOUR replied at some length, and Mr. FULLER rejoined.

Mr. MEIGS, of New York, stated succinctly the reasons which would induce him to vote against the report.

Mr. LOWNDES admitted the propriety of fixing by law the Naval Peace Establishment, but being decidedly opposed to any reduction of the establishment as at present constituted, in support of which opinion he briefly gave his reasons, he moved to add to the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That the number of commissioned officers to be authorized, shall not be less than that of those who are now commissioned in the naval service.

This amendment was agreed to, ayes 76, noes 54; and

The Committee then rose and reported the resolution to the House, as amended.

Mr. BARBOUR, after stating his objections to the amendment, suggested that, in its present shape, it would prevent a reduction of the number of surgeons, who were commissioned officers, and might restrict the committee in the bill to be reported, to an extent, perhaps, not intended by the mover.

Considerable debate followed, as well on the main object of the report as on the amendment, in which Messrs. BARBOUR, EUSTIS, MERCER, SILSBEE, and LOWNDES participated, more or less; Mr. MERCER entering a good deal into the whole ground of controversy, in arguing against the report.

To accommodate the views of other gentlemen, Mr. LOWNDES moved so to modify his amendment as to read: "Provided, the number of captains, lieutenants, and midshipmen, shall not be less," &c.

On the suggestion of Mr. SILSBEE, masters commandant were included in the modification.

Mr. TRIMBLE said, that he had voted in Committee of the whole House for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) for mitigating the proposed reduction; but, from the remarks just made by the chairman of the special committee who had reported the resolution, he was fearful that the committee would be so much restricted by the amendment, that it would not be able to give the Peace Establishment the most efficient organization which might be adopted.

He did not intend to attempt a discussion of the subject, and would only ask leave to express his opinion, which was decidedly against reducing the Navy. His reflections had conducted him to the conclusion, that, for the future, nations would wage war for maritime supremacy; that the theatre of contest would be the ocean, and not the land; and that the dominion of the seas would be the primary object of the commercial world. Upon this element, said he, we come in contact with all the commercial and maritime Powers, but with none so often as Great Britain. Contest with her could not be avoided. She was too jealous of us as a rival to be easy. There were some things in her land and naval service which he could not approve, but, taken in the aggregate, she was the most potent maritime Power that had ever existed; and, what was not less important, she had, with all her faults, a mass of intellectual power that would give activity and impulse to her maritime means. In a word, he said, it was our destiny to stand in conflict with the most powerful, the most heroic, and perhaps, with all her failings, the most magnanimous maritime Power the world had ever known; and for that reason, if he had no other, he would oppose any reduction of the Navy. On the contrary, he wished to see it placed upon the most efficient footing. If the amendment restricts the committee in that respect, he would rather see it modified. The chairman of the committee intimates that it will not, and Mr. T. was satisfied.

After some further debate on the part of Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, BARBOUR, SILSBEE, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, COBB, and FLOYD, the modification of the proviso was agreed to.

Mr. MERCER moved to add seamen also to it; but the motion was negatived.

The question was then put on the proviso, as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That the number of captains, masters commandant, lieutenants, and midshipmen, shall not be less than that of those who are now commissioned in the naval service.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Baker, Barbour, Bateman, Boden, Bryan, Burton, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Cobb, Crafts, Culbreth, Culpeper, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Floyd, Foot, Forrest, Gray, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hostetter, Johnson, Kinsey, Lincoln, Macloy, McCoy, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Marchand, Metcalf, R. Moore, Murray, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Philson, Rankin, Rhea, Richards, Richmond, Ross, Russ, Sawyer, Shaw, Sloan, Stevens, Strong of Vermont, Tarr, Terrell, Tracy, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker, Warfield, and Williams of North Carolina—63.

Mr. CORN then moved to subjoin to the resolution the following order :

Ordered, That the foregoing resolution be recommended to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to report a bill conformably thereto, and to reduce the number of seamen, ordinary seamen and boys, to the number of 2,521.

Mr. LOWNDES moved to strike out of this proposition all which follows the word thereto, in the third line.

A debate ensued on these questions, and continued some time ; when

Mr. BRUSH, of Ohio, moved that the entire subject, the report, resolution, and amendments, be indefinitely postponed ; but before the question was taken, a motion to adjourn prevailed.

FRIDAY, February 9.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, calling for information respecting fortifications, and agreed thereto.

Mr. CULBRETH gave notice that he should, on Tuesday next, move for the consideration of the bill reported by him for reducing the salaries of the several officers of the Government.

The House then resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, (relating to the Navy ;) but it was ordered to lie on the table, the House being considered too thin, from the absence of committees, &c., to act definitively on the subject.

The bill to amend and establish certain post roads, then passed through a Committee of the Whole, where it received many amendments, and, being reported to the House, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the committee on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the Slave Trade, made a report, which, with the documents accompanying it, was ordered to be printed. The report is as follows :

The committee to which is referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the slave trade, and to which are referred the two Messages of the President, transmitting, in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th of December, a report of the Secretary of State, and enclosed documents, relating to the negotiation for the suppression of the slave trade, report :

That the committee have deemed it advisable, previous to entering into a consideration of the proposed co-operation to exterminate the slave trade, to make a summary review of the Constitution and laws of the United States relating to this subject. It will disclose the earnestness and zeal with which this nation has been actuated, and the laudable ambition that has animated their councils to take a lead in the reformation of a disgraceful practice, and one which is productive of so much human misery ; it will, by displaying the constant anxiety of this nation to suppress the African slave trade, afford ample testimony that she will be the last to persevere in measures wisely digested to effectuate this great and most desirable object, whenever such measures can be adopted in consistence with the leading principles of her local institutions.

In consequence of the existence of slavery in many of the States, when British colonies, the habits and means of carrying on industry could not be suddenly changed ; and the Constitution of the United States yielded to the provision that the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808.

But, long antecedent to this period, Congress legislated on the subject wherever its power extended, and endeavored, by a system of rigorous penalties, to suppress this unnatural trade.

The act of Congress of the 22d of March, 1794, contains provisions that no citizen or citizens of the United States, or foreigner, or any other person, coming into or residing within the same, shall, for himself or any other person whatsoever, either as master, factor, or owner, build, fit, equip, load, or otherwise prepare any ship or vessel, within any port or place of the United States, nor shall cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place within the same, for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves to any foreign country ; or for the purpose of procuring from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, the inhabitants of such kingdom, place, or country, to be transported to any foreign country, port, or place, whatever, to be sold or disposed of as slaves, under the penalty of the forfeiture of any such vessel, and of the payment of large sums of money by the persons offending against the directions of the act.

By an act of the 3d of April, 1798, in relation to the Mississippi Territory, to which the Constitutional provision did not extend, the introduction of slaves, under severe penalties, was forbidden, and every slave imported contrary to the act was to be entitled to freedom.

By an act of the 10th of May, 1800, the citizens or residents of this country were prohibited from holding any right or property in vessels employed in transporting slaves from one foreign country to another, on pain of forfeiting their right of property, and also double the value of that right in money, and double the value of their interest in the slaves; nor were they allowed to serve on board of vessels of the United States employed in the transportation of slaves from one country to another, under the punishment of fines and imprisonment; nor were they permitted to serve on board of foreign ships employed in the slave trade. By this act, also, the commissioned vessels of the United States were authorized to seize vessels and crews employed contrary to the act.

By an act of the 28th of February, 1803, masters of vessels were not allowed to bring into any port (where the laws of the State prohibited the importation) any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States, under the pain of heavy penalties; and no vessel, having on board persons of the above description, was to be admitted to an entry; and if any such person should be landed from on board of any vessel, the same was to be forfeited.

By an act of the 2d March, 1807, the importation of slaves into any port of the United States was to be prohibited after the 1st of January, 1808, the time prescribed by the Constitutional provision. This act contains many severe provisions against any interference or participation in the slave trade, such as heavy fines, long imprisonments, and the forfeitures of vessels; the President was also authorized to employ armed vessels to cruise on any part of the coast where he might judge attempts would be made to violate the act, and to instruct the commanders of armed vessels to seize and bring in vessels found on the high seas contravening the provisions of the law.

By an act of the 20th of April, 1818, the laws in prohibition of the slave trade were further improved; this act is characterized with a peculiarity of legislative precaution, especially in the eighth section, which throws the labor of proof upon the defendant, that the colored persons brought into the United States by him had not been brought in contrary to the laws.

By an act of the 3d of March, 1819, the power is continued in the President to employ the armed ships of the United States, to seize and bring into port any vessel engaged in the slave trade by citizens or residents of the United States; and such vessels, together with the goods and effects on board, are to be forfeited and sold, and the proceeds to be distributed in like manner as provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy; and the officers and crew are to undergo the punishments inflicted by previous acts. The President, by this act, is authorized to make such regulations and arrangements as he may deem expedient, for the safekeeping, support, and removal beyond the limits of the United States, of all such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, as may have been brought within its jurisdiction, and to appoint a proper person or persons residing on the coast of Africa, as agent or agents for receiving the negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, delivered from on board of vessels seized in the prosecution of the slave trade.

And, in addition to all the aforesaid laws, the present Congress, on the 15th of May, 1820, believing that the then existing provisions would not be sufficiently available, enacted, that if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel, engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned in the whole or in part, or navigated for or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land from any such ship or vessel, and on any foreign shore seize any negro or mulatto, not held to service or labor by the laws of either of the States or Territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall decoy or forcibly bring, or carry, or shall receive, such negro or mulatto on board any such ship or vessel, with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate, and on conviction shall suffer death.

The immoral and pernicious practice of the slave trade has attracted much public attention in Europe within the last few years; and in a Congress at Vienna, on the 8th of February, 1815, five of the principal Powers made a solemn engagement, in the face of mankind, that this traffic should be made to cease; in pursuance of which, these Powers have enacted municipal laws to suppress the trade. Spain, although not a party to the original engagement, did, soon after, in her treaty with England, stipulate for the immediate abolition of the Spanish slave trade to the north of the equator, and for its final and universal abolition on the 30th of May, 1820.

Portugal likewise, in her treaty in 1817, stipulated that the Portuguese slave trade on the coast of Africa should entirely cease to the northward of the equator, and engaged that it should be unlawful for her subjects to purchase or trade in slaves except to the southward of the line. The precise period at which the entire abolition is to take place in Portugal does not appear to be finally fixed; but the Portuguese Ambassador, in the presence of the Congress of Vienna, declared that Portugal, faithful to her principles, would not refuse to adopt the term of eight years, which term will expire in the year 1823.

At this time, among the European States, there is not a flag which can legally cover this inhuman traffic to the north of the line; nevertheless, experience has proved the inefficacy of the various and rigorous laws which have been made in Europe and in this country; it being a lamentable fact that the disgraceful practice is even now carried on to a surprising extent. During the last year, Captain Trenchard, the commander of the United States sloop of war the Cyane, found that part of the coast of Africa which he visited lined with vessels, engaged, as it is presumed, in this forbidden traffic; of these he examined many; and five, which appeared to be fitted out on American account, he sent into the jurisdiction of the United States, for adjudication. Each of them, it is believed, has been condemned, and the commanders of two of them have been sentenced to the punishment prescribed by the laws of the United States.

The testimony recently published, with the opinion of the presiding judge of the United States court of the southern district of the State of New York, in the case of the schooner Plattsburg, lays open a scene of the grossest fraud that could be practised to deceive the officers of Government, and conceal the unlawful transaction.

The extension of the trade for the last twenty-five or thirty years must, in a degree, be conjectural, but the best information that can be obtained on the subject furnishes good foundation to believe, that during that period the number of slaves withdrawn from western Africa amounts to upwards of a million and a half; the annual average would be a mean somewhere between fifty and eighty thousand.

The trade appears to be lucrative in proportion to its heinousness; and, as it is generally inhibited, the unfeeling slave dealers, in order to elude the laws, increase its horrors; the innocent Africans, who are mercilessly forced from their native homes in irons, are crowded in vessels and situations which are not adapted for the transportation of human beings; and this cruelty is frequently succeeded, during the voyage of their destination, with dreadful mortality. Further information on this subject will appear in a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing two other letters, marked 1 and 2, and also by the extract of a letter from an officer of the Cyane, dated April 10, 1820, which are annexed to this report. While the slave trade exists, there can be no prospect of civilization in Africa.

However well disposed the European Powers may be to effect a practical abolition of the trade, it seems generally acknowledged that, for the attainment of this object, it is necessary to agree upon some concerted plan of co-operation; but, unhappily, no arrangement has as yet obtained universal consent.

England has recently engaged in treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, in which the mutual right of visitation and search is exchanged. This right is of a special and limited character, as well in relation to the number and description of vessels, as to space; and, to avoid possible inconveniences, no suspicious circumstances are to warrant the detention of a vessel; this right is restricted to the simple fact of slaves being on board.

These treaties contemplate the establishment of mixed courts, formed of an equal number of individuals of the two contracting nations, the one to reside in a possession belonging to his Britannic Majesty, the other within the territory of the other respective Power. When a vessel is visited and detained, it is to be taken to the nearest court, and, if condemned, the vessel is to be declared a lawful prize, as well as the cargo, and are to be sold for the profit of the two nations; the slaves are to receive a certificate of emancipation, and to be delivered over to the Government on whose territory the court is which passes sentence, to be employed as servants or free laborers. Each of the Governments binds itself to guaranty the liberty of such portion of these individuals as may be respectively assigned to it. Particular provisions are made for remuneration, in case vessels are not condemned after trial, and special instructions are stipulated to be furnished to commanders of vessels possessing the qualified right of visitation and search.

These Powers entertain the opinion, that nothing short of the concession of a qualified right of visitation and search can practically suppress the slave trade. An association of armed ships is contemplated, to form a species of naval police, to be stationed principally in the African seas, where the commanders of the ships will be enabled to co-operate in harmony and concert.

The United States have been earnestly invited by the principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the British Government to join in the same or similar arrangements; and this invitation has been sanctioned and enforced by an unanimous vote of the House of Lords and Commons, in a manner that precludes all doubts as to the sincerity and benevolence of their designs.

In answer to this invitation, the President of the United States has expressed his regret that the stipulations in the treaties communicated are of a character to which the peculiar situation and institutions of the United States do not permit them to accede.

The objections made are contained in an extract of a letter from the Secretary of State, under date of the 2d of November, 1818, in which it is observed that, "in examining the provisions of the treaties communicated by Lord Castlereagh, all the essential articles appear to be of a character not adaptable to the institutions or to the circumstances of the United States. The powers agreed to be reciprocally given to the officers of the ships of war of either party, to enter, search, capture, and carry into port for adjudication, the merchant vessels of the other, however qualified and restricted, is most essentially connected with the institution, by each treaty, of two mixed courts, one of which to reside in the external or colonial possession of each of the two parties, respectively. This part of the system is indispensable to give it that character of reciprocity, without which the right granted to the armed ships of one nation, to search the merchant vessels of another, would be rather a mark of vassalage than of independence. But to this part of the system, the United States, having no colonies, either on the coast of Africa or in the West Indies, cannot give effect. That, by the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in the Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. It provides that the judges of these courts shall hold their offices during good behavior; and that they shall be removable by impeachment, on conviction of crimes and misdemeanors. There may be doubts whether the power of the Government of the United States is competent to institute a court for carrying into execution their penal statutes beyond the territories of the United States—a court consisting partly of foreign judges, not amenable to impeachment for corruption, and deciding upon statutes of the United States without appeal.

"That the disposal of the negroes found on board of the slave-trading vessels, which might be condemned by the sentence of those mixed courts, cannot be carried into effect by the United States; for, if the slaves of vessels condemned by the mixed courts should be delivered over to the Government of the United States as free men, they could not, but by their own consent, be employed as servants or free laborers. The condition of the blacks being, in this Union, regulated by the municipal laws of the separate States, the Government of the United States can neither guaranty their liberty in the States where they could only be received as slaves, nor control them in the States where they would be recognised as free. That the admission of a right, in the officers of foreign ships of war, to enter and search the vessels of the United States in time of peace, under any circumstances whatever, would meet with universal repugnance in the public opinion of this country; that there would be no prospect of a ratification, by advice and consent of the Senate, to any stipulation of that nature; that the search by foreign officers, even in time of war, is so obnoxious to the feelings and recollections of this country, that nothing could reconcile them to the extension of it, however qualified or restricted, to a time of peace; and that it would be viewed in a still more aggravated light if, as in the Treaty with the Netherlands, connected with a formal admission that even vessels under convoy of ships of war of their own nation should be liable to search by the ships of war of another."

The committee will observe, in the first instance, that a mutual right of search appears to be indispensable to the great object of abolition; for, while flags remain as a cover for this traffic, against the right of search by any vessels except of the same nation, the chance of detection will be much less than it would be if the right of search was extended to vessels of other Powers; and as soon as any one nation should cease to be vigilant in the discovery of infractions practised on its own code, the slave dealers would avail themselves of a system of obtaining fraudulent papers, and concealing the real ownership under the cover of such flags, which would be carried on with such address as to render it easy for the citizens or subjects of one State to evade their own municipal laws; but, if a concerted system existed, and a qualified right of mutual search was granted, the apprehension of these piratical offenders would be reduced to a much greater certainty; and the very knowledge of the existence of an active and vigorous system of co-operation would divert many from this traffic, as the unlawful trade would become too hazardous for profitable speculation.

In relation to any inconveniences that might result from such an arrangement, the commerce of the United States is so limited on the African coast that it could not be much affected by it; and, as it regards economy, the expense of stationing a few vessels on that coast would not be much greater than to maintain them at any other place.

The committee have briefly noticed the practical results of a reciprocal right of search, as it bears on the slave trade; but the objection as to the propriety of ceding this right remains. It is with deference that the committee undertake to make any remarks upon it. They bear in recollection the opinions entertained in this country, on the practice of searching neutral vessels in time of war; but they cannot perceive that the right under discussion is, in principle, allied in any degree to the general question of search; it can involve no commitment, nor is it susceptible of any unfavorable inference on that subject; and, even if there were any affinity between the cases, the necessity of a special agreement would be inconsistent with the idea of existing rights. The proposal itself, in the manner made, is a total abandonment, on the part of England, of any claim to visit and search vessels in a time of peace, and this question has been unequivocally decided in the negative in her admiralty courts.

Although it is not among the objections that the desired arrangement would give color to a claim or right of search in time of peace, yet, lest the case in this respect may be prejudiced in the minds of any, the committee will observe that the right of search, in time of peace, is one that is not claimed by any Power as a part of the law of nations; no nation pretends that it can exercise the right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea, except upon the belligerent claim. A recent decision in the British admiralty court, in the case of the French slave ship Le Louis, is clear and decisive on this point. The case is annexed to this report.

In regard, then, to the reciprocal right wished to be ceded, it is reduced to the simple inquiry whether, in practice, it will be beneficial to the two contracting nations. Its exercise, so far as it relates to the detention of vessels, as it is confined to the fact of slaves being actually on board, precludes almost the possibility of accident or much inconvenience.

In relation also to the disposal of the vessels and slaves detained, an arrangement perhaps could be effected so as to deliver them up to the vessels of the nation to which the detained vessel should belong. Under such an understanding, the vessels and slaves delivered to the jurisdiction of the United States might be disposed of in conformity with the provisions of our own act of the 3d of March, 1819; and an arrangement of this kind would be free from any of the other objections.

An exchange of the right of search, limited in duration, or to continue at pleasure, for the sake of experimenting, might, it is anxiously hoped, be so restricted to vessels and seas, and with such civil and harmonious stipulations, as not to be unacceptable.

The feelings of this country on the general question of search have often been roused to a degree of excitement that evince their unchangeable character; but the American people will readily see the distinction between the cases; the one, on its exercise to the extent claimed, will ever produce irritation, and excite a patriotic spirit of resistance; the other is amicable and charitable; the justness and nobleness of the undertaking are worthy of the combined concern of Christian nations.

The detestable crime of kidnapping the unoffending inhabitants of one country, and chaining them to slavery in another, is marked with all the atrociousness of piracy; and, as such, it is stigmatized, and punishable by our own laws.

To efface this reproachful stain from the character of civilized mankind, would be the proudest triumph that could be achieved in the cause of humanity. On this subject, the United States, having led the way, owe it to themselves to give their influence and cordial co-operation to any measure that will accomplish the great and good purpose; but this happy result, experience has demonstrated, cannot be realized by any system, except a concession by the maritime Powers, to each other's ships of war, of a qualified right of search. If this object was generally attained, it is confidently believed that the active exertions of even a few nations would be sufficient entirely to suppress the slave trade.

The slave dealers could be successfully assailed on the coast upon which the trade originates, as they must necessarily consume more time in the collection and embarkation of their cargoes than in the subsequent distribution in the markets for which they are destined. This renders that coast the most advantageous position for their apprehension; and, besides, the African coast frequented by the slave ships is indented with so few commodious or accessible harbors, that, notwithstanding its great extent, it could be guarded by the vigilance of a small number of cruisers. But, if the slave ships are permitted to escape from the African coast, and to be dispersed to different parts of the world, their capture would be rendered uncertain and hopeless.

The committee, after much reflection, offer the following resolution :

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to enter into such arrangements as he may deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime Powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the annual appropriation bill for the support of the civil list.

Mr. TARR moved further to amend the bill, by adding to the end of the first section thereof the following item, viz: "For the erection of a bridge over the Monongahela river, where the Cumberland road crosses the same, the unexpended balance of the amount heretofore appropriated for completing the Cumberland road; provided such unexpended balance shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be sufficient to complete that object." And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. CLAY submitted the same proposition which he made in Committee of the Whole, the other day, viz: to amend the bill by inserting therein the following clause :

"For an outfit and one year's salary to such Minister as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may send to any Government of South America, which has established, and is maintaining its independency on Spain, a sum not exceeding eighteen thousand dollars."

On this motion a debate arose.

Mr. CLAY spoke at some length in further support of his proposition on the grounds formerly and frequently taken in support of it.

Mr. ROBERTSON replied to some of Mr. CLAY's remarks, and vindicated the ground which he had taken on a former day in opposition to legislating on a subject not properly within the scope of its duty, supposing this appropriation to be considered as an instruction or advice from this House to the Executive.

Mr. WOOD delivered his sentiments in opposition to the motion of Mr. CLAY, at considerable length, on the ground that the adoption of it would be inexpedient, as well as travelling out of the proper sphere of this department of the Government. Mr. W. fully approved of the course which the Executive had hitherto pursued in regard to South America.

Mr. RHEA also opposed the proposition, as contemplating an irregular and unusual proceeding.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, delivered his sentiments in favor of the proposition, regarding it as an expression by this House of what was the known feeling of the country towards the South Americans, called for by the existing state of things.

Mr. SOUTHWARD followed on the same side of the question, speaking earnestly in favor of the motion of Mr. CLAY.

Mr. REIN, of Georgia, spoke as follows :

Mr. Speaker, it can scarcely be necessary to declare in this place my deep solicitude for the success of the Patriots of South America. That man must, indeed, possess a cold heart, who, witnessing the blessings so profusely flowing from our own free institutions, can look unmoved upon the struggle of a brave people for their liberties—a people who have been so long the victims of civil and religious despotism!

Sir, I think, with the member from Kentucky, that the contest is no longer doubtful; and that if the overtures of the parent country produced no immediate conciliatory result, a renewed warfare must at last end in the annihilation of the power of Old Spain over her colonies. It cannot be otherwise. When once liberal principles obtain in society, the power to prevent their extension, or to check their growth, must be infinitely greater than that which can be brought to operate upon South America. But, much as my best wishes are devoted to this holy cause, sanguine as are my hopes of its success, I yet think that there are reasons to influence the House to the rejection of the amendment now proposed. If there were no other reason to be urged against it, it seems to me to be a good objection that the amendment, if adopted, will be partial in its effect. We are given to understand that there are several distinct Republics in South America—Buenos Ayres, Chili, Colombia; and to these may shortly be added, Peru, if recent intelligence is to be trusted. Have not, then, all of these equal claims upon your sympathies? Why depute a Minister to the one in exclusion of the rest? Would it not be more just, by asking an ample appropriation, to give to all that encouragement, which the cause of all, so bravely defended and so gallantly pursued, would seem to demand? If you really desire to conciliate these infant Republics, to show them that you are alive to their wrongs and their calamities, why do you not address yourself to each and every of them? Why make a distinction unfounded in reason, niggardly in itself, and invidious in its effect? It may be answered, that it will be time enough to provide representatives of this nation for these Governments, when affairs have settled into certainty, and when it shall be shown into how many separate States South America is to be divided. If this be the reply, it may be directed very forcibly against the proposition now before you. It is, in truth, not proper that we should send an ambassador to a country, whose Government has been hastily built up under the sword of the oppressor, and may, in the versatility of revolutionary fortunes, fall beneath its power! Let us wait until a nation be completely formed and organized, before we exercise towards her that comity which belongs to the intercourse of nations. Let me not be misunderstood. I would not be considered to vary from the convictions which I have just avowed. I do not mean at one moment to say that it is my fixed belief that the Patriots will succeed, and then to indicate a contrary opinion. But who can calculate with certainty upon the events of futurity? Who can say that the armistice concluded between Morillo and Bolivar, under circumstances so soothing to humanity, will be followed by an acknowledgment of the independence of the Patriots? Is it altogether certain that Spain will withdraw her armies and her dominion, and quietly give up that which she has valued as the brightest, certainly the richest jewel of her crown? Have we not learned from experience—from her profuse expenditure of treasure—from her reckless waste of human blood—that nothing but necessity can compel her to relinquish the contest? Her interest, her pride, her habitual control, all incite her to perseverance! Besides Spain, under the auspices of the constitution of the Cortes, has offered to her colonies a participation in the Government, and a relief from some of the most odious of the evils against which they have been contending. It is, indeed, probable that these terms will be rejected, with an emotion nearly allied to disdain, but this, too, is only conjecture. The provinces desolated by a ruinous war, and thirsting for peace, may lend a favorable ear to propositions which, although not unexceptionable, promise to the weary and exhausted a repose, temporary, perhaps, but agreeable and invigorating. Sir, whatever events may ensue, if you adopt the amendment now under consideration, you are in danger of producing embarrassment to the Government. If the war in South America continue, you acknowledge the independence of a State yet struggling for its liberty. If Spain succeed in reconciling her provinces, you will present to the world a singular spectacle. You will have deputed an ambassador to the mother country, and another to her colonies.

Sir, the President of the United States possesses the power, with the consent of the Senate, to appoint ambassadors. From his elevated station, he has certainly a better view of the relations of this with other nations, than we possibly can have. Why, then, with limited means of information, do we desire to dictate to that department, which, from its nature and situation, is so much better informed? There is surely no necessity for an interference upon our part. The age, integrity, and experience of your President, the unquestioned ability of those gentlemen to whom he may at all times apply for advice and assistance, the acknowledged wisdom of the Senate demand your confidence. The Executive has doubtless deeply reflected upon this subject. It feels as the people feel, and if it has heretofore forbore to gratify the wishes of the member from Kentucky, it is because it has been restrained by prudential considerations, and not by an apathy towards the future destinies of South America. But it is insisted that the President has acted unwisely, and it becomes proper to coerce him to recognise the independence of some one of the Patriot Governments by making this appropriation. Do you not perceive how powerless and nugatory is such legislation? You resolved, at the last session, that it was expedient to send a Minister to South America, and what was the result? Why, no Minister has yet been appointed. You now appropriate money, and what is to be the consequence? It will be this: although the President, as a faithful public servant, must give due consideration to your enactment, yet, if he think the measure it proposes unwise, he will, as he is bound to do, entirely disregard it, and the money appropriated will remain idle and unexpended in your Treasury, at the moment, too, when you are borrowing millions! I deny not that we may fall upon evil times, when it may become necessary, from the corruption or partiality of the Chief Magistrate and the Senate, that this House should interpose. But this is a case merely possible, and most assuredly not now existing. But if it were—if the Executive had actually declined to send an ambassador to any Government, where our best interests required he should be sent, I ask, could you counteract such a policy by a mere appropriation? Believe me, it would be brevisum fulmen, hard, indeed, but inoperative! No; the course, I think, would be to withhold your appropriations for all Ministers, until the Executive should perceive the necessity of pursuing the path of duty. Such a course would produce the desired effect, but it would be harsh and uncourteous, and only to be justified by the necessity to be found in an extreme case.

We have been told, that it is due to the dignity of this House to carry into effect the measure of the last session. I had thought that the dignity of a nation, like that of an individual, depended more upon achievement than loud boasts or pompous promises. Let your appropriation be passed. The President still refuses to appoint an ambassador; and I ask you, where is your dignity then? You have wrestled with the Executive, but you have gained nothing by the contest; on the contrary, you suffer defeat, and the dignified attitude you would assume belongs to him who has obtained the victory!

This House is called upon to be consistent with itself, and to receive the proposed amendment, because it passed the resolution of the last session. It appears to me that the resolution of the last session obtained the votes of a majority on a ground entirely distinct from that taken in support of the present proposition. It was then said, "pass the resolution, it will give vigor to the cause of the Patriots; it will restore their confidence, revive their drooping spirits, advance their interests!" The House listened to the inspiring invocation; it was passed, and I have yet to learn that it was productive of any of the happy consequences which were foretold. Was it received with joy, with bonfires, and illuminations? Did it strike terror to the Royal army, or lead the Patriots to victory? If these were its effects, they have to this moment been to me a secret. Now, however, the object is varied. It is no longer to assist and encourage the Patriots by an expression of public opinion, but to coerce the Executive openly to recognise, as a permanent and established Government, some one of the South American Republics. If, indeed, the supporters of the resolution of the last session intended to pursue their project to this point, why did they not follow up that resolution by a proposition like that now submitted? Was it because they were hopeless of success? If so, the principle upon which their resolution passed must of necessity be different from that upon which they would support the appropriation; because, if they were the same, the majority sustaining the resolution would likewise have supported an appropriation. If they could have succeeded, and did not make the effort, did they act wisely in postponing a measure which they have so much at heart, and which, they say, is so intimately connected with the dignity of this House and this nation?

It is said, that our respect for Spain should not deter us from adopting the amendment, because Spain, regenerated as she is, has levelled a severe blow at our commerce. If this be so, we shall make it the subject of negotiation. We shall fairly develop the causes of complaint, and require the proper redress; but I hope we shall not, for the purpose of avenging an injury, no matter how serious it may be, recognise the independence of the colonies. Such a policy would justly be considered by the world as wanting in that candor and magnanimity for which this nation has been singularly remarkable; and the provinces themselves would be but little obliged to you for a patronage extended at the latest hour, not by your good will and devotion to liberty, but by feelings of resentment towards Old Spain. If your commercial difficulties with Spain be really great, and it be important to remove them, so far from operating to the adoption of a measure which must be offensive to her, they should teach us greater circumspection, and we should take care to remove, rather than increase, the obstacles impeding the way to negotiation.

As an inducement to adopt the amendment, a resort has been had to the perfidy of Spain since, and the long diplomacy preceding the first ratification of the Florida treaty. Sir, I am perfectly aware of the violation of a pledged faith, of which Spain has been guilty, and I admire the intrepidity and integrity of the American envoy, who poured the language of truth into the ear of a corrupt Government; but I cannot perceive why, if Spain has forgotten that justice which belongs to a virtuous nation, we should, on that account, hasten to acknowledge the independence of her colonies. It would be to shield your imprudence under the cover of her wickedness. No, sir. The time was when you might have repaired the injury you had sustained by using the remedy within your reach. That day has passed by, and the nation by whom you were wronged is now voluntarily upon the point of doing you justice. The treaty has been ratified, and Florida—which gentlemen have been pleased to describe as a howling desert, a collection of morasses, but which, I am credibly informed, is possessed of the most delightful climate, and contains some of the finest lands in the world—Florida will soon pass into your possession. We have demanded, and we shall receive, ample retribution for the injuries of which we complained, and if we are a generous people, we will consign to forgetfulness at once our discontents and their provocations.

But, it seems, it is highly necessary to us to preserve the affection of the Patriots. Sir, I am little skilled in the conduct of nations, but I have been taught to believe, that we are to expect nothing from the affection of any nation. It is to self-interest that we must address ourselves, and not to disinterested friendship, which scarcely has existence among men, even in the smallest societies, where early association and long habit would be most likely to cherish it. Rely upon it, it was this selfish feeling which gave to us our European allies, during the Revolutionary war, and not the admiration of our efforts, or the love of our institutions. It is true, the sympathy of the American people enlists itself in behalf of the suffering colonies; but, when we deliberate upon the conduct of the nation, we must ask, not whether we shall pursue the feelings of the people, but if it be our interest to pursue them? I speak not of sordid interest, but of the honor, reputation, and happiness of the nation.

We have listened to a story as horrible as a hideous barbarity and a collection of obscene circumstances could make it. It is not the first time I have heard such a narrative. Atrocities have been related which leave far behind them the bloodiest incidents of the most frantic period of the French revolution. Some of these doubtless have their foundation in fact, but may they not derive a deeper coloring from that love of the marvellous and terrible which is inseparable from our nature? If we remember that this has been a contest of extermination on both sides, unregulated by the laws of civilized warfare, can we believe that to the royalists alone belongs the guilt of cold-blooded murder, and more cruel butcheries? Or, would it not be fair to admit, that the same circumstances have produced the like excesses in both parties? In this point of view, then, there can be no reason why you should extend favor to the one at the expense of the other. But, unless my friend from Kentucky (Mr. TRIMBLE) shall insist that his authority is indisputable, I cannot implicitly give credence to the anecdote he has told. And why? Because I, in common with that gentleman, have a high respect for the character and talents of the patriot chieftain Bolivar. When the late armistice was concluded, those who had long been foes met as friends; in the moment of conviviality all sorrows and enmities were forgotten, and Morillo was clasped in the warm embrace of Bolivar! Sir, who is Bolivar? Ask the gentlemen who urge this appropriation, and they will tell you, he is the emancipator of an empire; a hero to whom history furnishes no resemblance, but in the magnanimity and virtues of our own Washington! And do we find this wisest, bravest, best of men, courting corruption to his arms; greeting a fiend in human form with the emotions of friendship?

Sir, the scene I have just described either places the character of Morillo in a more favorable point of view, or obscures, in some measure, the reputation of Bolivar. I am not the apologist of the Spanish General; I like his character little, and his cause less; but we are taught that it is proper to rescue even the worst men from unmerited obloquy. Admit, however, all that has been said to be true, is this the argument by which it is made manifest that we ought to recognise the independence of South America? Sir, it may move your pity, or rouse your abhorrence, but it cannot reach the judgment.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me inexpedient to make the appropriation proposed, because Spain and her colonies are at this moment endeavoring to put an end to their long, and barbarous, and bloody warfare. Why then should we interpose between the negotiating parties, and decree that for them which they are, of themselves, considering? It would be an act of supererogation in our Government to interfere at such a crisis.

For these reasons I am constrained to vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LOWNDES made the closing speech, in further objections to the motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLAY's motion, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Ball, Bateman, Beecher, Blackledge, Boden, Brown, Bryan, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Clark, Clay, Cocke, Cook, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Earle, Fisher, Floyd, Ford, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hackley, Hall of N. York, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hooks, Hostetter, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lincoln, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, Metcalf, Monell, R. Moore, S. Moore, T. J. Moore, Murray, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Philson, Pitcher, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Shaw, Sloan, Southard, Stevens, Storrs, Tarr, Tracy, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Udree, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Walker, Wallace, and Williams of Virginia—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Archer of Maryland, Barbour, Bayly, Brevard, Brush, Buffum, Burton, Butler of N. Hampshire, Claggett, Cobb, Crafts, Cushman, Dane, Dennison, Dickinson, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Fay, Folger, Foot, Forrest, Fuller, Gorham, Gray, Guyon, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hemphill, Hill, Hobart, Jones of Virginia, Kendall, Kent, Lathrop, Livermore, Lowndes, McLay, McCoy, McCullough, McLane of Delaware, Meigs, Mercer, Montgomery, Morton, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parker of Virginia, Pinckney, Plumer, Rankin, Reid, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Ringgold, Robertson, Russ, Sawyer, Sergeant, Silsbee, Simkins, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, Smith of North Carolina, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Swearingen, Terrell, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Warfield, Wendover, Whitman, Williams of North Carolina, and Wood—86.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BEECHER then moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision appropriating the sum of twenty thousand dollars for the repair of the Cumberland Road, being a part of the unexpended balance of appropriations for completing that road.

The motion was negatived; and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion, the House then adjourned until tomorrow.

SATURDAY, February 10.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the representatives of Patience Gordon, widow, deceased," made a report thereon, recommending that the said bill be rejected; which was read, and, together with the bill, was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HARDIN, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of exempting from the custom-house duties all such articles which are now by law subject to duty, as may have been, or may hereafter be, imported for the express use of the Roman Catholic cathedral and college erected and established at Bardstown, in Kentucky.

Mr. CANNON moved that the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill to provide an uniform system of organization for the militia of the different States and Territories, and for instructing the officers of the same at the expense of the United States, be discharged, and that the said bill be committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit:

"An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1821;" and

"An act to alter and establish certain post roads;"

Were severally read the third time, passed and sent to the Senate.

MISSOURI.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, submitted the following joint resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of Missouri be, and they are hereby, authorized to form a new constitution, or to alter the constitution which they have already formed and presented to Congress, in such way and manner as they may judge most proper, and submit the same to Congress, for the purpose of being admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. TOMLINSON said, the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire was certainly entitled to the deliberate consideration of the House, and, for the purpose of affording gentlemen an opportunity to examine the proposition, Mr. T. moved that it be laid upon the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the select committee, to whom the subject was referred, delivered in the following report and amendment:

The select committee to whom was referred the resolution from the Senate declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, have, according to order, had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit to the House the following report:

That they have entered upon the discharge of the duty assigned them by the House, with the most anxious desire to arrive at a conclusion which would give general satisfaction; that, in the prosecution of this purpose, it seemed to them to be useful to ascertain, in the first place, by a full and frank comparison of opinions among themselves, whether any, and what, conditions ought to be prescribed to the admission of Missouri into the Union; that, on making this comparison, the opinion appeared to be nearly unanimous in the committee, that no other conditions ought now to be required than those which were specified in the act of the last session of Congress, providing for the admission of Missouri into the Union; and that, considering all the circumstances attending that act, the settlement which it made of the question of restriction ought not to be disturbed; that this opinion limited their subsequent inquiry to the consideration of the single question, whether the constitution which Missouri has formed for herself contained any thing in it which furnished a valid objection to her incorporation in the Union? And, on that question, they thought that there was no other provision in that constitution to which Congress could of right take exception, but that which makes it the duty of the Legislature of Missouri to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from going to and settling in the said State. In regard to that clause, the same diversity of opinion existed among the members of the committee which had been previously manifested in the House—one portion believing it liable to an interpretation repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and the other thinking it not exposed to that objection, or that, if it were, the exceptionable interpretation was superseded by the paramount authority of the Federal Constitution.

With these conflicting opinions, the committee thought it best that, without either side abandoning its opinion, an endeavor should be made to frame an amendment to the Senate's resolution, which, committing neither, should contain an adequate security against the violation of the privileges and immunities of citizens of other States in Missouri; and, a majority of the committee thinking that such security could not be sufficiently afforded without some previous act to be done by the Legislature of Missouri, the amendment was finally agreed upon, which they now beg leave to report.

According to this amendment, Missouri is to be admitted into the Union upon the fundamental condition, that she shall never pass any laws preventing any description of persons from going to and settling in the said State, who now are, or hereafter may become, citizens of any of the States in this Union; and, upon the Legislature of the said State signifying its assent to that condition, by a solemn public act, which is to be communicated to the President of the United States, he is to proclaim the fact, and thereupon the admission of the said State into the Union is to be complete, without any further or other proceeding on the part of Congress. To prevent, however, this amendment from being considered as impairing any right which may appertain to Missouri, in common with other States, to exclude from her jurisdiction persons under peculiar circumstances, (such as paupers, vagabonds, &c.) a further proviso is added, declaring that nothing in the said amendment is to be construed to take from Missouri, when admitted into the Union, the exercise of any right or power which the original States may constitutionally exert.

The modification which the committee thus respectfully recommend of the Senate's resolution, is the result of a spirit of concord, under the guidance of which they have anxiously sought, without the sacrifice of principle on either side, to reconcile the variant opinions among them. There cannot be a doubt but that Missouri, solicitous as she must be, to participate in all the high advantages of our excellent Union, will eagerly seize the opportunity of testifying her attachment to the Federal Constitution, by giving the solemn pledge which she is asked to make, to respect the privileges and immunities which it secures to citizens of other States—a pledge become necessary, in the opinion of a large and respectable portion of the House, by the terms which she has employed in a clause of her constitution. Nor will there be a doubt of the sincerity or efficacy of such a pledge. On the other hand, if, by postponing, for a short period, her admission into the Union—a circumstance every day less and less important, in consequence of the lapse of the time allotted to this session, those who thought her invested with a perfect right to be admitted, without delay, are not fully gratified, they will be consoled by the reflection that the amendment requires only the performance of a precise and simple act, which cannot be mistaken by the highly responsible officer to whom the judgment of its execution is confided; and the whole House must be gratified with any proper disposition of the subject, which will henceforth free the public deliberations from the agitation and disturbance to which it is but too likely always to give rise. And your committee believe that all must ardently unite in wishing an amicable termination of a question which, if it be longer kept open, cannot fail to produce, and possibly to perpetuate, prejudices and animosities among a people to whom the conservation of their moral ties should be even dearer, if possible, than that of their political bond. Sharing, as the committee do, largely in this sentiment, they respectfully submit to the House the amendment which they propose, in the hope that it will be received and considered in the same spirit in which it has been devised.

Strike out all after the word "be" in the third line of the Senate's resolution, and insert

"Admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition, that the said State shall never pass any law preventing any description of persons from coming to and settling in the said State, who now are or hereafter may become citizens of any of the States of this Union: And provided, also, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday of November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof, the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to take from the said State of Missouri, when admitted into this Union, the exercise of any right or power which can now be constitutionally exercised by any of the original States."

The resolution, with the report, was, on motion of Mr. CLAY, ordered to lie on the table; and Mr. CLAY gave notice that he should call for its consideration on Monday.

H. OF R.

SOUTH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

Mr. CLAY rose, and submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish provinces of South America which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence; and that it will give its Constitutional support to the President of the United States, whenever he may deem it expedient to recognise the sovereignty and independence of any of the said provinces.

In offering this resolution, Mr. C. said, he was influenced by the general solicitude which he felt on this subject, and by the conviction that there was a majority of the House in favor of an expression of a sentiment favorable to the cause of the people of the Spanish provinces. The vote of yesterday, to the contrary, was influenced, in a great degree, it was evident, by considerations of form. He had framed this resolution so as, he hoped, to be unexceptionable in that respect; and, though it did not go as far as he wished to go, it went to a certain extent in giving the countenance of this House to the exertions of the people of the South. Mr. C. said, as the subject was well understood, and he wished not to consume the time of the House, he should not debate the proposition, unless he should be obliged to do so by debate against it.

Mr. REID moved that the resolution lie on the table, for consideration, as well because of the general importance of any proposition on this subject, and the propriety of acting on it with deliberation, as because the gentleman who was at the head of the Committee of Foreign Affairs (Mr. LOWNDES) was this day absent.

Mr. CLAY stated, that he had informed his friend at the head of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, who was absent from a temporary indisposition, that he intended to submit such a proposition as this to-day; and received for answer that he did not care about being present at the discussion, and did not wish to be sent for.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks, to show that the House ought to act with caution and deliberation on a proposition of this sort, which, for aught they knew, might compromise the peace of the country.

The question on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, resulted thus: For it laying on the table 71; against it 72.

So the motion was lost; and the question was stated on agreeing to the resolution.

Here arose a debate, which occupied the whole day.

Mr. WOOD first spoke in opposition to the motion; because it proposed to make needless professions, and was not therefore consistent with self-respect; because, if it had any object, it was an encroachment on the power of the Executive, and might produce a collision between the two departments of Government, which was much to be deprecated.

Mr. FLOYD referred to an early message of President Washington to Congress, to show that, at that time, the previous consent of Congress was thought necessary to the institution of foreign missions; thence, and from other considerations, arguing that this resolution, so far from interfering with the Executive prerogative was a fair exercise of the undoubted rights of this House. Mr. F. also supported the proposition on the ground of expediency, and as going to counteract the policy of the Holy Alliance by organizing a different policy on this side of the water, &c.

Mr. ARCHER required a division of the question, so as to take it first on the first member of the resolution. And the question was accordingly stated on agreeing thereto in the following words:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish provinces of South America which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence.

Mr. ROBERTSON deprecated the passage of the whole resolution as supererogatory, if not of injurious tendency. If it was intended only to apprise the Executive that this House would support him, that had been done by the vote of last session; if it was to express the sentiment of this House in regard to the subject, that too had been done by the vote of last session; and a repetition of such declarations could serve only to show a doubt of our own constancy. If, however, it was intended to goad the Executive into a departure from its hitherto wise policy on this subject, he was decidedly opposed to it, &c. Mr. R. concluded by saying, that as the proposition was divided, he should, though he deemed such a declaration wholly superfluous and unnecessary, vote in favor of the first clause of the resolution, and against the second.

Mr. WOOD then moved that the whole subject be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY assigned the reasons why he should vote for the indefinite postponement, and, should that not prevail, against both branches of the resolution. He was opposed to the first part of it, as asserting what he did not know to be the fact, and what he did not believe to be the fact as regarded his immediate constituents—that the people take a deep interest in a matter wholly foreign to them. The second part of the resolution he wholly disapproved. He believed it to be the true policy of this country to stand aloof from this conflict, as the Powers of Europe, more deeply interested, had done. Were we to engage in it, it was difficult to predict how it would end, &c. Mr. M. suggested, however, that the motion had an object something deeper than an expression of the opinion of this House, and that it might be intended to goad the President into a course of policy which his judgment did not approve, and which the nation did not wish for.

Mr. TYLER assigned the grounds on which, though he had voted against all the other propositions of the gentleman from Kentucky, he should vote for this. The first part of it, he said, asked him only to speak the sentiments of his constituents; and, knowing well their feelings on this subject, he could not hesitate to vote in the affirmative upon it. The second part of the resolution only proposed to declare, that the President of the United States enjoys so much the confidence of this House, that, whenever he should think proper to recognise the independence of any of the Southern provinces, it will support him in it. To this, Mr. T. had no objection. In voting for the whole proposition, he should only express the sentiment of his heart, a deep sympathy for a people struggling for liberty, &c.

Mr. WALKER expressed his sentiments decidedly in favor of the whole resolution. The subject, he said, was near his heart; and he would not hesitate to throw our weight into the scale of liberty. He enumerated several considerations which influenced him to this course, among which were the general duty of individuals and of societies to sympathize with and do good to one another; the similarity of the struggle of these provinces with Spain to that of our Revolution; the similarity, too, of their forms of government, &c. He was not afraid of trusting the President and had no fear of committing him, by passing this resolution.

Mr. MERCER assigned the reasons why he was in favor of this resolution, and against the postponement. He disclaimed any want of confidence in the Executive: nor did the resolution go upon any such ground, but on the contrary its very terms excluded such a conclusion. He considered it as differing widely in principle from the proposition to make an appropriation for sending a Minister or Ministers to South America. Adverting to the supposed power of the President to recognise the independence of a Government by receiving a Minister as well as by sending one, in which recognition the Senate would have no voice, it became this House, he said, to share a part of the responsibility which the Executive would incur by such a recognition. He doubted, himself, whether the President could recognise the independence of a foreign Power, by receiving a Minister, without the consent of this House. By this resolution, without prescribing any thing to the President, that difficulty would be removed. With regard to his constituents, Mr. M. expressed in strong terms his conviction of the deep feeling which they entertained favorable to the South Americans. Though approving of the course of the President in regard to the colonies hitherto, more than he did of his course to the mother country, (alluding to the occupation of Florida during the Seminole war,) he should yet cheerfully vote for the whole resolution.

Mr. CLAGETT stated the reasons why, though approving of the sentiments in the resolution, he could not vote for it. He considered the question to be the same in substance as that to which he yesterday gave a negative vote. So far as the provinces were engaged against the Spanish Government, they had his best wishes and sincere sympathy; but, he suggested, that, according to the best accounts we have, their struggle is more amongst themselves, and, so far, was one in which we could feel no sympathy. He expressed his surprise at the comparisons which had been so often made between the case of these provinces and that of our Revolution, between which the resemblance was at least remote. Believing that the power of recognition was confided to another branch of the Government, both competent and disposed to exercise it when proper, and for other reasons which he assigned, he was opposed to the resolution.

Mr. COBB assigned the considerations which induced him to doubt the propriety of passing this resolution, though entertaining a feeling of deep sympathy with the Southern provinces. He had, he said, almost a similar feeling in regard to the people of old Spain, now regenerated and comparatively free. The relative situation of Spain and her colonies, he argued, was now essentially different from what it was two or three years ago. They were then struggling against a relentless tyranny; but there was now at least a probability (referring to the pacification between Morillo and Bolivar, and to other indications) that old Spain would voluntarily do justice to the colonies. Mr. C. thought therefore it was not true policy at this time for this country to do any act on this subject, however inclined. For this consideration, and because he believed the Executive felt on this subject in the same manner as this House and the nation, and as he had indeed expressly said in his message, he saw no occasion for passing this resolution. It would be time enough to act, he argued, when the course of old Spain was clearly marked out. If, however, the direct vote on the resolution was forced upon the House, he should vote for the first part, but against the second, believing that sound policy was opposed to it.

Mr. BALDWIN opposed the resolution, not from any hostility to its avowed object, but because it proposed to refer to the President an act which, in his opinion, it was not for him, but for the three branches of the Government collectively, to perform. If any thing was done on this subject, he wished it to be done by all the branches of the Government.

Mr. MACLAY opposed the resolution, although, were he to suffer his feelings to govern him, he should be in favor of it. The subject, he said, had been long before the Executive, and much deliberated upon. Before such a resolution as this was passed, Mr. M. argued, that gentleman ought to be possessed of full information on the subject—of all the information which the Executive possesses, and by which its course has been influenced, that they might judge whether that Department had or had not performed its duty. Believing that it had done so, and would hereafter do so, he was against the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS defended the Constitutional right of this House to express its opinion on any topic of public interest. So far from interfering with the Executive authority, he regarded such expressions of opinion as facilitating the exercise of that authority, this being a Government of opinion, and as it must be desirable to the Executive to know what public opinion is, &c. With regard to this measure being a goad to the Executive, Mr. S. suggested that there was no reason to apprehend that the Executive of this day was to be alarmed or driven from his course by any such measure. He was in favor of the resolve as an expression of the opinion of this House, on a point on which he had no hesitation in expressing his individual opinion.

Mr. BROWN said, that he did not rise to enter into a lengthy argument, nor would he have arisen at all had there not appeared a difference of opinion between two of his colleagues, (Mr. CLAY and Mr. MONTGOMERY,) upon a point in which the character of his immediate constituents and the State at large, seemed to him much concerned. He meant no less than a diversity of opinion as to the sensibility of Kentucky to the cause of liberty, in which the patriots of South America were engaged, and to the protracted suffering of that oppressed people. His colleague, the honorable mover of this resolution, (Mr. CLAY,) believed that the people of Kentucky took a deep interest in the struggle of the patriots of South America. His colleague (Mr. MONTGOMERY) did not know that his constituents felt such an interest. Mr. B. said, that he was free to declare it as his belief that the people of Kentucky did feel a lively and strong interest for the success of the Patriot cause; and that he was led to this conclusion whether he judged from the expressions of those with whom it had been his pleasure to mingle, the rumor of the country at large, from the entertainments given in honor of his colleague (Mr. CLAY,) at which sincere thanks had been expressed for his disinterested ardor and fervid eloquence, in support of the cause of the Patriots; or whether he judged from the almost universal expression of the wish of the people for the success of the Patriots, at each successive anniversary of our independence, when, in the social and festive circle, the feelings of the heart have been most free and undisguised. He said, finally, to trouble the House no further upon this point, that, whatever might be the feelings of the constituents of his honorable colleague, (Mr. MONTGOMERY,) he would unhesitatingly pledge himself to the House, that the people of that portion of the State which he had the honor to represent did take a warm and deep interest in the cause of South American liberty.

Mr. B. said that, while up, he would take occasion to say, that no member upon that floor entertained more favorable sentiments of the patriotism and wisdom of our venerable Chief Magistrate than he did; a patriotism established by a long life of devotion to his country, in high and responsible stations. He would, on all occasions, refrain from invading the prerogatives of every co-ordinate branch of the Government, or from wantonly or lightly injuring the feelings of any of her officers; the first would be unwise, the last cruel. But, while he entertained these sentiments, he must be permitted to say, that he had felt, on more occasions than one, this House somewhat humiliated, by the display of an inflamed sensibility for the feelings and prerogatives of the Executive Department. For one, he was disposed to act, when impelled by a sense of duty, without so much regard to these considerations. He begged leave to suggest, for the consideration of gentlemen who claimed to be the exclusive friends of the Executive, whether the course which they pursued was not calculated to defeat the object which they had in view, by authorizing an opinion that their approbation was a blind one; or that they feared his measures would not bear scrutiny? He hoped and believed that the President would not disappoint the favorable expectations of his country. Mr. B. said, that each branch of the Government, must, or ought to act upon the information which each severally possessed, and not upon that which, by possibility, might be possessed by another.

He knew not what information was possessed by the President beyond his own; he admitted it to be his right, and often his duty, (and he should not contend that he had violated either on this occasion,) to retain within his own department the information which he collected; and while he most willingly admitted that the President might be free from blame, judging by the facts before him, the President would have the liberality not to censure Congress, should they arrive at a different conclusion from the facts within their knowledge, and not those known to him, and of which they were ignorant. Mr. B. said, that he would frankly declare, that, from the information which he had, (by some reading and inquiry obtained, but which he would not consume the time of the House to communicate,) he had believed this Government too cold and tardy in its advance towards a recognition of the Patriot Governments of South America; but, whether right or wrong, he entertained no doubt that the President had, with the most anxious wishes for his country's good, pursued the course of policy which he had done. He believed this an occasion on which it comported with the dignity and character of the American Congress to express their own sentiments, as well as those which they believed actuated their constituents; and, after having borne this evidence, he had great confidence that the President, giving that consideration to this proceeding which it merited, and reviewing the whole circumstances, would decide wisely and satisfactorily. And should the adoption of the resolution, in which is contained a pledge of support, have the effect of encouraging and strengthening the confidence of the President in the policy of treating the revolutionary governments of South America with more kindness than heretofore, he, for one, should not deplore the result. But, Mr. B. said, I have felt myself still more humiliated when any department of the Government, and more particularly the members of this House, have esteemed it necessary to predicate our movements, essentially, upon the smiles or frowns of foreign Governments.

Several gentlemen have alluded to the disasters which might arise from giving offence to the crowned heads across the Atlantic. I would not, sir, disregard the interests, opinions, or even the feelings of foreign nations; but, giving a due weight to these considerations, the American Government should decide upon its true interest and policy, and having done so, proceed with a firm and steady pace, fearless of the consequences of displeasure from abroad. Mr. B. said, that gentlemen who opposed the resolution had not been altogether consistent; most of those who have favored us with their views, have bottomed their opposition upon the ground that it is the exclusive duty of the President to decide upon the policy of foreign missions, and were fearful that this measure might be construed into a censure, or an attempt at coercion upon him. A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) did not fear an encroachment upon the feelings or prerogative of the President, being of opinion that Congress, and not the Executive, ought to decide upon the policy of recognising the Patriots; and that Congress seemed by this resolution to recede from a discharge of their duty, and to be willing, tamely, to cast it upon the President. While another equally distinguished member from the same State (Mr. SERGEANT) concurred in the conclusion that the resolution ought to be rejected, but upon grounds altogether different from, and repugnant to, those of his colleague. These are some of the inconsistencies into which gentlemen had been driven by a precipitate opposition to a resolution so manifestly plain and unexceptionable. Mr. B. said that he believed the Executive branch of the Government possessed of the Constitutional power of performing those acts which would amount to a recognition; that he would not now detain the House with the arguments upon which he rested his opinion; that he would say, with the utmost sincerity, that he was equally opposed to censure or coercion; but that he did wish the Executive to be fully and officially informed of the feelings of this House and of the nation; as well as of their confidence in his wisdom and their determination to support him. And this course had become doubly necessary, since a doubt had been expressed upon this floor, as to the feelings of the nation. The resolution amounted to no more, without the most palpable distortion, than an expression of good will towards the South American provinces; and a determination, from our confidence in the President, to support him. The opposition was, to him, wholly unaccountable. Mr. B. said, sir, acting upon such information as I possess, I shall do my duty as dictated by the feelings of my heart, and the operations of my judgment, though the sensibility of the President should be offended, or though, about which I care still less, Kings or Emperors should think us uncourteous. I am sure they will think us fair, frank, and generous. I will not shrink from my portion of responsibility, and let the President take his.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, stated several objections to the resolution, among which were the following: That it attributed to the President a power (that of recognition) too important to be exercised by any authority less than the three branches of the Government; that it proposed to make this House, incompatibly with the Constitution, the adviser of the President, thus taking from him a part at least of his Constitutional responsibility; that it would afford a bad precedent, which, in future times, may be used, through the influence of the President, in this House; that it proposes that this House should compromise its successors in office, which it could not do, and which it was therefore improper to attempt, &c.

Mr. Cook opposed this resolution, though he had yesterday voted in favor of Mr. CLAY's proposition, because it proposed an empty declaration, after refusing an efficient act. So far from believing that such a resolution as this would aid the cause of the South American Patriots, he believed it would inspire them with contempt for the course of this House. It was saying, in connexion, with yesterday's vote, we wish you well, very well, but not as much well as eighteen thousand dollars.

Mr. CLAY then delivered a speech of half an hour's length in support of his motion. He opposed to one another the objections to the resolution, to show that they would not stand together, and therefore denied their claim to respect taken separately. He quoted the precedent of the resolution of Congress to support the President in any consequences which might follow the dismissal of the British Minister, Mr. Jackson, some years ago, and alluded to other precedents of expressions of opinion by this House. He ridiculed and reasoned against the argument that this resolution would hurt the feelings of the Executive, or encroach on his authority. It was, on the contrary, he contended, assuming only a fair responsibility on the part of this House, and adding strength to the Executive. He referred to the vote of last session, and the counter vote of yesterday, which appeared to him imperiously to require the passage of this resolution. He protested against the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, drawn from the situation of Old Spain, as absolutely founded on the idea that the colonies ought to repass under the yoke of Spain. The argument which denied the power of one Congress to bind its successors, would, he contended, equally apply to the most important acts of legislation, such as declarations of war, &c. As to the sentiments of the people on this subject, Mr. C. said that was a matter of fact which each gentleman must determine for himself, and vote accordingly. For his own part, he had no doubt what were the sentiments of his constituents on this subject; and, repeating a sentiment thrown out by Mr. MENCER, he said, if they did not entertain such sentiments, so help him God he would not represent them. If the matter of fact was certain, he could see no reason against avowing it. With respect to the mode of recognition of foreign Powers, Mr. C. reviewed the various opinions which had been expressed at different times, as well as to-day, on this subject. He concluded that both Congress and the Executive had this power, but that the most regular, ordinary, and usual course was by the Executive; and it was, therefore, proper to assure him of the support of this House, &c. There was a peculiar propriety, Mr. C. contended, in this House moving in this business, being the immediate representatives of the people, and the cause of South America being that of the people, as being the cause of human liberty, &c. Mr. C. concluded by saying, if this proposition did not satisfy gentlemen, it was impossible for him to conceive in what shape a proposition on this subject could be placed, so as that they could vote for it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then rose, and took a wider view of the question than he had done before, going into the general argument which recommends great caution in the recognition of the independence of a country embroiled in civil war. He again denied the right, attributed to the President by the resolution, to make such recognition without the assent of Congress. He expatiated on the magnitude of such a power, the exercise of which would, if any thing could, plunge the nation into a war; for illustration of which he referred to the war between France and England, caused solely by the recognition, by the former, of our independence. All history, he said, spoke the same language. If the Hartford Convention, during the late war, had realized the view of some of its projectors, how, he asked, should we have acted in regard to any neutral nation which had recognised the independence of the States represented in that Convention? Mr. S. strongly protested against the resolution, as inexpedient in every view, and asserting for the Executive a power which it did not possess.

Mr. KINSEY made a glowing appeal to the feelings of the House in favor of liberty, and to its sympathies for those contending for it. The sentiment of the country, he argued, could not be doubted, and it ought to be expressed. If war should come, said he, in consequence of the expression of our opinion, let it come. He trusted no man would shrink from the expression of his honest opinion from any such apprehension as that. In reply to the question cui bono—what good was to come of this? Mr. K. drew a vivid picture of the scenes of our Revolution, and of the vivifying effect of the news of the recognition of our independence by France. Was it no good, he asked, that we should be instrumental in elevating so large a portion of the human race to the same rank as we enjoy, and to a participation of the blessings of freedom and liberty? Mr. K. said he had confidence that this question would carry. It must carry; and it would meet with the decided approbation of the people of this country.

Mr. SERGEANT delivered his objections to the resolution, though believing that, if the question were taken on the first part of it only, there would be but little or no objection to it. His objections were, in general terms, that it expresses an individual opinion, and professes to give a pledge which must be utterly inefficacious; that it is not a legislative act, and is not to lead to a legislative act; that it contains a declaration by which neither this House, the President, nor the Senate, would be bound; that it would involve the House in difficulties on Constitutional ground; that, if Congress wish a recognition, having the power equally with the Executive, they should effectuate their wish by a legislative act; that, if the opinion of this House was to be expressed, even that should not be done without due inquiry and examination of facts, none of which had been placed before the House in any thing like an official shape; that the House ought to take care not to lose sight, in acts of kindness and expressions of good will to other Powers, of the duty which it owed to this nation—to the interests of the people whom they represent; that general and vague oral information was not a sufficient ground for Congress to act upon; that, if official information was before the House requiring it to act, its act should be something plainer than this, and presenting on its face a direct proposition; that its not doing so, caused it to be more lightly considered and voted upon than it ought to be; that, however independent of the Executive, as an individual, this House might be, yet, with respect to the Executive as a branch of this Government, it was important that this House should not disturb the harmony of the different departments of Government, as adjusted by the Constitution itself, and that it should not rush from its sphere, and jostle the others in their course.

Mr. BRUSH assigned his reasons for voting for the resolution. His reason was, that the Executive would look at both votes of this House, that of yesterday, and that of to-day. The vote of yesterday approved his conduct in not sending a Minister; this resolution did the same, assuring him of the continued and consistent support of this House—and on that ground alone he should vote for it.

Mr. REID assigned the reasons why he should vote against the second part of the resolution, should it not be postponed, because, to pass it would be without object, because, in principle and spirit, it was a repetition of the vote of last session, and, therefore, unnecessary, the vote of last year not being rendered nugatory by the vote of yesterday, but perfectly reconcilable with it; that the resolution, if it proposes to bind not only this House, but its successors, makes a pledge which it may be impossible to redeem; that it pledges, moreover, a support to an unknown act—to an act which may or may not be unwise or pernicious to the public interest; that such a pledge was an acknowledgment of Executive infallibility which it did not become the House to sanction. With regard to the first part of the resolution, Mr. R. said, he should vote for it, if presented to him, believing it to correspond fully with the feelings and wishes of his constituents.

Mr. ROBERTSON concluded the debate by some remarks in favor of the indefinite postponement of the resolution, on the ground that, to act on the subject, would be an useless consumption of time, and, having already once expressed the same sentiment, (at the last session,) would be an undignified proceeding. With respect to the bearing of this resolution, in one way or another, in regard to the Executive, Mr. R. remarked that it somehow or other had happened that, during the four years he had been in Congress, he had never yet voted with the Executive on any administration question, unless the Army question was considered one. In this course he had not been influenced by any disposition to embarrass the Executive, but his personal opinion of what was right. But, he added, whilst he would never vote for any proposition to gratify the Executive, he would never give his vote for any proposition calculated to embarrass and perplex him in the discharge of his proper functions.

The question on indefinite postponement was then taken, and decided in the negative.

Mr. FOOT, in order to get rid of a subject on which he considered the time of the House to be unprofitably occupied, moved to lay the resolution on the table.—Negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. WOOD moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto a proviso to the following effect: "Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to interfere with the independent exercise of the treaty-making power."

This motion was negatived.

The question on agreeing to the first clause of the resolution was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Beecher, Blackledge, Boden, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Burton, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Claggett, Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Crawford, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Eustis, Fisher, Floyd, Ford, Fuller, Gray, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of N. NAYS—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, Buffum, Crafts, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Folger, Foot, Livermore, Montgomery, Nelson of Virginia, Richards, and Strong of Vermont.

So this clause was agreed to.

Mr. MACLAY then moved to amend the second member of the said resolution by prefixing thereto the following: "That it approves of the course heretofore pursued by the President of the United States with regard to the said provinces." And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative without debate.

The question was then taken to agree to the second member of the said resolution, to wit: from the word and, after the word independence, to the end thereof, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Allen, of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Ball, Bateman, Bayly, Beecher, Blackledge, Boden, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of La., Campbell, Cannon, Case, Clark, Clay, Cocke, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Dewitt, Earle, Fisher, Floyd, Ford, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hooks, Hostetter, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lincoln, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, Mercer, Metcalf, Monell, R. So that clause was agreed to.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the proposition, as a whole, and carried in the affirmative; and a committee of two members was ordered to be appointed to lay the same before the President.

MONDAY, February 12.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas L. Ogden and others," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting papers containing the information required by the resolution adopted on the 5th instant in relation to the Marine Corps; which letter and papers were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, provision by law is necessary to secure the due execution of process issuing from the courts of the United States.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

[From a few explanatory remarks of Mr. CLAY, in offering this resolution, it appeared that his object was to inquire whether any provision was necessary to authorize a Judge of the United States to provide for the contingency of a State's refusing to the United States the use of its jails—a law to that effect having actually been passed by the Legislature of one of the States, (Ohio,) with a view to process of a certain description.]

On motion of Mr. ROBERT MOORE, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the removal of the obstructions in the entrance of Erie harbor, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE accompanied the above resolution with an attested copy of a resolution adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania, approved by the Governor on the 1st of February instant, "requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their exertions in procuring the passage of a law providing for the removal of the obstructions in the entrance of the said harbor; and pledging that Commonwealth to co-operate with the United States in the accomplishment of that object;" which resolution, together with the memorial of sundry inhabitants of the borough of Erie, in the said State, heretofore presented on the 29th of December, 1817, was referred to the Committee of Commerce.

The House then, on motion of Mr. STORRS, proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him a few days ago, with regard to the order of business in the House; and the same was, after some conversation, agreed to, in the following words:

Ordered, That, during the remainder of the present session of Congress business referred to Committees of the whole House shall be called for consideration in the following order:

1. Private bills which have passed the Senate, and have been reported upon favorably by a committee of the House.
2. Private bills reported by committees of the House.
3. Bills and resolutions of a public nature.
4. Bills which have passed the Senate and have been reported against by a committee of the House.
5. Reports unfavorable to petitioners.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of public lands prior to the 1st July, 1820," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

MISSOURI.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CLAY, proceeded to consider the report of the committee appointed on the Missouri subject. On motion of Mr. C. it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. And, also on motion of Mr. C., the House forthwith resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, to take the subject up.

The amendment proposed by the committee having been read from the Chair—

Mr. CLAY gave a detailed account of the proceedings in the committee, of the difficulty which interposed, and of the considerations which led to the recommendation of this amendment. This statement of course corresponded with that contained in the report of the committee. Mr. C. then went on to obviate some objections to the report which had been made by the friends of Missouri, as well as by those opposed to her admission into the Union. Although those in favor of her admission into the Union could not succeed entirely in their particular views, Mr. C. was of opinion that they had, as regarded the report of the committee, nothing to complain of. At the same time, the report was calculated to obviate the objections of those who had opposed the admission of Missouri on the ground of the objection to her constitution, which had been avowed. Thus consulting the opinions of both sides of the House, in that spirit of compromise which is occasionally necessary to the existence of all societies, he hoped it would receive the countenance of the House. Mr. C. concluded by earnestly invoking the spirit of harmony and kindred feeling to preside over the deliberations of the House on the subject.

Mr. MALLORY moved to amend the amendment proposed by the committee, by striking out all of it, after the words "respects," and, in lieu thereof, inserting the following:

"Whenever the people of said State, by a convention appointed according to the manner provided by the act to authorize the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain territories, approved March 6, 1820, adopt a constitution conformably to the provisions of said act, and shall in addition to said provisions, further provide, in and by said constitution, that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever be allowed in said State of Missouri, unless inflicted as a punishment for crimes committed against the laws of said State, whereof the party accused shall be duly convicted. Provided that the civil condition of those persons who now are held to service in Missouri shall not be affected by the last provision.

This motion was negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. TOMLINSON addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Having had the honor to be one of the committee which reported the resolution now under consideration, and dissenting to that report, I am aware that it is a duty incumbent on me briefly to state the grounds of such dissent. The state of my health will prevent me from occupying any considerable portion of your time. I have indulged the hope that some honorable member of the select committee, coinciding with me in the opinions which I have deliberately formed, upon the proposition now under consideration, would favor this committee with his views in relation to it; but as no gentleman has thought proper to do so, I am compelled, on this occasion, in justice to myself, to deviate from the course which I have hitherto pursued respecting the discussion of the question which has so long agitated the National Councils, and to state the objections to this resolution which have presented themselves to my mind, and which will induce me to vote against it. I know not how they may be viewed by other gentlemen, but with me they are conclusive.

By the act, passed at the last session of Congress, the inhabitants of the Territory of Missouri, included within boundaries therein designated, were authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, for the purpose of being admitted into the Union. This act provided that such constitution, whenever formed, should not be "repugnant to the Constitution of the United States." The inhabitants of the Territory of Missouri, under the authority of the act to which I have referred, have formed a constitution, and have presented the same to Congress. For what purpose? That Congress may perform a mere ministerial act, and admit that people into this Union as a matter of course? No, sir; Congress have a higher duty to perform. It is the duty of Congress to determine whether that constitution be republican and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

On examining this constitution it is found to contain, under the title of "the legislative power," a provision that it shall be the duty of "the General Assembly as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever." This provision is deemed incompatible with, and directly repugnant to, the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Sir, I have not been an inattentive observer of what has passed, on this subject, so deeply affecting the feelings of Congress and the nation, and I do not recollect that, either in this House or in the Senate, (if it be not out of order to refer to the proceedings of that honorable body,) any other objection has been urged, during the present session, against the admission of Missouri into this Union. This House, after an elaborate discussion, has solemnly determined that this objection is well founded, and has rejected the resolution for the admission of Missouri into this Union, reported by the committee to which her constitution was referred. This expression of the opinion of this House, repeated in a variety of forms, renders it unnecessary, and, I may add, improper, for me again to agitate this question. A majority of this House have determined that the constitution of Missouri does deprive citizens of some of the States of the privileges and immunities of citizens in that State. I shall, therefore, take it for granted, (which, indeed, the appointment and report of the committee, now under consideration, evidently do,) that the constitution of Missouri is repugnant to that of the United States, and subversive of the fundamental principles of this Confederacy. In my judgment, the Constitution of the United States does not contain a provision more important than that which is infringed by the constitution of Missouri. Admit the principle, sir, that a State may restrain the citizens in the several States from coming to, and residing within it, and this Confederacy is at an end. Believing, therefore, that the General Assembly of Missouri are required, as soon as may be, to pass laws, which will deprive persons who are citizens of the several States, of all privileges and immunities of citizens in the proposed State of Missouri, I have been compelled to refuse her admission into this Union. She has no right to such an admission. Missouri has not complied with the provisions of your act. She disregards the distinguishing feature of our Constitution. On taking my seat in this House, I solemnly engaged to support the Constitution of the United States. Entertaining the opinion which I have avowed, can I admit Missouri into this Confederacy, with a constitution containing a provision directly repugnant to that which I have sworn to support? To admit Missouri with such a provision, I must approve it; I must give to it my sanction. Sir, the Constitution of the United States is the charter of our liberties, and must be preserved inviolate. I stand upon its verge, and no encroachment shall be made upon it with my consent. When a new member presents herself to be admitted into this Union, let her bow to the Constitution; let her submit to its paramount authority. If she be not prepared to do this, she is unworthy of this high privilege; she does not deserve the destiny she seeks.

But it has been said by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) that, if the constitution of Missouri be repugnant to that of the United States, the section thus repugnant is annulled by the paramount authority of the latter. Sir, it seems to me, that this argument proves too much.

Is it not equally true that any law of Congress violating the Constitution of the United States is void, and will be so pronounced by the judiciary? But will the honorable gentleman contend that Congress are, therefore, at liberty to pass such a law? Are Congress absolved from all inquiry as to the constitutionality of a proposed measure, because such a measure, if adopted, would be annulled by the paramount authority of the Constitution? Sir, the proposition of the honorable gentleman, if carried to its legitimate extent, will bring him to this result. The argument of the honorable gentleman, like all his arguments, is ingenious, but it certainly is not solid. This Government never has been, and never ought to be, administered upon this principle. Adopt it, and Congress is no longer restrained by the Constitution, but may be considered aloft upon the ocean of unlimited power.

But, sir, my sense of duty will not allow me, knowingly, to pass an unconstitutional act, in the expectation that the judiciary will declare it inoperative. No, Mr. Chairman, it is the duty of Congress to meet every Constitutional question, and deliberately to determine it. The powers of Congress are limited to the Constitution, and it is bound not to transcend those powers. The Constitution of Missouri is before Congress, and you are bound to pronounce upon it. Congress is bound to decide whether the constitution of Missouri be, or be not, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. There is no escape from it, except by the prostration of those great principles on which this Confederacy depends. The performance of our duty here can, under no circumstances, be transferred to another branch of this Government. Besides, sir, if we neglect our duty, how do we know that the judiciary will not follow our example?

Entertaining the settled opinion that the clause in the constitution of Missouri, which has been so often adverted to, is entirely incompatible with the Constitution of the United States, I can never consent to her admission into this Union, until she shall have expunged that clause from her constitution. The resolution before this committee does not propose that this shall ever be done. By this resolution Missouri is to be admitted into this Union, retaining the objectionable feature in her constitution with a qualification of the section in question, to say the least, of very doubtful import. It does not propose to do that which I deem indispensable; it does not propose to expunge the unconstitutional section.

But, sir, the manner in which this restriction upon the constitution of Missouri is to be effected, is altogether unjustifiable. The Legislature of Missouri, now acting under her constitution and by its authority, are required to stipulate, as a fundamental condition of the admission of that State into the Union, that neither they, nor any subsequent Legislature in that State, will pass certain laws, which the constitution by which they will be organized, under which they will act, and which they will have sworn to support, makes it their duty to pass. Sir, this is a most extraordinary requirement. It is humbling to Missouri. It substantially requires the members of her Legislature perpetually to disregard their oaths.

Mr. Chairman, I contend that the Legislature of Missouri have no power to make the stipulation required by this resolution. What does the resolution provide? That Missouri shall be "admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition that the said State shall never pass any law preventing any description of persons from moving to, and settling in, the said State, who now are, or hereafter may become, citizens of any of the States in this Union;" requiring at the same time "that the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition." The Legislature of Missouri will be required by the authority of Congress to stipulate, by a solemn public act, that the Legislature of said State shall never pass a law which their constitution makes it their duty to pass. Not only the power of the present Legislature is to be restrained by this solemn public act, but it is to be of perpetual obligation. The principle contained in this resolution is, that the Legislature of Missouri may not only control the powers of subsequent Legislatures, but even restrain the power of the people themselves, and may forever part with the power of legislating on a given subject. Indeed, it is nothing less than admitting the existence of a power to abrogate, by a legislative act, the constitution of a State. This, sir, is a dangerous power. The States of this Union might easily, and would most certainly, be prostrated by the exercise of such a power.

But, sir, from what source does the Legislature of Missouri derive the power to make the stipulation which this resolution demands? That body acts under the constitution of Missouri, which defines their powers, and surely no power will be found in it to pass the act in question. On the contrary, the constitution absolutely requires them to do that which you call upon them to refrain from doing forever. If there were no such provision, it cannot be successfully claimed that power like that to be exercised by the Legislature of Missouri, under this resolution, resides in any legislative body, however free from constitutional restraints.

But, Mr. Chairman, the constitution formed by the people of Missouri provides a special mode in which it shall be altered or amended. Now is it in the power of her Legislature to stipulate that it shall be altered in another mode? Surely not. If then the section in question could not be expunged from the constitution of Missouri by an act of her Legislature, can it be rendered inoperative by such an act? Can the Legislature of Missouri stipulate that, although standing in her constitution, it shall be considered as annulled? Were I to admit this, it seems to me I must admit that the same Legislature may annul any other part of the constitution, and finally the constitution itself. Thus, the delegated power would be rendered paramount to the power which created it. Sir, I had supposed that the acts of the agent must be controlled by the authority of the principal, and could never transcend it. But, will it be contended that the people of Missouri, when they elected their present Legislature, intended that they should exercise, or be invested with, this gigantic power? I think not. They have, then, no shadow of authority to pass the solemn public act in question; and should they think proper to pass such an act, it must be pronounced a perfect nullity, and might, and probably would, be disregarded by their successors.

If then the Legislature of Missouri have no such power, which is to my mind extremely clear, can Congress delegate to that body a power to alter the constitution of that State? If Congress possess the power to authorize the Legislature of Missouri to alter or amend the constitution, they can authorize any other body of men to do it. Her Senators and Representative here may be thus authorized; nay, Congress may frame a constitution for that people. Sir, this resolution involves an assumption of power on the part of Congress utterly unjustifiable, and entirely unprecedented. Congress may, it is true, require of a State, on its admission into this Union, certain conditions, but those conditions must be approved and accepted by the people, either in their primary assemblies, or by their delegates especially elected, and assembled in convention for that purpose.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

It has, however, been said by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. FORD,) who last addressed the Committee, that it would be "impossible to congregate a set of rascals in Missouri, who would disregard an act passed under the circumstances which would attend the passage of this act." I believe this to be the language of the honorable gentleman. Sir, I am far from imputing to the people of that Territory any thing improper. They undoubtedly would be influenced by motives the most honorable and correct; but what do you call upon them to do? You require of them to disregard the Constitution which they will have sworn to support; to lay aside their oaths, and to impose upon themselves and their successors a perpetual disability. It seems to me that such a proposition is not much calculated to strengthen their principles of integrity. If they be that high-minded people which they have been represented to be, will they not treat this proposition with indignity? Will they not reject a proposition, the adoption of which would seem to involve a dereliction of public duty? But should the Legislature of Missouri, already elected under the constitution recently adopted by that people, submit to this "fundamental condition," and by "a solemn act declare the assent of the said State" thereto, and should a subsequent Legislature, acting under the same constitution, and feeling the obligation of an oath to support that constitution, disregard this "fundamental condition," would they deserve the imputation to which the honorable gentleman from New York is disposed to consider them liable? Would they be bound in good faith to fulfil a pledge which their predecessors had no right to make? As honest men, which would control their acts, the unauthorized pledge of their predecessors, or the constitution of the State? But it has been said that, having been admitted into this Union with this condition, a spirit of magnanimity would impel them to the fulfilment of this stipulation; but that magnanimity which has for its basis a neglect of a public duty is an unsafe dependence.

Sir, if Congress are to depend upon the magnanimity of the people of Missouri, why not admit them into the Union at this time, and without condition? Why not say to them, you are indeed a magnanimous and high-minded people, and we are willing to trust to your good faith; you have, it is true, a provision in your constitution which is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, but we are willing to trust to your good sense and liberality, and friendly disposition, and high regard for the institutions of this nation, to expunge the objectionable section. Such a measure would at least possess the merit of consistency. But, by the resolution before the Committee, you propose to require of them to make a positive stipulation, to be of perpetual obligation, and then trust to the magnanimity of that people to perform it. Sir, I will not for a moment insinuate that it will be possible to "congregate" in Missouri a Legislature composed of any but the most upright and honorable men; but I will say that, by violating an unconstitutional stipulation of their predecessors, they would not forfeit this character. Sir, the act required of Missouri is a mere legislative act, and a subsequent Legislature may at all times repeal it. It may be called "a solemn public act;" but words will not change its character; disguise it as you will, it is nothing more than an act of the Legislature of Missouri, repealable at their pleasure.

But, Mr. Chairman, this resolution provides that the Legislature of Missouri "shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact, whereupon, and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete." To this provision, sir, I cannot assent. You propose to admit a new State into this Union, as a member of this confederacy, upon a "fundamental condition," and to authorize the President to "announce the fact," that she has complied with this condition.

Sir, I entertain the highest respect for the enlightened statesman who presides over this nation, and have the most entire confidence that the duties of his station will be faithfully and satisfactorily discharged, but I cannot consent to transfer to him a power which belongs to Congress alone. What is the President to do? He is to announce, by proclamation, that Missouri has complied with the fundamental condition required by Congress; that a solemn public act has been passed by the Legislature of Missouri, of the character prescribed by this resolution. This, sir, may be a very delicate and difficult question; it certainly is a grave question, as it affects the rights and privileges of a considerable portion of the citizens of this Confederacy. The power to admit new States into this Union is by the Constitution given to Congress; that instrument provides that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." Now, sir, can Congress part with this power, and provide that "new States may be admitted into this Union by the President?" But does not this resolution propose thus to transfer this high power? Missouri is not admitted into this Union absolutely, but prospectively, upon a "fundamental condition." If this condition be not acceded to, she is not a member of this Confederacy. Who is to decide this question? The President. By whom will she be admitted, then? By the President. Sir, it is the Constitutional duty of Congress to determine whether Missouri have or have not complied with this condition. Missouri has a right to call upon Congress to decide it; the nation may claim the same right; and the Constitution has intrusted Congress with the exercise of this power; and, in my judgment, Congress cannot properly delegate it to the Executive.

The act of the last session of Congress admitted Missouri into the Union, provided, among other provisions, that the constitution which she might form should not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; and we have been occupied during the greater part of this session in discussing the question whether there be any such repugnancy. Now a question of similar import, and of not less importance, and, as it may be of not less difficulty, is to be referred to the decision of the Executive. Why was not this expedient thought of at the last session? If it be now proper, it was equally so then. The whole course of proceedings in relation to this subject, at this session, has been upon the ground that some act of Congress is necessary to complete the admission of this new State. Missouri is not now a State in this Union, and can never become so without the consent of Congress.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

If, then, it be admitted that a further act of legislation is necessary to complete the admission of Missouri; that Congress must decide whether any provision in her constitution be incompatible with that of the United States, and that this incompatibility, if found to exist, must be removed by her before she can be admitted, is it proper to authorize the Executive to declare by a proclamation that this condition has received the assent of Missouri, and thus to render her admission complete? Sir, this momentous question ought to be determined by Congress, upon a view of the constitution of Missouri, and all the circumstances attending it, at the time of her admission.

The admission of a new State has been termed an act of sovereignty, and has been confided by the Constitution of the United States to Congress. Will you, then, transfer to the President a power which rightfully and constitutionally belongs to the next Congress? You have rejected the constitution of Missouri for reasons which are satisfactory to a majority of this Committee. You have done your duty. Let those who may follow perform that which shall devolve on them.

But, why are gentlemen unwilling to bring this question before the next Congress? Are they unwilling to trust that body? Sir, I feel entirely confident that the next Congress will do its duty, in regard to this and every other subject which may be brought before it. They come directly from the people of this nation, and will speak the sentiments of the nation; and on that account may be safely intrusted with the exercise of this power.

I have, sir, thus briefly stated the reasons which will compel me to vote against the resolution before the Committee.

Sir, I feel as great anxiety to see this "distracting question" settled as the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) but it must be settled upon Constitutional principles. There is danger that any other mode of settling this question, instead of allaying, will increase the excitement which it has occasioned throughout this nation. Sir, there are two parties to this great controversy, and any settlement which should prostrate the rights of either ought to be reprobated. Great as is my anxiety to see this matter put to rest, to effect it I will neither renounce my principles nor surrender the privileges of any portion of the citizens of this empire. If a settlement of this grave question take place, the good, and, I may add, the peace of this nation demands that it be satisfactory to all its parts. A "compromise," sir, which shall bring Missouri into this Union, may, indeed, put an end to this dispute here; but, let me tell gentlemen, that if, in a settlement of this momentous question, the feelings of a large portion of this community shall be disregarded, the peace of the nation may not be restored.

To insure such a desirable and happy result, it must be settled upon a fair, and just, and Constitutional basis. To such a settlement, and to no other, will I assent.

After a long debate, protracted to a late hour, the question was taken in Committee of the Whole on the amendment to the Senate's resolution, as proposed on Saturday by the select committee of this House, and was decided in the negative—73 to 64.

The Committee rose and reported their decision to the House; and, the question being on concurring in that decision—

Mr. STORRS moved to postpone the whole subject indefinitely.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, rose, and said that he must ask pardon of the House for having risen at so late an hour, and after so much anxiety had been evinced to take the vote; that he had not designed to address the House at this advanced period of the debate, although, having prepared himself upon the merits, he would have been glad to have found an opportunity, without contending for the floor with those better qualified to do it justice, before the subject had been literally exhausted; and that he would not now incidentally have said a word, but that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, near to him, who had just resumed his seat, (Mr. SERGEANT), had, with a dexterity better adapted to the bar of a court than to the Hall of the House of Representatives, ingeniously, though unjustly, endeavored to cast from himself and the majority on the Missouri question, the odium of an argument, derived from its influence upon the balance of power in the United States.

Mr. B. said that his resentment at the offered injury would not admit of his remaining passive while the majority voted down the rights of Missouri, and then attempted to relieve themselves from responsibility, by endeavoring calmly and cunningly to throw the censure of so unworthy an argument used by them upon an injured minority, who he had reason to fear had so deeply suffered by the influence of the argument itself. Mr. B. said that, upon arriving at the seat of Government, and finding this question assuming an importance, and producing effects so little expected by him, he was led to expect that all was not right; that there was something artificial about it; and had, therefore, at an early period, set himself at work to investigate it to the bottom, and to develop, if possible, the real as well as ostensible considerations which had swollen it to such an alarming magnitude; and he begged it should be recollected that motives were not the less operative or dangerous for not being avowed. Mr. B. said that he had carefully reviewed the proceedings of the fifteenth Congress, in which this bitter subject was opened, as well as the speeches delivered by the advocates of the restriction, marking well the feelings and prejudices displayed, the suggestions made, and the principles avowed. He had pursued them with great attention and anxiety, and he believed, without arrogating too much to himself, that he could give the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) who had just resumed his seat, the House, and the nation, a correct history of this argument, or suggestion, amounting to the same thing, of the influence of the Missouri question on the balance of power in the United States. The origin, progress, and effect, of the contest for the balance of power in Europe would be recollected: he would only say that its course had been marked with blood!

In reading two speeches delivered by an eminent and venerable member, (Mr. KING,) then and now of the Senate, from New York, every word of which had been well weighed, he found some remarks truly ominous. Mr. B. said, he wished it understood that he should not pretend to detail every thing which that gentleman had said upon the same subject, to whose speeches he might take the liberty of referring; that it was not necessary to the fair attainment of the purpose which he had with candor assured the House he had in view; but all might rest satisfied that he labored under no mistake in the quotations which he should make; for, having been seriously impressed by them, he had made memoranda, considering them justly alarming, and looking askance from the motives which should influence Congress. The venerable gentleman, than whom none knew better, (having been a member of the Convention which formed the Constitution,) says that, but for this clause, the Union never would have been formed; this gentleman said, in reference to the computation of slaves, in fixing the ratio of representation, "that the effect of this concession had been obvious, in the preponderance which it had given to the slaveholding States over the other States; nevertheless, it was an ancient settlement; and faith and honor stood pledged not to disturb it. But the extension of this disproportionate power to the new States would be unjust and odious." Here is the argument from the preponderance—the disproportionate power—almost in terms from the balance of power—surely so in substance; and which he confirms from experience; and the odium which he was pleased to say should follow the extension of it to the new States, and among them to Missouri, proves how strongly, not to say violently, this venerable gentleman felt on the subject of restriction. Another gentleman, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) from the same State, who had, in the fifteenth Congress, supported the restriction with ability and warmth, was betrayed into a similar view. In speaking of Missouri, he said, "that portion of country has no claim to such an unequal representation, unjust in its results upon the other States."

Here again you perceive the grudging at Constitutional, which is called unequal, representation, in its effects upon the other States, to wit, the non-slaveholding States. This gentleman also displayed his determination and violence, by exclaiming "that his purpose was fixed, and that if dissolution of the Union and civil war come, let it come!" These were some of the allusions made in the Fifteenth Congress, to the effect of the Missouri question upon the balance of power; and they, too, by the majority on this floor, who, or some of whom, deny the influence of the consideration, as well as the use of the argument.

Mr. B. said, Mr. Speaker, I will now proceed to refer to some instances in which the same argument was renewed at the last session. I had become, sir, so fearful, nay almost sure, that this consideration had more to do than it should have, with the Missouri question, that, whenever the argument was recurred to, it made a strong impression upon my mind, in consequence of which, I am now the better enabled to refer to the remarks of some gentlemen upon that point. An honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. PLUMER,) who aimed to asperse Kentucky with having, some thirty years ago, menaced disunion, had said: "Feeling the weight of this slave representation, is it strange that the free States, believing they possess authority under the Constitution, should wish to prevent its existence in States hereafter to be admitted?" This gentleman utters the habitual wailing of the malcontents and restrictionists at Constitutional representation, which they are pleased to designate slave representation, accompanied by his belief in its influence on the balance of power. Another gentleman, then from Massachusetts, now in his seat from Maine—the same who presented his constituents, and, by accident, the people of the United States, with a Christmas-gift, (which, and such like, may prove their curse,) after the most mature consideration, I say mature, because the gentleman first wrote and then read his speech to the House—this gentleman avowed dangerous and inflammatory doctrines, and, among other things, said, in reference to the slaveholding States, "for emoluments and power you give us commercial restrictions," &c. Here the benign gentleman seemed to sigh for power, to avenge supposed wrongs.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) not many days past assigned as a reason, among others, to show the importance of the question, and why it should be left for the decision of a future Congress, mentioned the influence which it might have upon the balance of power; for this he was immediately rebuked, and he seemed to stand corrected. This evening, the gentleman, in an effort to relieve himself from so reproachful a consideration, charged the minority with having first used it, and particularly charged my colleague (Mr. CLAY) with having made some allusion to it at the last session, which my colleague has denied, and which I will venture to say no one else recollects. The idea of calculations of power influencing the House in their deliberations on the Missouri question, (views so inexorable to the demands of justice and reason,) always excited alarm in my mind; and, from a reference to it, at the last session, by a very able and influential member, as was the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) who now disclaims it,

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

I am enabled to settle the point in dispute between him and my colleague, by calling to their minds the facts as they transpired, and of which I have the most vivid recollection.

My colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) in the spirit of conciliation, which has characterized his every word and action from the beginning to the end of this contest, in one of his speeches of the last session appealed to the great and republican State of Pennsylvania, who had been regarded the key-stone of the federal arch, magnanimously to interfere and settle, as she might do, this contest, so big with the fate of the Union; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) whilst replying, observed in substance, if not in words, and as I then thought, and still think, very impressively and significantly, that, true it was, Pennsylvania had been regarded as the key-stone of the federal arch, but if Congress went on to admit new States into the Union, he did not know how long she would continue so; manifestly indicating his jealousy of the growing importance of the West, and the loss of the attitude of Pennsylvania as the key-stone of the federal arch; or, in other words, by a manner and in terms too plain to be misunderstood, the influence of the Missouri question upon the balance of power. Thus, said Mr. B., it is plain to demonstration, as it is true in point of fact, that the majority, meaning to be understood several influential members of the majority, were the first to avow, and to continue exclusively to avow, this consideration; and that, not my colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) but the gentleman himself, at the last session, and at this, has consistently, though I cannot say wisely, presented the same view. And that which induced me to rise, without reflection, under every disadvantage of a House worn down with tedious sessions from day to day, at a late hour, when their impatience had been so fully evinced, was the indignation which I felt at the attempt made by the gentleman who had just resumed his seat, being himself the offender, to throw the blame and odium of the use and influence of this argument upon my colleague and the injured minority.

Mr. BROWN said, that, having redeemed his pledge, and thus long imposed himself upon the attention of the House, although he was capable of developing still further this history of the balance of power, he felt great reluctance at proceeding further—[those around him requested that he should go on.] Mr. B. resuming his argument said, Mr. Speaker, I profess to be well read in the proceedings and mysteries of a certain convention, which was organized in the East, at the gloomiest period of our late struggle with Great Britain; in which three of the New England States were represented by members, chosen by their State Legislatures, and the remaining ones had, the largest of them, two, and the smallest, one, chosen by districts. A convention which, considering its time, and purpose, and organization, and proceedings, entitled it to the emphatic appellation of the gunpowder plot of the United States; and which, like its prototype in Great Britain, upwards of two centuries ago, would, seemingly, without providential interposition, have carried with it a wide-spread destruction. The glorious victory of New Orleans, and the consummation of the Treaty of Ghent, the first won in three days from its adjournment, and the last made public soon after, gave the people of these States time to reflect and inform themselves; the consequence of which was, that, by their judgment, the projectors of that dark scheme were consigned to merited infamy. Mr. B. said, that he wished it constantly borne in mind, that he drew a plain and just line of discrimination betwixt the good people of the New England States and the projectors and members of this convention; the first were for a time deluded, the last understood their own purpose full well, and for a season deluded the people. That the people might for a time be deceived; but, having no adequate motive to err, they would ultimately decide right. Before it proceeded to business the Hartford Convention drew up rules for its government, the first was, "that the meeting should on each day open with prayer;" and permit me to tell you that several distinguished clergymen of New England swarmed around them as bees around their hive; and that this is not the first instance in which the lovely mantle of religion has been used to cover ambition and depravity. The second rule was, "that the most inviolable secrecy should be observed." Thus, God's name was impiously called upon, and invoked, to prosper an infernal work, which was carried on in mysterious darkness. Now, said Mr. B., let us consider the subjects upon which this convention deliberated, taking care to remember that the fell and treasonable speeches which none heard but themselves, and that God, whose attention and aid they first of all implored, never have, and probable never will come to light; all that we can judge from is their journal and report, drawn up with the greatest caution, and arrayed in the most acceptable garb for meeting the public eye; still, through the fissures which they have not been able to close, you plainly discern the fires that burnt within. In their report, they state, that they first proceeded to deliberate on dangers which "menace immediate pressure," meaning thereby the acts which the Government had recently passed, and the course pursued by the administration in relation to raising men and money; the organization, disposition, and pay of the militia, &c.; these I consider of minor importance. They next proceeded to what I conceive the great purpose of the convention, which was to attain, in their own language "future security," and were, therefore "of more remote and general discussion." They further say, in their report, that "events may prove that the causes of our calamities are deep and permanent; and that whenever it shall appear that their causes are radical and permanent, a separation by equitable arrangement will be preferable," &c. What did the convention consider the causes that were radical and permanent? Out of their own mouths they shall be condemned. Let their two first resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and the reasons assigned in support of them, speak. The first resolution is in the following words: "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, and all other persons," &c. Thus, as you will perceive, excluding the enumeration of three-fifths of the slave population, as now authorized by the Constitution of the United States. The reasons assigned in the report are, "that it had proved unjust and unequal in its operation. Its tendency, in future, adverse to that harmony and mutual confidence, which are more conducive to the happiness and prosperity of every confederated State, than a mere preponderance of power (the prolific source of jealousies and controversy) can be to any of them."

The second resolution proposed to amend the Constitution by providing that "no new State should be admitted into the Union by Congress, in virtue of the power granted by the Constitution, without the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses." Prohibiting, as you will observe, a majority, as authorized at present, from exercising the power of admitting new States. The reasons assigned are in the following words: "By the admission of these States the balance of power has been materially affected, and unless the practice be modified, must ultimately be destroyed. The Southern States will first avail themselves of their new confederates to govern the East, and finally the Western States, multiplied in number, and augmented in population, will control the interests of the whole."

Mr. Speaker, said Mr. B., I know the decorum and respect due to myself and to the House, and I will not designedly violate either; I impugn the motives of no member; and if, in the views which I have felt it my duty to take, gentlemen find themselves unpleasantly associated, I shall not consider myself in the least blameable, while my references to the arguments of the one, and to the proceedings and report of the other, are true, and often literally correct. The gentleman from Maine, (Mr. CUSHMAN,) to whom I have had occasion already to refer, in a confidential letter to some of his constituents, says, "that the signs of the times do not augur perpetuity, or uninterrupted succession to the Southern dynasty. The spirit engendered will not fail to produce the same effects on the affairs of the nation—may place power in other hands. Not on the indiscriminate offerings of peace, but on the balance of power, depends the safety of our Republic." And, in a speech delivered by the same gentleman a few days ago, these sentiments are reiterated and justified. Sir, said Mr. B., candor compels me to say, from these comparisons, that there appears to be an identity of objects and views between the friends of restriction and the members of the celebrated convention of which I have spoken. The members of the convention grudged the Constitutional representation of slaves, denouncing it unjust and unequal in its operation; and so do gentlemen in the speeches to which I have referred. The convention complained of the admission of new States into the Union from the West, as calculated materially to affect, and ultimately to destroy, the balance of power; so have gentlemen indicated in their speeches, and particularly the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) has feared that the admission of new States would change the federal arch in such manner as to deprive Pennsylvania of the honor of continuing, longer, to be the key stone, and has considered the Missouri contest important in its effects upon the balance of power. The only radical diversity, visible to my optics, is, that the convention proposed to effect their objects by the amendments to the Constitution of the United States; while Congress, more discerning and bold, are endeavoring to effect them, not by the legitimate operation of amendments, but by stretching the Constitution to these purposes. Mr. B. said that the Hartford Convention was not so much execrated because it made attempts, otherwise than according to the Constitution of the United States, but because the object which they had in view was to weaken and burst the bands of the Union; and the means they used were the best, of all others, calculated to attain the proposed end. Those who originated and composed the convention were as cunning and as wise as serpents; they well knew the vulnerable parts of the Constitution, and where to find combustible materials, and their plot was, and could only have been, marred by such great means as Heaven had interposed. Sir, said he, I will not say the honorable gentlemen have the same object in view, to wit, disunion, but I will say that they employ the same materials; and I refer gentlemen to the convulsed state of Congress, and the agitation of the nation, to attest whether they are not, at least, driven on to the same alarming result.

Mr. B. said, that before forming the Constitution of the United States, the several States held their prejudices, their habits, their interest, and their slaves; that they were sovereign and independent, having the exclusive government of their slaves, and might have continued so; and, he could venture to say, would have continued so rather than have yielded the power to the General Government; that they had become members of the Confederation upon the well understood, and equally well defined, condition of having the subject left to their own exclusive control—the Constitution of the United States taking no further notice of it than to require other States to deliver up persons held to service, viz: slaves, who might escape from their owners into the limits of such other States; and that now to attempt a disregard of the terms and stipulations of the compact of Confederation was unjust and unwise, and would never be submitted to by the slaveholding States.

Mr. B. said, that, painful as it was to him to continue his encroachment upon the House, he would, while on the floor, take a very rapid view of the proceedings of Congress in relation to Missouri, and the obstacles which she has had, and now has, to encounter. During the 15th Congress, Missouri set up her claim to a law authorizing her to form a constitution and State government; something having been done at the first, at the second session of that Congress, after some angry discussions, parts of which have been referred to, the House of Representatives passed the law, but imposed a restriction against slavery, by a very small majority; the Senate would not agree to the restriction; the bill of course fell, and Missouri was still further deprived of the right of State government, which all agreed she was entitled to. At the commencement of the last, being the first session of the sixteenth Congress, the mover of the restriction (the present Speaker, Mr. TAYLOR,) moved and obtained the appointment of a special committee for the avowed purpose of compromising and settling, if possible, this subject; the committee for some time labored to effect the object of their appointment, but their efforts proving unsuccessful, upon their application, they were discharged. The members differed not from principle, all agreeing that, if the divided lines could be settled, a compromise ought to be made. Gentlemen, after having thus proceeded upon a concession of the correctness and policy of the doctrine of compromise, which was also the connecting and redeeming principle in the Convention that formed the Constitution, should not, afterwards, have uttered aught against the mode of adjustment. This laudable effort to settle the controversy by compromise having failed, the House of Representatives took up the bill for the admission of Missouri into the Union, and, after discussing it the greatest part of the session, passed it, with an imposition of the restriction, and reported it to the Senate. The Senate had, at the same time, a bill before them for the admission of Maine into this Union, from the extreme northeastern limits of the United States, as Missouri was from the southwestern. There were fierce jealousies prevailing, and a strong impression that, under the guise of humanity and religion, there was carried on a struggle for power.

The subject-matter of the bills being the same, connected with the jealousies each felt at the advancement of the other towards admission, the Senate determined to unite them, and did unite them, that they might proceed pari passu, and enter the threshold together. And as Maine was left without restriction, that condition, imposed upon Missouri by the House of Representatives, was taken off. And Mr. Speaker, Mr. B. said, permit me here to repeat, what I have always believed, and often said, that for this prudent caution and even-handed justice, the Senate have not received the applause to which it so justly entitled them. The bill for the admission of Maine and Missouri, thus amended, passed the Senate, and was reported to the House of Representatives; there it was disagreed to; the Senate insisted, the House rejected; whereupon a committee of conference was appointed, who, preserving the spirit of the mover of the restriction himself, compromised the whole matter—the friends of Missouri to the West agreeing that Maine should be admitted from the East, and agreed further to submit the whole territory west of Missouri to a restriction against the admission of slaves; in consideration whereof, the friends of Maine in the East agreed to admit Missouri from the West without restriction. Maine was immediately admitted, and it should be recollected that such was the momentous crisis with her, that, according to the act of Massachusetts, giving her assent for Maine to become an independent State, a limitation was fixed, which would have expired in a few days, and it thereafter became doubtful whether Massachusetts would ever again have yielded her consent. The restriction was also imposed in pursuance of the compromise upon the territory, and the law passed authorizing Missouri to form a constitution and State government, stipulating that she should be admitted into the Union upon the footing of the original States. Sir, said Mr. B., I believed then, as I believe now, that the attempt to interfere with the internal and State government of Missouri, by dictating to her on the subject of slaves, was a sheer act of usurpation in the Congress of the United States, and was indirectly struggling to avert what was thought would be the effect upon the balance of power, by the Constitutional admission of Missouri into the Union as a slaveholding State. Nevertheless, perceiving that such violent elements were in operation, and that great heat and sectional animosity would grow out of a perpetuation of the unhappy contest, I sir, agreed to the compromise, and accordingly voted for it in all its parts; while, at the same time, I must do myself the justice to say, I felt humbled at a necessity, the result of what I deemed force, to yield up the interest of my constituents, and the slaveholding States in general, in this immense territory, secure from encroachment, a right which I believed guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States, by the treaty with France, whereby this territory was acquired, by the eternal principles of justice and sound policy.

But I was glad to be done, as I supposed I was, with this unhappy subject forever. Sir, Mr. B. said, Missouri, under the faith of the law of Congress for that purpose, called a convention, formed her constitution, laid down her territorial government, organized a State government, and put it into operation, and sent forward her Representative and Senators, with her constitution, at the commencement of the present session, who presented it to Congress. And, sir, the same gentlemen, with a little variation, who contended for the restriction last session, gave an objection to her constitution, and to her admission, on account of the single clause which requires her Legislature to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from removing to, and settling in, that State; which clause they contend to be repugnant to that clause of the Constitution of the United States which secures to the citizens of each State "all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Sir, we have denied that free negroes and mulattoes are citizens of the United States, in the sense designed by the Constitution; but that, even if repugnant, the clause therefore became null and void, and ought not to operate to the rejection of the constitution, otherwise acceptable. But this principle of the paramount efficacy of the Constitution of the United States to all other constitutions and laws, (one better settled, if possible, than any other,) is overlooked, and its efficacy, though not denied, not admitted. Gentlemen have retreated to an inaccessible fortress—their belief that it violates the Constitution of the United States, and their determination not to violate their consciences.

We have evidenced our sincere desire to terminate this protracted and unhappy struggle, by proposing and arguing amendments to the ordinary resolution for immediate admission, explanatory of this objectionable clause, and providing that it shall not operate so as to violate the Constitution of the United States. Gentlemen then say, that Missouri might still be incorrigible enough to disobey the proviso of the resolution. To obviate this scruple, we have proposed that she shall, by solemn covenant, agree that no construction shall be given, or law passed, violating the Constitution of the United States. The ingenuity of the human mind in finding arguments to justify the pursuit of inclination, surpasses conception. We are now answered by doubts as to the power to make the compact as proposed, which would remove the alleged difficulty; and apprehensions are still expressed that Missouri might not, in good faith, conform to it.

Mr. Speaker, said Mr. B., is it not visible that there is no satisfying the consciences, or evading the ingenuity of gentlemen, and that, like the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) they are, at all events, determined to transmit this tranquillizing subject to the next Congress; and for no other reason, that I can comprehend, so strong as that given by the honorable gentleman from Maine, (Mr. CUSHMAN,) who has deliberately and willfully, not in an open speech, delivered on this floor, but in a private letter to a friend, which has been accidentally brought to light, given it as his opinion, "that the safety of the Republic depended upon the balance of power, and not on indiscriminate offerings of peace." And "that a premature compromise might forever blast the hopes of a patriotic ambition."

Mr. B. said, a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) had correctly compared their situation in this contest to that of litigants in an inferior court, from which there could be an appeal; the appeal here was directly to the people. Sir, said Mr. B., this is a tribunal on which I have the greatest reliance; upon the virtue and intelligence, and therefore upon the safety, of the people, I have the most unshaken confidence, and whenever the people of the United States can be brought to think upon, investigate, and decide, this unexampled contest, they will cause their will to be done.

I admonish gentlemen to recollect, that arguments felt, but not expressed, will be inoperative; that none but substantial ones will be there received; and I will hazard my judgment upon it, that arguments not sufficiently sound and pure to be resorted to upon this floor, dare not be urged before the people.

Sir, said he, Missouri ought not, and will not, under the existing circumstances, lay down her State government, and resume the territorial garb; and, without professing unusual discernment, he could foresee a period at which, if not sooner, the people of the United States would make a solemn pause, and carefully explore the untrodden path which they would be invited to tread. Sir, said he, that period will be when the Congress shall, to enforce their policy, call upon them for men and money, to be used in waging a war of father against son, and of brother against brother. Then, said Mr. B., I will venture to say, that the gentleman's qualms, and scepticism, and technicality, will be disregarded, along with any considerations which may have been felt, though not avowed, and the people will decide with justice and wisdom, and will select servants to enforce their decisions who dare not disregard their interest or disobey their voice.

Sir, the coincidence which I have shown between the objects and reasoning of a construction so justly execrated, and the suspicions, not to say more, which may so naturally be excited against the alternate views of the majority, should cause them at least to ponder and weigh well their own arguments, that they may become satisfied themselves, as well as prepared to satisfy others, that their grounds and reasons for refusing Missouri admission into the Union are solid.

Sir, said Mr. B., it has been hinted, that Missouri had probably inserted this clause in her constitution to try the temper of Congress. Can this be believed for a moment? She had no motive to do so, but had every one, except the suggestion of folly itself, to avoid a conflict, and to conciliate her favor. Is a further evidence wanting? I beg leave to refer gentlemen to the mild, patient, and pacific conduct of her delegates, and of the people of Missouri themselves, under their most unparalleled ordeal. Still further: Read her constitution throughout, and you will lay it down, entirely satisfied, that no other constitution in the United States so well secures, not only the lives and limbs, but the health and comfort, of slaves. Had Missouri desired to taunt Congress, she had ample opportunity to have done so without the slightest imputation of infringing upon the Constitution of the United States, by withholding many of their humane provisions, and inserting others of greater severity. So far, indeed, from there being any thing calculated to raise a suspicion that the convention of Missouri felt resentment at Congress for the embarrassment which she had thrown in her way, that they seem cautiously to have sought a gratification of her prejudices and principles.

But, sir, said Mr. B., I will recur to one other objection which has been urged against the adoption of the qualified resolutions for the admission of Missouri into the Union, and I shall have done. I have felt more than surprised—I have felt astonished, that any distrust should have been expressed of the good faith of Missouri in complying with any requisition of Congress, or in fulfilling any compact into which she might enter, upon her admission into the Union. Mr. B. inquired, who were the people of Missouri? Sir, said he, they are principally citizens from the surrounding slaveholding States; they are flesh of our flesh, and had carried with them the same high ideas of honor which those societies possessed from which they had emigrated, and were equally discerning of their rights, and would be equally firm and zealous in their support. But have gentlemen reflected that Missouri offered as her sureties all the slaveholding States? That their faith stood pledged for a faithful compliance? And, when the tranquillity of the Union seemed, in some degree, affected by the arrangement, could not the faith of these States, and their attachment to the Union, and to the non-slaveholding States, be confided in? Have not those States who propose the arrangement for Missouri, evinced the highest sensibility at any encroachment upon the tranquillity, the rights, or the integrity of the Union, and particularly those of their Eastern brethren whom they have fostered and protected in peace, and have supported and vindicated by a war? Least of all, have our Western non-slaveholding States, members from which (Mr. Ross and Mr. CAMPBELL) have some distrust of faithful compliance, any ground to question the estimation in which we hold their good will, their rights, and their safety? Sir, said he, when their houses, their wives, and their little ones, were menaced, during the late war, by the fierce savages and their cruel allies, (impelled by no sinister motives or legal obligations,) have the gentlemen so soon forgotten, that we hastened to their extensive frontier, stood to their right and left; encircled them around, and drained our dearest veins to secure them from fire and massacre? And that the bleaching bones of our favorite sons, now lying thickly strewn upon their borders, attest the sincerity of our attachment, and the reliance to be placed upon our firmness, our honor, and our faith?

When Mr. BROWN had concluded—

The motion of Mr. STORRS to postpone indefinitely was decided about sunset, by yeas and nays—for the motion 42, against it 127, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Baker, Buffum, Case, Clagett, Dennison, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Eustis, Fay, Folger, Forrest, Gorham, Hemphill, Herrick, Kendall, Kinsley, Maclay, Marchand, Monell, S. Moore, Murray, Nelson of Massachusetts, Patterson, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sergeant, Silsbee, Storrs, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Tracy, Van Rensselaer, and Wallace.

So it was rejected.

Mr. MALLARY then renewed the motion which he had unsuccessfully made in Committee of the Whole, as before stated; and the question thereon was decided by yeas and nays, thus: For the amendment 61, against it 107, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the House refused to concur, and the amendment reported by the select committee was agreed to.

The resolution, as thus amended, is in the following words:

Resolved, &c., That the State of Missouri shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition, that the said State shall never pass any law preventing any description of persons from coming to and settling in the said State, who are now, or hereafter may become, citizens of any of the States of this Union: And provided, also, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday of November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact: whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to take from the said State of Missouri, when admitted into this Union, the exercise of any right or power which can now be constitutionally exercised by any of the original States.

The question being then stated on ordering the resolution to be read a third time—

The names of the members were called over.

The Clerk, having come to the end of the list, was about to pronounce the result; when

Mr. KENT, whose delicate state of health scarcely enables him to attend the House, and who was not in the House when his name was called, requested leave to record his name.

Mr. JACKSON, under the same circumstances, except that he was within the walls of the House when his name was called, though not within the bar, made the same request.

The SPEAKER offered to receive their votes, if there was a unanimous consent to his receiving them; the rule of the House peremptorily requiring that no member should vote on any question unless he was within the bar of the House when his name was called.

Objection was made to their voting.

It was evident, from the sensation which filled the House, that the vote was a close one, though its result had not been announced.

Mr. CLAY, finding that the objection to these gentlemen would not be withdrawn, moved to suspend the rule of the House which forbids a change of the rule without one day's notice, in order to suspend or repeal the rule which forbids these gentlemen from voting. After awhile, however, he withdrew his motion, relying on the unanimity of some member of the majority to move for a reconsideration of the question.

The result of the vote was then proclaimed, as follows: For the third reading 80, against it 83.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

So the whole resolution, amendment and all, was rejected.

Mr. LIVERMORE, who had objected to the above contested votes, then gave notice that he should, at 12 o'clock to-morrow, move for a reconsideration of this question, that every member might have an opportunity of voting on it. And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 13.

The Journal of yesterday having been read—

Mr. LIVERMORE, with the view of affording to members who were absent yesterday an opportunity of voting on the resolution from the Senate, rose to carry that purpose into effect; and, to obtain his object, moved to amend the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, by striking therefrom the order "that the Clerk should acquaint the Senate with the decision of this House on yesterday;" that, by withholding that Message, he might be enabled to move the reconsideration of the decision, when the time should arrive at which such a motion would be in order.

Mr. CLAY seconded the motion, and took the occasion to make a few remarks explanatory of an incident which occurred at the last session, on a question of reconsidering the final vote of the House on the Missouri bill, and to vindicate the then Speaker of the House from a presumed interference on that occasion, and to show that the Clerk did no more than his duty required him to do, in carrying the bill to the Senate without waiting the motion for reconsideration.

The motion to amend the Journal, as proposed, was agreed to without a division.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the petition of James Crawford and others, reported a bill for the relief of certain persons who have paid duties on certain goods imported into Castine; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of public lands to certain settlers in that part of the Territory of Arkansas ceded to the Cherokee Indians; which was twice read and committed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of public lands prior to the 1st July, 1820," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire whether any officers of the Army of the United States are employed as clerks, or in any other capacity, in any of the departments, or in the office of the Surgeon General or Apothecary General, and whether such officers, if any, have received any other compensation than their pay as officers, what are their names, and what extra compensation they have received, made a report concluding with the following resolution:

Resolved, That no officer or other person, employed by the Government of the United States, ought, under any circumstances or pretext whatever, to be allowed and paid any other or greater compensation than is authorized by law; and that the practice which has heretofore prevailed to make extra compensation in certain cases, without such authority, is incorrect, and ought to be abandoned.

The report was read and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. GARNETT, the Committee on the Public Buildings were instructed to inquire into the practicability of more effectually ventilating the Hall of the House of Representatives, and to report such plan as may appear to them best calculated to effect the object, as speedily as possible.

MISSOURI.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which the resolution from the Senate, as amended, for the admission of Missouri, was rejected.

Mr. TRACY, that the attendance of the members might be as general as possible, moved a call of the House, (Mr. LIVERMORE having waived his motion for the present, to give an opportunity for this motion.)

The motion for a call of the House was negatived—yeas 51 nays 73.

The question was then stated on the reconsideration of the vote of yesterday.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, gave the reasons why he should vote for the reconsideration, from motives of comity to other members, and yet should again vote, as he did yesterday, against the resolution, should it be reconsidered.

Mr. GARNETT said, feeling, as he did, disposed to vote against the motion for reconsideration, and as his vote would be apparently inconsistent with that he had yesterday given for the engrossment of the resolution, it was a duty he owed to himself to state the reasons which influenced him. When he first came to the House yesterday, he had read the amendment, and his impressions were against it. He had therefore voted against its adoption. His attention, however, having been subsequently attracted to the proviso, he had, without sufficiently examining the previous part of the resolution, believed that its effect was to do away and render nugatory all its provisions; and, under this idea, and in the spirit of conciliation, he had voted for engrossing the resolution as it had been amended. Subsequent and serious reflection had, however, induced him to think that he was mistaken as to the effect of the proviso, and that his first impressions were correct. It was perhaps true, that it was calculated to do away any inequality that might be produced by the conditions of the resolution, between the rights of Missouri, and those of the other States, "when admitted;" but it was an attempt to impose on her a condition previously to her admission, which we had no right to require her to perform. How was it possible that we who think that Missouri is, to all intents and purposes, now a State, and that she is only kept out of the Union by violence and injustice, can believe that we can impose on her any condition precedent to her admission; and that a condition, too, which requires her to relinquish a right which she can now exercise in common with every other State in this Union. It requires her to say that she will not pass any law preventing any description of persons who now are, or may hereafter become, citizens of any State, from coming to and settling in Missouri. Now, we all believe that she has the power to prevent a certain description of persons from coming in and settling in the State; and I am disposed to go still further, and to say, that she has the right to exclude any description of persons—even the white citizens of another State; for, if a State does not possess this right, this obviously absurd consequence follows—that a State could not banish a citizen upon any pretext whatever, for treason, or for the most infamous crimes; for he would have nothing to do but to become a citizen of another State, when he might return and reside in the State from which he was banished, in spite of its laws. But, however this might be, we all agree that Missouri has a right to exclude some description of persons, even though citizens of another State; and, agreeing in this, we cannot impose any precedent condition to her admission requiring her to abandon this right. It was useless to say that the solemn public act by which the resolution requires her to relinquish this right, is null. If it was so, it would not justify our supporting it. If you analyze the doctrine in its extreme possible result, the least that we concede by the resolution is, that Congress can impose conditions on a State which are null, but cannot impose any which are efficient and operative. But, if we admit this doctrine, it will not be easy always to discriminate between conditions that are null and those that are operative; and if we concede the right of Congress to impose conditions at all, precedent to the admission of a State, whether void or otherwise, we deprive ourselves of the argument against their constitutionality, in any future attempt that may be made to impose such conditions on Missouri or any other State. If, hereafter, restriction itself should be attempted on Missouri or Arkansas, or any other State, we should be bound, if the opposite party could fairly make out their case, on the ground of expediency, to vote for it; for we would voluntarily have relinquished the argument founded on its unconstitutionality. Mr. G. said he could see no difference between requiring a convention of Missouri to expunge from her constitution a certain provision, and requiring her Legislature to pass a law nullifying, as far as it could do, that very provision. That provision renders it obligatory on the Legislature to pass a law preventing a certain description of persons from coming to and settling in the State, and the resolution of Congress requires her Legislature to pass a law in direct violation of this positive injunction, declaring that any description of persons, who may be citizens of another State, may come in; or, in other words, shall not be prevented from coming in and settling. At any rate, this requisition on the part of Congress, which demands that the Legislature of Missouri should pass a law directly in the teeth of their own constitution, before she should be admitted, could not be considered otherwise than degrading to Missouri. These ideas had been thrown out, Mr. G. observed, as exhibiting his own views of the subject. In consequence of his indisposition yesterday, he had been frequently obliged to leave the House, to escape its oppressive atmosphere, and had therefore not been able to give that attention to the arguments of gentlemen who supported the resolution which he desired. His mind was, however, open to conviction; and, if the difficulties he had stated could be overcome, so as to permit him, without a violation of the Constitution, to vote for the resolution, he should rejoice at it; for, if there ever was an occasion when it was desirable to make all concessions, compatible with principle, it was the present.

Mr. RANDOLPH made a few remarks, by way of protestation against the proposed reconsideration. The battle, he said, had been fairly fought, and fairly won—or lost, as gentlemen should please to consider it. He considered the proposed reconsideration to be, under the circumstances, contrary to parliamentary usage, and as tending to prostrate the great Constitutional barriers which surround the powers of this House. Mr. R. concluded by vouching his life for it that this question might be settled without recourse to reconsideration.

Mr. CLAY replied, regretting the unfortunate situation in which he was placed, having to meet objections of an opposite nature, and from quarters of the House whence he had no right to expect them. Though gentlemen might not be in favor of the resolution as amended, they ought yet to vote for reconsideration, that the door might be kept open for a different amendment if a different one should be thought necessary. He threw himself on the frankness and courtesy of the House, to allow the members who were absent on yesterday an opportunity of recording their votes.

Mr. FLOYD intimated his intention to vote for the reconsideration, but stated that more important questions than this had been lost during his observation, by the absence of members from their seats. Conceiving that a remedy ought to be provided for this evil, he stated his intention of moving, at some time during the session, an amendment to the rules of the House so as to require, that, on each call of the yeas and nays, the names of absentees should be entered on the Journals, designating the States which they respectively represent.

After some further conversation, of an incidental nature—

The question of reconsideration was taken, and decided by yeas and nays: For the reconsideration 101, and against it 66, as follows:

So the House determined to reconsider the vote of yesterday rejecting the resolution from the Senate in its amended shape.

The question then again presented itself in this form: Shall the amendment be engrossed, and, with the resolution, read a third time?

Mr. HACKLEY, of New York, assigned, at considerable length, the reasons which had induced him, as a member of the select committee, and on the subsequent vote in the House, to give his suffrage in favor of the amendment reported by the select committee.

Mr. FULLER delivered to the House the grounds on which he was opposed to this resolution, not believing that the condition annexed to the admission of Missouri obviates the objection to that clause of her constitution which is supposed to conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, said, feeling it his painful duty, upon the present occasion, to differ from those with whom it had been his pleasure to act upon almost every proposition concerning Missouri, he trusted he need offer no apology for the part he should take in consuming the valuable time of the House. He would not, he said, detain the House long; he knew it was impatient for the question, and would endeavor to state, as succinctly as possible, the reasons which determined the course he was about to take. Whatever, Mr. E. said, might be his views upon this resolution, to whatever conclusion he may have come, he could but distrust his own judgment when opposed by the opinion of the select committee who reported it to the House. With some of the members of that committee, he said, he was well acquainted; he had the fullest confidence in their abilities, and regretted he could not go along with them. His great anxiety to put to rest this distracting subject was manifest from his course hitherto; and no gentleman could, for a moment, believe he would hesitate to vote for any proposition to admit Missouri which his judgment approved.

He had bestowed the fullest consideration upon this resolution, and could not bring himself to support it. What, sir, is the first member of it? It is declared to be a fundamental condition upon which Missouri is to be admitted into the Union, that she "shall never pass any law preventing any description of persons from coming to, and settling in, the said State, who now are, or hereafter may become, citizens of any of the States of this Union." Did it, he asked, recite in so many words the clause in the Constitution of the United States, which declares "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?" No, sir. It in truth contained our own construction of that clause; it set forth our own opinion, to a certain extent, of the obligation it imposed, and we demand of Missouri submission to that opinion as a sine qua non of her admission. And are gentlemen prepared to maintain this doctrine? Would they tell him that Congress possess the power to cut down and restrict the State sovereignties by legislative construction of the Federal Constitution; and that, too, of a clause intended merely to restrain the legislative discretion of the States themselves? Establish this doctrine, and to what will it lead? What will be the powers of this Government, and where the limit to them? I ask, said Mr. E., do gentlemen mean to say, that whatever may be our construction of the Federal Constitution; whatever rights we may think we ourselves possess, we can demand of a State who asks admission into the Union to stipulate, she will adopt the one and not violate the other? If so, what is to prevent us from saying to Missouri, to Michigan, to Arkansas, or any other Territory who may hereafter apply to become a member of the Union, "we have a right to promote the internal improvement of the country by a system of roads and canals, when, how, and where we please, and we demand of you, as a condition of admission, a stipulation that you will pass no law interfering with the exercise of this right, or, indeed, of any other right which we may imagine we possess?" And why not? We may say then, as now, it is consistent with our interpretation of the Constitution, and we impose no new obligation. Sir, I will never consent to establish such a principle by my vote. The powers of this Government are mighty enough; their march is onwards; and I wish they may not sooner or later entirely absorb the powers of the States. He knew he should be told that his objections to the first proviso were obviated by the last, which asserts that Missouri, when admitted, shall have all the powers of the original States. But he could not so view it; whether our construction of the Federal Constitution, in this particular, be right or wrong, the principle still remained. He objected to the exercise of a right by Congress to decide for the States the extent of their political powers.

This resolution must receive such a construction as will give effect to every member of it, as will reconcile all its parts. And was he to understand gentlemen to say that Missouri, thus restricted, will have all the powers of the original States; or that the original States had the same powers, and no more than she had? Gentlemen are mistaken when they say the import of the terms "privileges and immunities" is remitted to judicial cognizance; we have ourselves, in some degree, given their meaning. The resolution uses the words "any description of persons," and declares them entitled to go to, and settle in, Missouri, if they be citizens of any of the States. It does not say of the United States. What privileges and immunities are secured to the citizens of the United States by the clause in question, the Legislatures of the States must decide, subject to revision by the judiciary; and how far the States are restrained, in this respect, there is much difference of opinion even in this House. Let Missouri, then, enjoy the rights her sister States possess; let her be at liberty, as they are, to expound the Constitution of the United States according to her sense of her own obligations of duty and of conscience.

But, Mr. E. said, if the objections which he had already examined did not exist, he could not accept the resolution with the second proviso; which makes it the duty of the Legislature of Missouri, by a solemn public act, to give its assent to the condition contained in the first, and make it a fundamental part of her political system. He asked gentlemen who had examined the constitution of Missouri, if they were serious in imposing this task upon the Legislature? Would they demand of the Legislature to pass an act which they shall declare upon its face to be fundamental and irrevocable? Sir, they will understand too well their powers; they will be able to find in the Constitution which gave them birth, and under which they will convene to deliberate for the public weal, no authority to bind subsequent Legislatures, and to give to their enactments any higher dignity than that of mere laws; they will not be so ignorant as to think they possess the plenary powers of a convention, and will not presume, in their character of legislators, in open violation of their duties as such, and of their constitution, to which all their measures must conform, to pass a law which they shall declare to be more permanent and unalterable than even the constitution itself. High-minded and honorable men will not sport thus with their reputation and their oaths. Let us forbear then to make this demand. If we mean not to admit her at this session, let us not throw at her new taunts, but leave her to herself for the present. Have the friends of Missouri considered the situation in which they will be placed, if she refuse to comply with the terms now offered? And he had no expectation she would comply, because she could not. She comes here next Winter—asks you to receive her into the family of States—to permit her to submit to your authority, and to participate in your councils. Will her friends then say, she has treated them with contumacy? Will gentlemen, on all sides, say, we have offered you terms, and you would not accede to them—you have spurned them—and thus drive her again from our doors? Deny to her again that which by the law of the last session she is entitled to, and which we are pledged to grant her? We should at least be cautious in interposing new obstacles. But he much feared we should, by our own proceedings, heap objection upon objection, until we bring Missouri to our feet; if, indeed, she can be brought there. I do hope, said Mr. E., we shall leave her to pursue that course which may seem to herself best; that her friends, at least, will not be the means of throwing new difficulties in the way of her admission into the Union.

He regretted much the resolution passed by the Senate had been rejected by the House; he had prevailed upon himself, with great difficulty, to vote for it; it was his ultimatum; nothing but a spirit of conciliation could have carried him so far; but conciliation itself appeared now to be exhausted; he could not tell what more gentlemen on the other side could have reasonably required. It expressed, by the strongest implication, that doubts existed as to the compatibility of the much disputed clause in the Missouri constitution with the Constitution of the United States; and declared, if it were incompatible, the assent of Congress was not given to it. He had hoped this was enough to satisfy gentlemen.

He was fully sensible of the high responsibility of his duty upon the present occasion, but, as great as it was, he should consider himself an unworthy member of this body if he were to shrink from it. However much he respected the opinions of others, he should fearlessly obey the dictates of his own judgment; he could not be alarmed by consequences; he could say, let them come. If it should be his misfortune to incur the frowns of others, he should have the consolation to know he had the approbation of his own conscience. It is often our lot, both in private and public life, to be called upon to discharge duties painful to our feelings; but, he hoped, he should never want resolution to sustain him in such a trial.

Sir, said Mr. E., I will not detain you longer. I am sorry I was obliged to have addressed you at all. I have hastily presented you my views, and trust they will sufficiently account for, and vindicate, my course in separating from my friends upon this trying question.

Mr. RANDOLPH stated some of the grounds on which he was opposed to this resolution. He considered it as proposing a sacrifice of the rights not only of Missouri, but collaterally of all the States of the Union, to mistaken notions of expediency; and entered into an argument to support that position. He declared himself to be opposed to the annexation of any condition to the act of admission of Missouri.

Mr. STORRS followed, in an argument in support of the resolution, and the sufficiency of its provisions to obviate the objection which he had entertained to the naked resolution for admission, when that question was presented at an earlier period of the session. He earnestly deprecated the disposition which appeared to prevail with some gentlemen, to leave Missouri in a state of disconnection from, and independence on, the Government, proposing to do nothing with her now, and promising to do nothing more hereafter, &c.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I do not rise with the hope that any thing that I can say will materially alter the vote that will finally be given on this question; and I would have contented myself with giving a silent vote on it, were it not that my motives may be possibly called into question by designing persons. I rise, therefore, in vindication of the course which I have marked out for myself, and which I shall consider it my duty to pursue.

During the last session of Congress, when the question of restricting slavery in that State was discussed, I supported it, in every instance, by my vote. Congress, however, decided against those who thought and acted with me on the question. How that decision obtained I will not now inquire. It is sufficient for me that the opponents of restriction were not indebted to me for their success, either by my absence or by a change of my vote. But, however that decision was obtained, I considered it binding on Congress. By it Congress solemnly pledged itself to Missouri that, if she would present a constitution, in other respects republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, she should be admitted into this Union. I considered myself bound by this pledge. I have no alternative left. I cannot for a moment consent, as a member of this House, to observe a Punic faith even to Missouri. I know it is objected that Missouri has not fulfilled her part of the compact; that her constitution, in one of its provisions, is repugnant to that of the United States. I agree that it is. But we have no evidence that this repugnant clause was inserted with intent to violate any of the provisions of the Federal Constitution; and we certainly are warranted in judging charitably of her intentions, when we reflect that several of the States have enacted laws of the same tendency, and equally repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. It is a common judicial maxim, equally applicable to States and individuals, that every one is presumed innocent until proven guilty. Adopting this maxim, we cannot yet pronounce sentence against Missouri. If gentlemen will prove to me, by reasonable argument, that we are not bound by the law of last session, and that we still have the right, consistent with good faith, to revive the question of the restriction of slavery in Missouri, and that there is any, even the most distant hope of bringing it to a successful termination, I will go with them; for I wish it distinctly understood, that I am not excited to my present course by any sympathy for Missouri; I feel none: nor am I prompted by fear. The menaces of gentlemen have no influence on my mind.

But, sir, while I disclaim any sympathy for Missouri, I confess to you I feel a strong sympathy for my country; for the people whose interests are suffering, and some of them sacrificed by the continued agitation of this unhappy question. Yes, sir, your agricultural, your manufacturing, and your commercial interests, are all in a suffering state, and all anxiously looking to you for protection and support. I ask every member of this House whether, in each of their districts, they have not observed a general prevalence of unparalleled suffering and distress? And yet those great, those vitally important interests, confided to your care by your Constitution, you have abandoned and neglected. Your agriculturists no longer find a market for their surplus produce, but trusted that Congress would at least attempt to create one. Your manufacturers, who were induced by you to vest their capitals in manufacturing establishments, are overwhelmed by foreign competition, and many of them ruined by confiding in you, and very many more verging on bankruptcy. Your commerce also languishing, and many who were engaged in its pursuits ruined, and many more on ruin's brink. Yet you have not as yet devised, or even attempted to devise, any plan for their relief. Your enterprising citizens who have penetrated your Western domain, and who have given you all their money in part payment for a home, and calculating upon past events, thought they could pay you the balance which is your due, by the produce of the lands which they have purchased from you, have been disappointed, and at least partly through your neglect. Shortly after the close of the late war, you passed an act promising compensation to those whose property was lost or destroyed in your service or by your means. It is a well known fact, that many of this class have spent the wreck of their fortunes in dancing attendance upon you, without being able to obtain a decision upon their applications. To these people a delay of justice is injustice.

Sir, your table is, at this time, groaning under a load of petitions from a distressed community, who have, with unparalleled patience and perseverance, supplicated for you that justice which, in many instances, you had no right (although you had the power) to delay or withhold.

And why is it thus? Why is it, I ask you, that this Congress have now been in session nearly nine months, and the universal distress of the country staring them in the face, and not one decisive act passed for their relief? Why is it that, although you have had abundant evidence, both at the last session and this, that your revenue was materially diminished, and your Treasury empty, that you have not taken one step toward augmenting your revenue or replenishing your Treasury, but by loans? Sir, we can make but one answer: we had to spend the best half of last session discussing the propriety and impropriety of imposing a restriction of slavery on Missouri, and we have spent the best half of this session discussing the merits and demerits of her constitution. Both discussions have been alike pleasant and profitable; but there appears to be this difference: Congress brought the question of restriction to a termination, such as it was; but this question they seem determined shall live and die with them. Die with them did I say? No; it is so pleasant and so profitable a subject, we are determined it shall survive us; we seem inclined to bequeath it as a valuable legacy to the next Congress; and if they husband it as well as we have done, it may, for ought we know, last for many years; and I think we have convincing proof that, while it does live, it will live to the exclusion of all other important business; for, besides the time it engrosses, it excites the passions and prejudices, and sours the minds of gentlemen so, that they are totally disqualified for acting in concert for the public good.

Sir, these are the reasons which have induced me to support, with my vote, the resolution from the Senate, as amended by the Committee. I wish this controversy ended; it is incumbent on this Congress to terminate it. The people of the United States, as well as of Missouri, expect it, and I think we are bound in duty not to disappoint their just expectations.

Sir, upon the supposition that this proposition is rejected, I would solemnly ask gentlemen what will suit them? Will you admit Missouri unconditionally? No. Will you admit her with the condition annexed by the Senate? No. Will you admit her by that resolution, as amended by your Committee? No. Sir, I will not detain this House by enumerating all the various propositions which have been made for her admission, and all of which have shared the same fate. Well, will you revive the subject of the restriction of slavery, and make that a sine qua non of her admission? No. You have declared, by a large majority, that you will not. Then, seeing you cannot agree to admit her upon any terms which have been proposed, will you postpone the consideration of the subject indefinitely, and let us attend to some other of our duties? No.

Sir, the course pursued by this House, on this subject, is (to say the least of it) most extraordinary. You will neither dismiss it nor decide on it, but you cling to this firebrand of discord with the utmost pertinacity, without intimating what your ultimate object is. Is it with a hope that others will do for you what you wish done, but dare not do? Is it with a hope that you will tire out some of the Northern members, so that they will unite with the South, upon some plan of admission which will pass, and to which, at the same time, you will have the pleasure to give your negative; and, by this means, evade the odium which you think will attach to an act which you wish accomplished? Sir, this course of policy may serve for a time, but it will not always last. I will never advise a man to be engaged in an act in which I could not consider myself justified in co-operating. I cannot consent, as a member of this House, to act the part of a waterman, looking one way and rowing another.

Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the sentiments of my constituents, and how feelingly alive they are to any act that would either practically or theoretically compromise any of the rights even of the meanest of their citizens. There is no man in this House who entertains a higher veneration and respect for the opinions and wishes of his constituents than I do. But, in acting on this question, I have a high and important duty to perform to my country and to my own conscience; and if

I should be so unhappy as to incur their disapprobation by the vote I am about to give, I shall at least enjoy the consolation of carrying with me into that retirement to which their displeasure would consign me, a full and perfect conviction of having acted according to the dictates of my own conscience, with the sole intention of promoting the peace, prosperity, and happiness of our common country.

Mr. SIMKINS spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, in rising, principally to ask for the ayes and noes on this now apparently desperate resolution, my bosom swells with emotions to which my tongue can give no utterance. I feel myself authorized to warn gentlemen, in the most solemn manner, that the nation is heart-sick of this question; and I do believe, if it were left to the people, Missouri would be declared to be admitted almost by acclamation. The inhabitants even of the North and East abhor the existence of a subject which has been so pressed upon Congress as not only to occasion great expense and loss of time, but to agitate the nation from Maine to Georgia; and although it may not be strictly parliamentary to speak of information coming in any other than an official shape, yet I venture to assert, upon that on which I place the most implicit reliance, that, in many sections of the New England States, there is a vast majority in favor of unconditional admission! Shall I, then, on a matter of such moment, of such national importance, that almost every day it exists adds to the bad feelings, jealousies, and spirit of disunion, so destructive to our peace, stop to argue the lawyer-like and attenuated argument of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON,) as to the power of the Legislature of Missouri to give its assent to the proposition submitted by the Committee; a proposition most ably and zealously vindicated by the gentlemen from Kentucky and from New York, (Messrs. CLAY, FORD, and HACKLEY.) Sir, this is no time to consider technical arguments and sceptical objections; it is the time to insure the harmony of the country by a settlement of this ominous and ill-boding question.

Sir, in my opinion, Missouri is already a State of this Union, and was so the moment she formed a constitution, appointed her judges, and elected her members to the Senate and to this House. She had then performed those acts upon which she was to be prospectively admitted; and she then became a State of this Union; and the only difficulty is, that you refuse now to declare her admitted. You deny to her an unquestionable, and a vested right. But, sir, I will not attempt to go over ground so ably occupied by my friend and colleague, (Mr. LOWNDES,) I content myself by moving for the ayes and noes, that the nation may see who still oppose the admission of this State. Gentlemen may consider that they now stand on popular and strong grounds. The next election will, I believe, show that they are playing a hazardous game; that they stand on "slippery places."

Mr. ROSS, of Ohio, spoke at some length, and with much earnestness of manner, in opposition to the resolution, on the ground that its provisions were inefficient in themselves; or, being otherwise, were of a most pernicious tendency. He considered it an expedient to avoid a responsibility which gentlemen were afraid to meet. He reprobated the change of sentiment which some gentlemen had evinced, and intimated that, if honest in their first opinion, they had acted dishonestly, or under the influence of improper motives in voting differently now, &c.

Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland was about to speak in reply to Mr. Ross, and in vindication of his course on this question—

When an explanation took place between Mr. CLAY and Mr. Ross, which induced Mr. L. to waive his remarks.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, next spoke earnestly in support of this resolution, and in reply to those who had spoken against it. He invoked those, whom the resolution, as it now stood, did not please, to say explicitly what would please them, it having been decided by a large majority that the restriction of last session was out of the question.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, spoke briefly upon one point of the resolution which had been particularly objected to.

Mr. PINCKNEY, of South Carolina, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, there are many reasons which make it incumbent on me not to suffer this question, which I consider the final one on the acceptance or rejection of the constitution of Missouri, and her admission into the Union, to pass without presenting my views on the subject to the House. These reasons are, the importance of the question itself, the great interest the State I represent, in part, has in it, and, not among the least, the frequent calls made upon me in this House, and references in the other, as to the true meaning of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, which it appears, from the Journal of the General Convention that formed the Constitution, I first proposed in that body.

We are now arrived at the most awful period which has hitherto occurred on this delicate and distressing subject. On the decision of the question before you is to depend whether we are to rise in harmony with each other, having made the necessary provision for the admission of Missouri on an equal footing with the other States, or to reject her constitution, and leave her, erected as she completely is, by our own authority, into a State, unowned and unadmitted into our Union, of which, under the fostering care of Government, she soon bids fair to become a most valuable member.

Mr. Jefferson says, in a letter to a friend, which has been published, at least this sentence of it: "The Missouri question is the most portentous one that ever threatened our Union. In the gloomiest moments of the Revolutionary war, I never had any apprehension equal to that I feel from this source." I agree perfectly with him, and join those gentlemen in opinion who consider this, beyond all comparison, the second question in point of importance, which has been agitated among us since our revolt from the parent State. The first was the memorable declaration which confirmed the Union, and gave birth to the independence of our country. This is the only one which may, in its consequences, lead to the dissolution of that very Union, and prove the death-blow of all the political happiness and national importance once so rationally to be expected from it. I feel myself authorized to express this fear by the fact, that the gentlemen in opposition have now thrown off the veil, and expressly declare their intention is to leave, if possible, this question to the next Congress; to leave to them, unfettered by any act of ours, the power to decide how far the true interest of the Union may then make it necessary to produce anew, and struggle for the imposition of the restriction on slavery in Missouri, which has, during the three last sessions, shaken the Union to its very foundations. They openly avow that they do not consider themselves bound by the compact of the last year, confining that restriction to the territory north of 36 degrees, 30 minutes, but aver, if they have strength enough to do so, their intention to leave the next Congress free to decide it as they please.

In considering the subject, I shall endeavor to prove to you that Missouri, in complying with the act of Congress of the last session, has submitted to you the very best republican constitution I have ever seen; one not only superior to that of the other States, but even to the boasted one of the United States; and that if she has, without the least intention to violate it, inserted the article respecting the prohibition of free negroes and mulattoes, she may fairly be considered as not only having done it under the sanction of Congress, but I may almost be justified in saying under their recommendation.

In examining the constitution of Missouri it will be found, that while it has carefully avoided all those defects which time and experience have discovered in the constitution of the other States, it has wisely ingrafted all their excellencies, and made addition of others heretofore omitted or not thought of. The first branch of her Legislature is, contrary to all the others, except South Carolina and Tennessee, elected for two years, thereby avoiding the almost continual irritation and intrigue incident to annual elections, while sufficiently short to continue the Representative as connected with his constituents, as he ought to be. The Senate are elected for a longer term, and with a proper rotation, so as to unite firmness, stability, and system, with a due degree of dependence and responsibility. Their Executive is elected for four years, possesses the same revisionary power as the President of the United States does, and has exactly that permanence, nomination to office, and patronage, which an Executive ought to have, to give weight and respectability to his office, and no more.

Her judiciary are wisely appointed, and are completely independent in the tenure of their office and salaries, all the provisions it has made for the government of their militia, and the distribution of knowledge among the rising generation of their country, do honor to the talents that formed the constitution, while those which provide for the humane treatment of slaves by their masters, and their trial by jury, and punishment in the same manner as the whites, and make the murder, or dismemberment of a slave, punishable as if committed on a free white person, are honorable and liberal improvements on the policy which has hitherto governed other States in these respects; the declaration of rights annexed to their constitution recognises and establishes all the great and indispensable principles of free government; in short, in every thing except with respect to those provisions which are held to interfere with its claim to admission into the Union, Missouri must appear to every impartial man to have done herself credit by her constitution, of which the essential ingredient of general suffrage, or in other words, equal political rights, is the basis.

I have said no other State constitution is comparable to it, and to prove this, for brevity sake, let us shortly examine the constitution of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, and we shall, as republican systems, find them far inferior indeed to Missouri; and as the question is on the acceptance of her constitution, and admission into the Union, this examination becomes peculiarly proper.

In Massachusetts we have seen, for years, the odious establishment of a religious test; the anti-republican one of a pecuniary qualification for voters; the shifting, vacillating policy of an annual House of Representatives, and a feeble Executive, checked and bound down by a council, without whose assent he can do nothing.

In New York the same improper establishment of a pecuniary qualification exists, and the many evils arising from an annual House of Representatives in this State, are most amazingly and grievously increased by the election of their Council of Appointments being annually made by the Legislature; and as in this State parties are nearly equally balanced, the inconvenience, confusion, and injury, arising to the public by this annual struggle, are inconceivable. The Council of Appointment to all the offices of the State, consist of four members, chosen by the Legislature from each great division of the State, who, with the Governor, who has no right to nominate, and is only there as a member of the council, on an equal footing with the rest, appoint all the officers of the government; as this power, therefore, depends upon who are elected members of the Legislature, there arises an almost never-ceasing struggle for superiority; for the elections are for so short a time, that scarcely one is ended before the plans to carry the next, and all the intrigues incident to them, begin, and the moment the party who were out succeed, that moment they sweep, as with a deluge, every office in the State, except the judges, that has a salary or is worth holding. Who of us belonging to other States can witness the complete and general removal of every officer in their government, of honor and profit, that has within these few weeks taken place, without rejoicing that in our own State we are at least exempt from the effect of so wavering and fickle a system. In every view in which such a council presents itself to our consideration, it is highly wrong and injurious; for where it happens, as lately, the Governor and Council are at variance, and all the appointments are made contrary to his wish, it not only embarrasses and unnerves his administration, but reduces him almost to a cypher; while, on the other hand, when they are of his party, or with him, and appoint as he wishes, in case of improper choices they operate as a cloak to him.

In Pennsylvania we find the same evils arising from the annual choice of their House of Representatives, which I have depicted in the other States, but there is in this so remarkable a departure from those democratic principles which ought to prevail in the constitution of every State of the Union, that it is astonishing how their republicans, boasting as they do of their principles, love of liberty and equality, and so feelingly alive, as they appear to be, to the rights of their black brethren, should have so long remained quiet under or still be content with. It is the enormous power granted to their Executive, of appointing all the officers, including judges of the Commonwealth, without the least restriction, and just as his own unchecked will, or the influence of his partisans may please; a power before unheard of, or unexercised in any part of the Union, and one so degrading to persons calling themselves the citizens of a free republic, that it is astonishing none can be found among them sufficiently alive, not only to the true interests, but to the honor of their State, to wish in this respect to assimilate their Executive to that of the others.

In Maryland, a State, perhaps, as equally torn by the near division of parties as any other, to the error and inconvenience of an annual House of Representatives and feeble Executive, either checked or cloaked by a council, as his opponents or partisans may prevail in it, is superadded the singular provision of an aristocratic Senate, elected for five years, by electors chosen by the people; consequently all of the party that may happen accidentally to prevail among the electors.

In this Senate no rotation is established, and of course, nothing like dependence or responsibility; and if, as has frequently happened, the parties change in the House of Delegates, and their opponents prevail there, a scene of perpetual hostility between the two branches is exhibited, adverse to the harmony which is always so essential to good government; besides, there is annexed so large a pecuniary qualification, as is sufficient to render a considerable majority of their citizens ineligible to it; in this State also are the great evils of a viva voce choice of their Representatives, and a religious test; which last, according to the republican opinions now generally prevailing among us, may be considered as almost amounting to barbarism.

In Virginia the same defect prevails of annual elections of her House of Representatives and Executive, whose powers are small, and are administered under the same check or cloak as from party it may happen of a council, as in Maryland, where, like her too, all elections are to be viva voce, and none are to vote but freeholders, thereby excluding a very great proportion of her citizens who have much better pretensions to the exercise of this right than the holder of a few barren acres of land can have. Surely, the man who is obliged to defend the liberties and government of a country, and who, although without that small landed property which may entitle him to vote, may still be bound by the ties of birth and of a family to his country, ought not to be deprived of this important right. We should remember that, as all the rest of the civilized world are monarchies, in case of necessity we must depend essentially on ourselves; that it is our true policy, therefore, to unite every citizen and inhabitant to defend the country of their birth or adoption, by all the proper encouragements in our power; that none is so powerful as that of giving them the right to vote for the persons who are to make laws for them; that to deny them this is to establish invidious distinctions, and to make them believe your Government pays more respect to property than to privileges, and that you attach more weight to the man who has a few barren acres of land, and is perhaps unable to render you the least personal service, than to him who has been, or may be obliged to risk his health and person for a whole campaign in the field, and who possibly may be a native too.

To the limiting the right to vote to freeholders, and to the giving of votes at elections viva voce, so many solid objections instantly arise, that it is astonishing a State like Virginia, which, from her Revolutionary merits, certainly has a better claim to the title of "cradle of the Revolution," than any other, could so long have retained them. If a constitution intends, in conferring the right to vote, to give the elector the opportunity to vote for those he pleases, surely no other mode than that of ballot can give it him. The fear of giving offence to those he does not wish to displease, and particularly relations, friends, and acquaintances, frequently induces the giving a vote which, by ballot, would have been given to one more worthy. Voting by ballot is certainly the only method to remove all restraint, and leaves the voter perfectly at liberty to follow the dictates of his own conscience and judgment.

To avoid being prolix on this subject, I shall not go into an examination of any other of the State constitutions, most of which, however, with the exception of the religious test, and viva voce vote, have the same defects.

In examining the constitution of Missouri, you find it free from all these defects; and, as the great question now before us is the acceptance of her constitution and admission into the Union, I wish, as far as I am able, to show to the people of this country its excellence and superiority, as a republican one, over those of the important States I have mentioned, and, indeed, of all the others, that they may be enabled to judge whether it can be possible so excellent a system can be rejected for the trifling reason that it inadvertently contains a provision prohibiting the settlement of free negroes and mulattoes among them, or whether it is not infinitely more probable that other reasons of a much more serious nature, and pregnant with the most disastrous events to the future union and peace of these States, are at the bottom of this unexpected and inexcusable opposition. My reason for being of this opinion is, that if this was not the case the course of their proceeding on this subject would have been most probably as follows: There would have been, as there must inevitably have been, a unanimous approbation of every part of the system except this prohibitory clause, and this would have been considered, as it certainly is, nothing more than a strong recommendation from the convention that formed the constitution to the future Legislature, which might or might not comply with it, after giving it a much more full and deliberate examination than it was in the power of the convention to do, as, in their opinion, was most consistent with the Constitution of the United States or the interest of their own State. If the convention had not determined to leave it wholly to the discretion of the Legislature, why did they not, in express terms, declare that no free mulattoes or negroes should ever be allowed to enter into Missouri, and make it a part of the constitution? It was easy to have framed a short article on the subject, and not to have made the intervention of the Legislature necessary; besides, what shows that the Legislature are of this opinion is, that, as far as we know, they have hitherto passed no such law, and, if they should not, where is there a penalty annexed to their not doing so, or where is the power to compel them? But I now proceed to state, in my opinion, the article is not an unconstitutional one; and that, even if it was, it might be considered, in some degree, as sanctioned virtually, or tacitly recommended by Congress.

I say it is not, in my judgment, unconstitutional, for the following reasons, in which I mean briefly to answer to the call that has been made upon me: It appears by the Journal of the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States, that I was the only member of that body that ever submitted the plan of a constitution completely drawn in articles and sections; and this having been done at a very early stage of their proceedings, the article on which now so much stress is laid, and on the meaning of which the whole of this question is made to turn, and which is in these words: "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities in every State," having been made by me, it is supposed I must know, or perfectly recollect, what I meant by it. In answer, I say, that, at the time I drew that constitution, I perfectly knew that there did not then exist such a thing in the Union as a black or colored citizen, nor could I then have conceived it possible such a thing could ever have existed in it; nor, notwithstanding all that is said on the subject, do I now believe one does exist in it; and, in order to prove this, the only true question for consideration is, what is a citizen of the United States? And I now answer, as we consider one in the State to which I belong.

In South Carolina we consider all white persons born in the same, or adopted according to law, to be citizens, and entitled, as such, to all the privileges of a citizen, where not disabled by something personal to themselves. Their privileges vary according to their sex and situation. Females are wholly excluded from a right to vote, or to office, and are confined to their proper sphere; but all males born in the State, or in the United States; after a certain residence in that State, or adopted according to law, are equal, except clergymen, who, on account of their office, are excluded from the Legislature. At the age of eighteen they are all enrolled into the militia, and serve as the defenders of their country. At twenty-one they are, from our general suffrage law, qualified to vote, to serve on juries, and to be eligible to the Legislature, and all offices except two, which require greater age. They have a right to sue, and are liable to be sued; to take a freehold, and hold property. They are all entitled to the trial by jury, and intermarry at any age.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

This, and this alone, is called a citizen there; and nothing less than this can, in my opinion, constitute a citizen of the United States. Now let us compare this white citizen of the South with the black or colored man, such as he is in the Eastern or Northern States; and then let it be seen whether, for the protection of the comparatively few rights of such a being as he is—of a person so situated, so unlike a citizen, and so almost wholly without his privileges—gentlemen can be serious in refusing the admission of Missouri, and risking the consequences.

At the close of the war all the States had slaves; the Northern and Eastern to a considerable amount, and the Southern to a much more numerous one. The former, extremely anxious to get rid of them, passed laws for the gradual abolition of slavery, and, by their ill-treatment, by the contempt they exhibited for them, and the marked line of distinction drawn between them and the whites, I am told, in the Eastern States, they have almost driven the whole of them away—many to the West Indies, and more to the Southern States; so that in the six Eastern States, I am informed, not more, at present, than a few thousand remain.

And here let me ask, how have they effected this? Why, as I have just said, by treating them, on every occasion, with the most marked contempt—by never employing them when whites can be procured, thus reducing them to great penury and distress—by refusing to trust them with the defence of the country, or enrolling them in their militia—by denying them the right to serve on juries, or in their courts to give credit to their oaths in suits where whites are concerned—by preventing their marrying, under heavy penalties, with the whites—and by even refusing to them the right of remaining more than two months in their State, under penalty of whipping; thus showing that, so far from wishing to treat or consider them as citizens, they view the mixture of their blood, and any connexion with them, as a disgrace to the whites. The only solitary privilege which it seems is granted them, is, on pressing occasions, where votes are wanted, these degraded beings are frequently, in a most improper state, dragged to the polls, with tickets in their hands which they cannot read, and compelled, by men under whose influence they are obliged to act, to disgrace, in the most shameful manner, the highest privilege our Republic boasts, and which, I will venture to say, is in no other country equally degraded, as by a view of their condition, and the manner the blacks are treated in Europe will presently be shown. And, perhaps, this is the proper place to remark, that it was impossible for Missouri to have held any other opinions on this subject than those she did, when, in addition to all this, she well knew Congress had never, by their laws, naturalized any but whites, or admitted any other to be enrolled into the militia, or had, by any act, in the most remote degree, acknowledged or considered a black or colored man as a citizen.

I find it difficult to say what opinion ought to be attached to the perseverance which the majority of this House have exhibited for three successive sessions, on this occasion, in struggling to establish the points for which they have contended, and in which they have shown so little attention, or have had so little respect for the feelings of their brethren of the Southern and Western States. It must have arisen either from a wish to dissolve the Union, and separate themselves from the slaveholding States, or from a total want of knowledge of the distinction which has, from time immemorial, existed in the civilized world, between the black and white race, and the strong and immovable line which has separated, and will forever continue to separate, them in the Southern and Western States of this Union.

There can be no question what the opinion of Europe is as to the black race; for there the line of distinction is as strongly drawn as it is between the whites and them in the Southern and Western States. Nor is this peculiar to the moderns; the same opinion was entertained by the ancients of the then civilized world as exists at present.

In speaking of the situation of the interior of Africa, where the black race were first found, it is natural to turn our attention to what it has been from the earliest ages we are acquainted with. In doing so we find that, of all the quarters of the globe, this is the only one which remains completely unaltered from the creation until the present moment. The African man is still as savage as ever—he is as unchanged as the lion or tiger which roams in the same forests with himself.

It may be asked, Why this unchanged situation while always in the neighborhood, and within the reach of all the most civilized part of the then known world? Why should every part yield to the extension of learning and the arts, while the Africans still continued the barbarous and cannibal race they were from the beginning? The reason is plain from the only data given us to judge from. They certainly must have been created with less intellectual powers than the whites, and were most probably intended to serve them, and be the instruments of their cultivation. A strong reason in favor of this opinion of their inferiority to the whites is, there never having been one of the race, notwithstanding all the pains taken with them, that has attained any thing like what may be termed mediocrity in learning; and, for this and other reasons, some of the most able philosophers in both continents, among whom may be named Mr. Hume and Mr. Jefferson, have invariably expressed the same sentiments.

Such, too, has unquestionably been the opinion of all the most enlightened nations of Europe; or else, when England, and Spain, and France, and Holland had, by the discovery of America, acquired colonies there, why did they instantly send their ships to Africa, to stock them with slaves, and to no other place? Why not send to Asia, or take the native Indians in their neighborhood, and employ them? The reason was, that they found no other part of the human race so inferior in intellect to the whites as the Africans, or none which it can be so fairly presumed were created for the purpose of serving them.

Let us now view the conduct of England. It is true, in the case of Somerset, her courts determined no human being could be held in slavery in England, but there they stopped. You never have heard of any of the colored race being admitted to the rights of British subjects so far as to vote at their elections, to serve on juries, to be admitted to swear in their courts; to be enrolled in their militia; or to be eligible to Parliament; or to hold any office of honor or profit under their Government.

In their colonies they keep them in abject slavery, perhaps more so than exists in any part of the world, not even excepting the Portuguese or Spanish colonies.

In the dominions of France in Europe they carry the exclusion of the blacks further than in any European nation; for, by an ordinance of France, issued long ago by one of their monarchs, and still in force, they are forbid to enter, and all persons are forbid to bring them, under severe penalties, into France; stating in the ordinance, among the principal reasons which induced it, the determination of the French Government to prevent any intermixture between the white and black blood. It is not a little singular that, in the discussion which took place the last session, on the restriction, the able Senator whose recent death is so justly deplored as a public loss, should have used exactly the same reasons in support of it.

We are, sir, very fond of imitating the Romans in every thing we can, without inquiring how far, from the very different nature of our Government, it was strictly appropriate. We have, in imitation of them, made the most ferocious of all the birds of prey our national standard, and named the edifice in which we are now legislating, the Capitol. Why not follow them in their opinions respecting the African race? Rome was well acquainted with them. She had carried her victorious eagles to Carthage, and afterwards to Alexandria; they were well acquainted with the interior of Africa, whose inhabitants were essentially different from those of Carthage and Egypt in color, and infinitely their inferiors in intellect. They were, as they are now, cannibals and barbarians. So far from any of them, or their descendants, ever having been considered as citizens by the Romans, it does not appear they even condescended to make them their slaves; for, like the Greeks, all the slaves among the Romans were white. It is therefore probable that, like the French in Europe, they disdained to mix the Roman blood with them. How different must have been their opinions and feelings from those of our Northern and Eastern brethren, who now not only consent to receive and cherish them themselves, but wish to throw in upon Missouri and all the Southern and Western States, in the shape of citizens, the very race which Rome refused to receive and use as slaves!

But, sir, it will be impossible for them to succeed. The distinction which has existed from the earliest ages, in Europe and in America, from its discovery and settlement, down to the present moment, can never be removed. Instead of diminishing, the very discussion of this question will increase its strength, as is now daily proved by the laws which have just passed, and others of a similar character now under discussion in the Southern States, and which never would have been passed but for this attempt; one much more dangerous and alarming than that of the last session; it has come most unexpectedly on them.

They, in common with the people of all the States, supposed that the question had been put at rest forever—they viewed the compromise as binding in honor on every part of the Union—they had the good sense to know that, in a Government so extensive as this, and differing in its climate and productions, and consequently in its interests, that every thing must be done by compromise—that the Constitution of the United States itself was the work of compromise, and in nothing so remarkably and of such importance as on the very subject of slavery, in not only consenting the Southern States should have a representation for their slaves, but going the very extraordinary length further in allowing them, if they pleased, to keep the African trade open for twenty years—and that this Constitution of compromise was formed by a body of men, at least as well informed and disinterested, and as much the lovers of freedom and humanity, as may probably ever again be assembled in this country; while therefore the Constitutional compromise is, as it had always been, strictly adhered to, they can see no reason why on the same subject the compromise of the last session should not be—they fear that the mere admission of a few free negroes and mulattoes cannot be the true cause of all these exertions, and of all this perseverance on the part of the majority of this House, but that something of greater importance is intended, by the astonishing anxiety now shown to keep the question open to the next session.

If this was not the case I should have supposed a train of reasoning something like the following ought to have weight with the House. The constitution of Missouri, now under examination, is formed truly republican, and indeed excellent in all its provisions, except the one objected to—in defence of this it is asserted that it is no violation of the Constitution of the United States, because no free negro or mulatto in any of the States, in the circumstances in which he is at present, can be considered as a citizen.

That, except in the solitary right to vote in a few Northern States, he is destitute of every other qualification, and that until they, either by an alteration of their constitution or laws, admit him to a full participation of all the political rights of their white citizens, neither the Supreme Court or any other could consider him as such—that Missouri having no idea of the existence of such a thing as a black or colored citizen of the United States, and knowing that all the Southern and Western States had for many years passed laws to the same effect, which laws are well known to Congress, being at this moment in their library and within the walls of the Capitol, and which were never before objected to by them or their courts, they were no doubt warranted in supposing they had the same right. I repeat here what I asserted before, as I think it an argument of great weight, that the silence of Congress on the antecedent laws of the Southern and Western States, on this very subject, might indeed be fairly considered as a sanction to the proceeding, or, might we not go further and say, this silence of Congress ought to be considered as full proof that they knew the imminent danger there was in the Southern and Western States admitting such persons, and, therefore, on every occasion where they were passed cheerfully acquiesced in them, and to go a little further, might not this acquiescence, under the operation of the maxim long received among jurists, and agreed to, "Qui non prohibet, quando prohibere potest, jubet, be viewed as at least a kind of tacit or implied recommendation?

As to the idea which has been frequently thrown out in this debate, that Missouri knew it was repugnant to the Constitution, and notwithstanding did it, as it were, to defy Congress, it is the most unfounded one imaginable. On the contrary, it appears by her constitution she has done every thing with respect to slaves she consistently could to recommend it to Congress; she certainly has done every thing she could, with propriety, to better their situation, and to display a very kind and humane disposition towards them; they are carefully guarded from bodily injury; a fair trial is secured to them, and, from the provisions respecting equality of punishment, no unusual severity can ever be exercised towards them.

Nor is it to be supposed if they had had the most remote idea that the article objected to would have been considered as offensive or repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, they would have inserted it; for what purpose could they wish to irritate a Government from which they had every thing to expect, whose protecting arm was necessary to their growth and happiness, and whose refusal to accept their constitution and admit them into the Union must involve them in difficulties of the most inconvenient if not serious nature? No, sir, the idea of its being repugnant to the Constitution could never have been conceived by them, much less could they have supposed it should have been considered as a defiance of your authority. They certainly had no such ideas, and if every other part of their constitution is in complete accordance with your act—if all the rest of it is strictly republican, and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, even supposing, which I do not admit, that this article or recommendation, or call it what you please, might be thought to clash with it, will you suffer a single clause or article to give a character to the whole, and while you confess, which no man can deny, that all the rest is excellent, that this single article shall suspend your admission of her into the Union, and leave you exposed to the difficulties such a state of things must produce?

If the present Congress should refuse to admit Missouri, a very serious question arises as to the situation she is to be in: Whether she is to be considered as a State, although not in the Union, or is to return to the Territorial state? In my judgment there can be no doubt that Missouri is now a State; she has thrown off every thing like a Territorial government; she has formed her constitution; elected her Legislature and Executive; chosen her judges, and appointed all the other officers of her government and members of Congress, and has now a State government completely in operation. Whether admitted or not into the Union, she is irrevocably a State, and it is for those who still refuse her admission to take the consequences upon themselves.

As to the idea of passing an act to direct and authorize the President to cause her to be restored to the Territorial state, you are to remember such an act will require the assent of both the Senate and President, neither could, in all probability, be obtained, and I confidently hope very few, even of the members of this House, could be brought to vote for such a measure; and to rise, leaving things as they are, and without even making provision for the security of the public property, I mean of the United States, in Missouri, could only be less impolitic or culpable than to do so without admitting her.

There are some other points I intended to have remarked on, but they have been fully stated and argued upon by other gentlemen. I shall only add a few observations on the propriety and necessity of a compromising spirit in Congress on all questions connected with the subject of slavery, let them arise from any source. In the compromise of the last session great joy was certainly diffused through the Union by the overwhelming majority with which that compromise was carried; it was viewed as forever putting all differences on the subject at rest; before the compromise it was seen that the same unhappy contests might again arise when Arkansas and Florida should become sufficiently numerous to be admitted; but after the compromise no man entertained any fears on it; they viewed, as forever settled, the only question which might produce a dissolution of the Union, as it was the only one on which ambitious and artful men might play, not only upon the bigotry and fanaticism, but the honest feelings and prejudices of their unsuspecting countrymen, and turn them to their own parricidal views; they, I mean that valuable and honorable part of our community, who, having no ambitious views of their own, wish only to see their country flourish and be happy, and be sufficiently strong to protect her rights against the invasions of foreigners, thought they saw in that compromise the demolition of every hope of those who wished to fan the flame of discord, to create new parties, and to give to them dangerous directions and irritating names, and may Heaven grant they may not be mistaken in their calculations or disappointed in their wishes.

Surely, sir, if ever there was a nation which required, in the conduct of her national concerns, a compromising spirit, it is this: and may I not add, if ever there was a time when it required it more than at any other, this is the time. There are at this period stronger reasons than there were the last year when I adverted to them in discussing the law then depending to allow Missouri to form a State government. I then entreated the House to recollect that we were the only Republic of any force or consequence in the world, that, from the combination of all the despots of the greatest Powers in Europe, to maintain their monarchical systems in their present state, and what they had done respecting France, there was no doubt it would give them great pleasure to remove what they must consider as the most dangerous evil and example to monarchy in the world—to destroy the ark, in which alone, amidst all the deluges of despotism, the seeds and principles of freedom have been, and are still safely preserved. That the distance, and our force united at present, with the immense expense attending such an attempt, were the only obstacles—that if we were to divide on this or on any other question, and from friends become enemies, particularly such as they would suppose might be turned against each other, there could be no doubt they would attack us, if not with the intention of dividing parts of our territory among themselves, at least with the view to oblige us to change our Government into monarchy. However remote such a danger may appear, let us recollect the wonderful changes we have seen in the last twenty years. View the same spirit, and with nearly the same means that overturned France again at work, and determined to put down, if able, every thing like the attempt in Italy, to change their Government. When the war once again begins there, who knows the extent to which it will spread? And should the allied sovereigns be successful, who can tell to what length the enthusiasm, or perhaps to call it by a more proper name, the fanaticism of despotism, may carry them?

Be assured, sir, if ever there was a time when our true interests called upon us to exhibit to the world proofs of the most complete harmony and indissoluble union, this is it. In addition to the one already mentioned there is another cause, and of more immediate pressure, which requires us to strengthen, as far as possible, the bond of union, and suffer no minor consideration to weaken it—it is the depressed state of our commerce, and, of course, our revenue. It is not necessary for me to take up your time in stating the distressed situation of our commerce everywhere, and particularly in the Northern and Eastern States. Our tables are loaded with petitions and memorials from all parts of them, representing the distress they are reduced to, and, although recommending wrong remedies, all going to prove the fact of the general distress, and which it appears at present extremely difficult for Congress to remove or even to alleviate. The distress of the Northern States is very much owing to the fall in the price of flour, so low as to make its export from them impossible. This arises from a larger quantity of land being now cultivated in Europe than before, and the great improvement in their agriculture. Indeed, it is stated that one of the principal causes of the distress which prevails in Europe among the agricultural interests is the excess of production, and the want of a vent for it. To the Northern and Middle States the fall of their principal staple must be a serious evil, as there is little hope of its ever reviving, and, such is the rigor of their climate, it will be difficult for them to find a substitute. They, therefore, must become more dependent now than ever on the Southern and Western States, as well for the employment of their shipping as by the furnishing them with exports; for almost the whole employment their shipping now receives is from them, and almost all their trade is by the import and re-export of the Southern and Western products.

To prove this, let us examine the Secretary of the Treasury's report of exports of native products, made only six weeks ago to this House, and you will find the exports of the States are as follows in domestic produce:

South Carolina, $8,690,000, being the largest in domestic produce; Louisiana, including all the Western States as the whole comes to New Orleans, $7,240,000; Georgia, $6,520,000; Maryland, $4,681,000; Virginia, $4,540,000.

The other Southern States are under one million each. But the aggregate of the whole Southern and Western States exports of domestic produce is upwards of $34,000,000, while those of the whole Northern and Eastern States is not more than $17,000,000, of which, however surprising, you will find Pennsylvania has less than $3,000,000, and Massachusetts less than $4,000,000. New York, it is true, has $8,000,000; but, upon examination, it will be found that New York, like Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, is indebted to the Southern and Western States for more than two-thirds of her exports of native products, which she brings to New York in her vessels and re-exports as her own. This is most unquestionable; for if, as it appears by the Secretary of the Treasury's report, the whole export of wheat and flour for all the United States is but five and a half millions of dollars, of which Virginia and Maryland must, no doubt, have one-half, or nearly so—then to Pennsylvania, Jersey, and New York, there are left no more than three millions of the flour and wheat export to divide between them. The fisheries of the Eastern States amount to about two millions, and the fur trade, such provisions as are the product of animals, and various smaller items, compose the remainder of the seventeen millions, the amount of the whole of the Northern exports. And, if it could be correctly ascertained what proportion of it is in the products of those States, it would be found to be very small. But it is not comparatively the great value of the Southern and Western exports, which is of the highest importance to the Northern States. It is the very bulky nature of the commodities; for no products can be more bulky than cotton, rice, tobacco, sugar, and lumber, and none require for the amount in value a larger quantity of shipping to export them; and, if it was not for these and the employment they give to the Northern and Eastern shipping in the present state of peace and commerce, where all nations that can are striving to be their own carriers, what, in the name of Heaven, would our Northern brethren do with their vessels, or what use could they make of them?

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

In this state of things it is almost superfluous to ask if it is not of much greater consequence to the Northern and Eastern States to preserve an union from which they derive such very important benefits, than to risk it to give to a few free negroes and mulattoes the right to settle in Missouri contrary to the declared unanimous wish of the people of that State? But, it may be here asked, what is the desire, and to what extent do the Northern and Eastern States wish to go in requiring concessions from the Southern and Western? Has it not always been the policy of Congress to favor American commerce and American tonnage at the expense of foreigners? Have they not made such discriminations between imports of foreign produce in foreign vessels and the same species in American bottoms as to give the latter great advantages? Have they not, by heavy tonnage duties, secured to the shipping of the Eastern and Middle States the almost entire coasting trade? Have they not lately passed an act to counteract the colonial policy of the British Government as regards their West India islands? And even at the last session did they not impose a retaliatory duty on French vessels for the exclusive benefit of the shipping interest? In addition to all this, have they not imposed on every species of foreign merchandise, with very few exceptions, such heavy duties as are, in the opinion and by the confession of the ablest, most experienced, and skilful of our manufacturers, fully sufficient to give them all the advantages they have a right to expect? So far, therefore, as the commerce, shipping interest, and manufactures of the United States are concerned, surely every candid and impartial man must confess Congress have given them every support they ought to wish, and that in doing this the Southern States, in the most generous and fraternal manner, have always assisted. Nor have they been at all behind the Northern and Eastern in giving still further encouragement to the increase and employ of their seamen, by, upon all occasions, strenuously supporting, as far as our friends will permit, the augmentation of that great bulwark, and pride of our nation, the Navy.

If, to the necessity arising from our general situation for a compromising spirit, it can be shown that the enemies to the extension of slavery in the new States have, in the act of last session, obtained a great advantage, and that the Southern and Western members have yielded much for the sake of compromise, the opposition to the admission of Missouri must appear still more extraordinary when coming from the Northern and Eastern members. It is asserted, by those who have made the best calculations upon the subject, that, by the boundary, as fixed by the treaty with Spain of 1819, the number of square miles within the slave district, including Missouri and Louisiana, may be estimated at not exceeding 180,000, while the area of the district north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes, excluding Missouri, may be calculated at 1,500,000 square miles; so that not more than two slaves may exist south of the line, while there is room for twenty excluding slavery north of it.

It would, I am sure, be unnecessary for me now to go again into the arguments which I used so much at length the last year, to prove that the origin of the attempt to restrict slavery in the new States was very different from that of the love of liberty, humanity, or religion; these had nothing to do with it. It is the love of power, and the never-ceasing wish to regain the honors and offices of the Government, which they know can never be done but by increasing the number of the non-slaveholding States. This once done, we shall soon see a system established which, if it did not even go the length gradually to mould our republican institutions into forms much less democratic than the present, would at any rate soon make the interest of the South subservient on all occasions to the North, by protecting duties, and that whole train of policy, the mischievous effects of which I so fully explained the last year, and to which the people of the South, while they continue to know their own interest, must ever be opposed; and, indeed, their opposition has been hitherto the only obstacle to their success.

These, sir, are the sentiments which my duty to the Union of these States, to my constituents, and to myself, have made it incumbent on me to express on this momentous question. Our ancestors, with those gone, and a few, very few, of our Revolutionary heroes and statesmen still left, by the noblest effort which ever adorned the page of history, have erected such a monument to rational liberty as the world has never before seen. It has enlightened, and still continues to irradiate, not only the polished nations of Europe, but late movements, even in the most remote countries of it, give us reason to believe there is no part of it on which some share of this light has not been shed; that, however it may be smothered by force for a time, it can never be wholly extinguished; that the improvements in favor of the rights of the people already made in some of the ancient despotisms, and which are acquiring greater stability every day, must in time, and perhaps very soon, extend to others. And shall we, when our example has already done so much for the benefit of mankind—for it is from it that all these ameliorations have sprung—shall we, with parricidal hands; destroy the work for which its illustrious founders have received the thanks and gratitude of every friend of freedom throughout the globe, and draw down deservedly upon ourselves, not only their contempt, but imprecations? In a word, shall we destroy that Union on which not alone depend our own existence, as a free, a powerful, or a happy people, but the only example left to prove to succeeding generations what real patriotism, firmness, and prudence, might realize in the cause of liberty and self-government? I hope, I pray not.

Mr. FORD, of New York, next spoke in vindication of his course on this subject, and in warm reply to Mr. Ross's remarks casting blame on those whose course had been the same as that of Mr. FORD.

Mr. CLAY concluded the main debate, by a speech of about an hour's length, in which he alternately reasoned, remonstrated, and entreated with the House to settle forever this agitating question, by passing the resolution before it.

Mr. FORD said, he felt himself called upon, by the remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Ohio, who had made an allusion to him, as if addressed to him by name, with a direct charge of inconsistency, to rise in his own defence, and to repel the charge; and he trusted the Committee would excuse him for trespassing on their patience.

Sir, said Mr. F., I would inform that gentleman that my course, during the whole discussion of this subject, during the last as well as the present session, has been regulated by one uniform principle, viz: a sacred regard to the Constitution of the United States. This has been my pole star. Believing, as I did, that the Constitution did not warrant the imposition of the restriction, I voted against it.

With the same regard to my oath, to support that Constitution, I voted against the resolution for the unconditional admission of Missouri, at the present session, because her constitution contains an article which, in my opinion, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and does not comply with the conditions proposed by the act of last session.

And, sir, I must say, I can never vote for her admission on any other condition than that Congress require that this offensive article be expunged. Self respect, and a due regard to our laws, require it. And I demand of that gentleman to show the inconsistency.

Look at your act of last session authorizing the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, and for her admission into the Union. What condition did you impose? "That her constitution, when so formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States."

What does the amendment propose? That, as a condition upon which she is admitted into the Union, Congress now require that she comply with the condition imposed by the act of last session, and expunge the article which a majority of this House have declared, by their vote, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Do you deprive her of any right? No! Does Missouri claim the right to violate the Constitution of the United States? If she claims this right, I shall never vote for her admission. But, sir, she makes no such claim. I believe she had no intention, by the insertion of that clause, to infringe the Constitution, or affect the rights of any citizen of any State.

In common with all our brethren of the South, as has been declared on this floor, she did not suppose that people of color were considered as citizens in any State of this Union; and I have no doubt she will cheerfully amend her constitution, by expunging the offensive clause. For myself, I am perfectly willing to trust to the honor and magnanimity of our brethren of Missouri to amend their constitution in the manner proposed by my amendment, and to vote for the resolution with this proviso.

The question was then taken on ordering the resolution to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 88, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Blackledge, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Bryan, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Earle, Eddy, Floyd, Ford, Gray, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hill, Hooks, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Little, McCoy, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, Montgomery, T. The Election of President and Vice President.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

WEDNESDAY, February 4.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

[This bill contains provisions, to reduce the compensation to postmasters to three per cent. on any excess of receipt of postage over three thousand six hundred dollars per quarter; to repeal the extra allowance of one thousand dollars per annum to the postmaster at Washington City; to prohibit any postmaster, or editor or printer of a newspaper, from contracting for the transportation of the mail; to require bonds from persons stipulating for the carriage of newspapers other than in the mail, that they shall carry all papers delivered to them and on equal terms; to compel postmasters to reside in the city, town, village, or place in which their offices are established, and to limit their privilege of franking, to letters, newspapers, and packets, directed to and from their respective offices.]

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed Mr. BARBOUR a teller, on their part, agreeably to the resolutions of the 13th instant, in relation to the mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CLAY, from the joint committee, to whom the subject had been referred, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday, the 14th February, 1821, and the President of the Senate, seated on the right of the Speaker of the House, shall be the presiding officer of the Senate, and the Speaker shall be the presiding officer of the House; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the House, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Resolved, That, if any objection be made to the votes of Missouri, and the counting or omitting to count which shall not essentially change the result of the election; in that case they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Missouri to be counted, the result would be, for A. B. for President of the United States, — votes; if not counted, for A. B. as President of the United States, — votes; but in either event A. B. is elected President of the United States; and in the same manner for Vice President.

Mr. CLAY offered some remarks explanatory of the considerations which governed the committee in recommending the resolutions which had been reported. As convenience rendered it necessary for the Senate to meet this House here, in its own Hall, it was due to that body, by courtesy and propriety, that the President should be invited to preside, he being the officer designated by the Constitution to perform a certain duty appertaining to the occasion which called the two Houses together. As to the second resolution, the state of the votes for President and Vice President was well known, though unofficially; and, as the votes of Missouri could not affect the result, it was considered by the committee, to obviate the unpleasant difficulty which would otherwise arise in the joint meeting, better to provide for the case in the manner proposed. This course was deemed by the committee the most expedient, under all the circumstances, and he hoped the House would adopt it, the more especially as the Senate had already concurred in it.

The question was taken on the first resolution, and agreed to without a division, though several nays were heard.

The question being stated on the second resolution—

Mr. RANDOLPH said he could not consent to this special verdict, as it had been called, in the case of Missouri. He could not recognise in this House or the other House, singly, or conjointly, the power to decide on the votes of any State. Suppose, he said, you strike out Missouri and insert South Carolina, which also has a provision in its constitution repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; or Virginia, or Massachusetts, which had a test, he believed, in its constitution; was there any less power to decide on their votes, than on those of Missouri? He maintained that the Electoral College was as independent of Congress, as Congress of them; and we have no right, said he, to judge of their proceedings. Mr. R. said, he would rather see an interregnum, or see no votes counted at all, than to see a principle adopted which went to the very foundation on which the Presidential office rested. Suppose a case, in which some gentleman of one House or the other should choose to turn up his nose at the vote of some State, and say that if it be so and so, such a person is elected; and if so and so, what-you-call-em is elected—did not everybody see the absurdity of such a proposition? Mr. R. added other remarks illustrative of his opinion of the course proposed by the resolution—deeming it not only erroneous, but erroneous in a matter of vital importance—in the ascertainment of the person who had been elected by the people Chief Magistrate of this nation—the most important officer under the Constitution—the monarch—for, whoever, in any country, commands the army and navy, and collects and distributes the revenue, is a king, call him what you will. The time of this House was precious, and he would not consume it, by saying all he thought and felt on the subject.

Mr. TRIMBLE was far from desiring to consume the time of the House, or to embarrass the House, but he could not give his consent to this resolution. If any thing was due to State rights, this resolution ought not to be adopted; as it would, however immaterial in the present case, be cited hereafter as a precedent; and precedents were becoming important things in the public transactions. The House might set an example by this vote, as ruinous in its consequences, as any decision which could be made. It was about to declare, not what was the true vote for President of the United States, but to state it hypothetically. Mr. T. argued at some length against such a course. Suppose some member in joint meeting should ask the President of the Senate how many votes were given—he must answer in the words of the resolution, and therefore would not state the fact, according to the law. It was the duty of the two Houses to enunciate the true state of the vote for President and Vice President, and the proposed announcement would not be the fact. He concluded by saying that he would rather that the votes of Missouri were left out altogether, than adopt the course proposed.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that the gentleman was under some mistake on one point. The Constitution of the United States provides, not that the person having a majority of votes should be President, but a majority of the votes of the Electors appointed. Now, he desired to know whether the Electors of Missouri were appointed or not.

Mr. FLOYD said he was aware that the question to agree to the resolution was tantamount to a motion to reject, but he would prefer the latter shape for the question, to show more strongly his opinion of it—it would suit his feelings towards it better. We have been going on for several years, said he, accumulating power until scarcely any is left but in Congress. If they had any power over the votes of Missouri at all, he said, it was when her votes were first received; but no such power existed. The votes of Indiana, at the last election for President, were counted when precisely in the same situation as those of Missouri now. He protested against this assumption of authority on the part of Congress, and wished to show his disapprobation of the resolution in the strongest manner.

Mr. CLAY said the Constitution required of the two Houses to assemble and perform the highest duty that could devolve on a public body—to ascertain who had been elected by the people to administer their national concerns. In a case of votes coming forward which could not be counted, the Constitution was silent; but, fortunately, the end in that case carried with it the means. The two Houses were called on to enumerate the votes for President and Vice President; of course they were called on to decide what are votes. It being obvious that a difficulty would arise in the joint meeting, concerning the votes of Missouri, some gentlemen thinking they ought to be counted, and others dissenting from that opinion, the committee thought it best to prevent all difficulty by waiving the question in the manner proposed, knowing that it could not affect the result of the election. As to the condition of Missouri, he himself thought her a State, with a perfect moral right to be admitted into the Union, but kept out for the want of a ceremonious act which was deemed by others necessary to entitle her to admission. Though, in his opinion, a State in fact, yet not being so in form, her votes could not be counted according to form. He was aware that the question of her admission might come up and be decided in this very shape; for if Congress allowed her to vote for President and Vice President, and counted her votes, it would be a full admission of the State into the Union; but the committee thought, as there were other and more usual modes of admitting the State into the Union, it was better not to bring up the question in the discharge of this solemn and indispensable duty, but to allow that ceremony to proceed, if possible, without difficulty or embarrassment.

Mr. RHEA said the Constitution had in it neither waiving or elasticity, and it would not bend to circumstances of expediency. The Constitution had declared the duty of Congress in ascertaining the votes for President—it was not competent for them to mend the Constitution, nor to decide such a question as this proposed, and he was opposed to the resolution.

Mr. TRIMBLE said the very reason urged for this resolution, was that which constrained him to oppose it; and proceeded further to argue that it would be better to exclude the votes entirely than set such an example.

Mr. CULBRETH said he could hardly say whether he was most gratified at being relieved, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) from being the first to make objection to the proposed resolution, or grieved that he could not have the support of the gentleman from Kentucky, with whom it had given him great pleasure usually to act. The people of Missouri were, by the act of the last session of Congress authorized to form a constitution and State government; and, in the first article of that constitution, it is declared that the said State, when formed, "shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever." Believing that the people of Missouri, having formed a constitution and State government, in compliance with the act of last session, in all its provisions and conditions, and considering that she is, in fact, a State, and of right, if not in fact, (and he inclined to believe she was in fact,) a member of the Union, and that she is kept out of the enjoyment of her rights by a sheer act of power—he spoke this in reference to the act, and not to the actors—that simple justice required her admission to the enjoyment of her rights. Mr. C. said he found, on examination of the constitution of Missouri, that all officers, civil and military, are required, before entering upon the duties of their respective offices, to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, as well as of that State. It is declared (I use the word declared emphatically) by the constitution of the said State to be the duty of the General Assembly, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in said State, under any pretext whatsoever." This last clause is supposed by some to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. It is believed that a fair construction of the clause referred to, taken in connexion with the oath which the individual members of the General Assembly are required to take, does not warrant such a conclusion. In the spirit of candor, I ask gentlemen, said Mr. C., who entertain this opinion, what is the actual duty of the General Assembly of Missouri, resulting from the oath which they are required to take and the declaratory clause above referred to? I appeal to them as statesmen, as politicians, as common lawyers, nay, as gentlemen of common sense, whether a fair and liberal construction—whether the obvious and only fair construction that can be given to the clause objected to, will not reconcile it with the Constitution of the United States? Will it not be the duty of the General Assembly of Missouri, acting under their oath to support the Constitution of the United States, to pass no law which shall violate that oath or be repugnant to that Constitution? To use the language of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Ross,) on yesterday, can it be believed that they will commit perjury by the passage of such a law? [Here the Speaker reminded Mr. C. that the hour for counting the votes had arrived, and intimated the propriety of his remarks being brought to a conclusion.] Mr. C. respectfully answered that he knew of no hour appointed for any purpose in relation to the business of the House; that, under the suggestion of the honorable Speaker, as well as from a sense of propriety, he should bring his remarks to a conclusion as speedily as possible, consistent with a distinct expression of his views upon the subject before the House. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. C., that if gentlemen could divest themselves of all prejudices—if they were not insensibly influenced by feelings and considerations not necessarily excited by the provision in question, that they would have no difficulty in reconciling the seeming conflict between the Constitution of the United States and the so often referred to clause in the constitution of Missouri. The General Assembly of Missouri will undoubtedly feel themselves bound to perform the duty enjoined upon them by the constitution of that State, limited by the paramount authority of the Constitution of the United States, conformably to the oath which they are required to take. If they were to attempt to extend the provisions of any law beyond this limit their act would be, so far, not only void, but, if knowingly committed, the members would be guilty of perjury. I have no more to add.

Mr. TRACY was compelled, he said, to vote against the resolution, but for reasons very different from those of Mr. CULBRETH. He was opposed to the resolution because MISSOURI was neither a State in the Union nor one out of the Union; but was in fact a Territory. He could not, therefore, consent that her votes should be counted at all—considering them entirely foreign to the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. CLAY said he would merely observe, that the difficulty is before us; that we must decide it when the two Houses meet, or avoid it by some previous arrangement. The Committee being morally certain that the question would arise on the votes, in joint meeting, thought it best, as he had before stated, to give it the go-by in this way. Suppose this resolution not adopted, the President of the Senate will proceed to open and count the votes; and would the House allow that officer, singly and alone, thus, virtually, to decide the question of the legality of the votes? If not, how then were they to proceed? Was it to be settled by the decision of the two Houses conjointly, or of the two Houses separately? One House would say the votes ought to be counted, the other that they ought not; and then the votes would be lost altogether. Would the gentleman from New York prefer that it be decided in the joint meeting? In that case he would find himself in a much leaner majority than on the question yesterday. In fact, Mr. C. said there was no mode pointed out in the Constitution of settling litigated questions arising in the discharge of this duty; it was a casus omisus; and he thought it would be proper, either by some act of derivative legislation, or by an amendment of the Constitution itself, to supply the defect.

Mr. LIVERMORE made a few remarks in favor of the resolution.

Mr. RHEA made a few remarks in opposition to the resolution. The ground he took was this: that it was not in the power of this House, or of both Houses, by resolution, to remedy a defect in the Constitution.

The question on agreeing to the resolution was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Anderson, Archer, of Maryland, Baker, Bateman, Beecher, Campbell, Cannon, Clagett, Clark, Clay, Cook, Cushman, Dane, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dickinson, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Eustis, Fay, Folger, Foot, Ford, Fuller, Gorham, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hill, Hobart, Hostetter, Kendall, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Little, Livermore, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, McCullough, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, Meigs, Monell, Montgomery, R. rolina, Tyler, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina.—67.

So the second resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, it was then ordered, that a message be sent to the Senate, informing that body, that this House, on its part, concurs in the report of the joint committee, and is now prepared to proceed, with the Senate, in the performance of its Constitutional duty.

[MESSRS. CLAY, SERGEANT, and VAN RENSSELAER, were the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, to act with the committee of the Senate, in considering the proper mode of proceeding in regard to counting out the Electoral votes.]

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, gave notice he should, on to-morrow at twelve o'clock, offer for the consideration of the House a resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, containing in all respects the same provisions as were contained in the resolution from the Senate, which was rejected in this House.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, and by general consent, it was determined that the members of this House should receive the Senate, on their entrance into the House, standing and uncovered. In the same manner it was determined that a sufficient number of the seats on the right hand of the Chair, should be set apart for the Senators.

Mr. CLAY moved that a committee of two members be appointed to receive the Senate, and conduct the President of the Senate to the chair, and the members to the seats assigned to them.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, declared his opposition to this course. It had been usual for the Speaker of the House to receive the President of the Senate, and invite him to a seat beside him; and he saw no reason, at this time, for the proposed innovation.

Mr. CLAY said it was true it never had been done before; but, having, whilst he had the honor to preside over this House, witnessed the embarrassments occasioned by the want of such a regulation, he now thought it would be proper to adopt it.

The motion of Mr. CLAY was then agreed to without a division, though not without negative votes.

Mr. NELSON remarked, in an under tone, that he wished he had required the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. CLAY and Mr. HILL, were appointed a committee accordingly.

Soon after, the Senate came into the Hall, preceded by its President, and attended by its Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms; and the President was conducted to the Speaker's chair, the Speaker occupying a chair at his left hand.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate then delivered the votes of the States, in the following order, to the committee for counting the votes, (Mr. BARBOUR of the Senate, and Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, and SERGEANT of this House)—and the official authentications, &c., were each of them twice read in an audible tone, and the votes recorded by the Secretary of the Senate and by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as follows:

STATES.	For President.		For Vice President.
	James Monroe.		D. D. Tompkins.
New Hampshire - -	7		7

The scattering votes were as follows: For President, in New Hampshire, there was for John Quincy Adams, one vote. For Vice President, there was, in New Hampshire, for Richard Rush, one vote; in Massachusetts, for Richard Stockton, eight votes; in Delaware, for Daniel Rodney, four votes; in Maryland, for Robert Goodloe Harper, one vote.

The process of this ceremony was very tedious, from the length of the verifications, proclamations, &c., and the House did not arrive at this stage of it till after four o'clock.

When the votes of the Electors for Missouri were announced, by the PRESIDENT of the Senate, and handed to the tellers—

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, rose, and said: Mr. President and Mr. Speaker, I object to receiving any votes for President and Vice President from Missouri, because Missouri is not a State of this Union.

A motion was then made by a member of the Senate, that the Senate do now withdraw to its Chamber; and, the question having been put, was decided in the affirmative; and the Senate retired.

The House being called to order—

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, then rose and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Missouri is one of the States of this Union, and her votes for President and Vice President of the United States ought to be received and counted.

Mr. F. said, he believed, that gentlemen must now begin to see the precipice to which the decisions of this House in respect to Missouri had brought them. He was, as every member must be, tired of the debate on this subject; but he thought that no one could discharge his duty as he ought without investigating the merits of the question which he had now proposed. He thought it proper, also, that the yeas and nays should be recorded on every question connected with this subject. That the votes of States, whose admission into the Union had not been declared previous to the votes being given in, had heretofore been received for President and Vice President, he believed the gentleman from New Hampshire would not deny. If such a course had been right heretofore, he did not see why an objection should now be made. If innovations on established usage were to be justified by their novelty, then indeed all disquisitions on the subject were vain. But the time was, when members from new States were admitted to their seats in this House, without the previous passage of a declaratory resolution. That there was a law on the statute book that any Territory having a population of sixty thousand souls might form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union, no one would deny. Whenever we turn our eyes, said Mr. F., and observe the progress of the Government, until the present time, the States have been admitted upon this principle, until in the present case; and in this case, at the last session, a compromise, as it was thought and called, was entered into. Mr. F. hesitated to express in terms all he thought on this subject; but he would say, if he had voted for that law at the last session; and opposed now those principles which would naturally grow out of it, he should have said to himself, when he had done so, that he had done in his life one act which he thought dishonorable. Let us now, said he, have the question fairly at issue. Let us know whether Missouri be a State in the Union or not. If not, let us send her an Ambassador, and treat for her admission into the Union. Sir, we cannot take another step, without hurling this Government into the gulf of destruction. For one, I say, I have gone as far as I can go in the way of compromise—and if there is to be a compromise beyond that point, it must be at the edge of the sword.

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland said, that entertaining the same sentiments as the gentleman from Virginia with respect to the refusal to admit Missouri into the Union, he yet felt himself bound to move, as he now did, to postpone the further consideration of this resolution indefinitely. He was opposed to this House undertaking to proceed in any manner as to the legality of the Electoral votes. He could recognise no power in the House of Representatives on this subject separate from the Senate. The expressions in the Constitution, in regard to the counting of the votes of Electors, &c., he considered as imperative. All questions arising out of it, according to his construction, must be settled in joint meeting of the two Houses. He could not agree that this House had a right to determine whether any vote should be received or rejected. What are the words of the Constitution? "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Does it not follow, asked Mr. R., that the votes must be counted in the presence of the two Houses? For what purpose do they assemble together, unless it be to determine on the legality of the votes? If not for this purpose, the joint meeting is for form and show, and nothing else. We must, in my apprehension, determine the question in joint meeting, and in no other way. Entertaining this opinion, he said, he should vote for the indefinite postponement of any proposition, the object of which is to determine, in this House, the legality or illegality of any Electoral vote. At the last election of President, an objection was made, by the gentleman who now presides, to receiving the votes of Indiana, because they were given in before the passage of the act declaring her admission into the Union. On that occasion, as now, the Senate retired. I thought then, as now, said Mr. A., that they had no right to retire until the question was settled. On that occasion, the House determined to postpone indefinitely the objection. The motives which induced that determination were doubtless various; it was my opinion, then, that it was improper to entertain the objection in the House, and I think the same of the present proposition.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, it was not without reluctance that he offered himself to the attention of the House at this time; but he submitted to the very worthy gentleman from Maryland who had just taken his seat, whether the object which he had in view could, according to his own views of propriety, be effectuated by the course which he had recommended to this House. It was no part of his nature, Mr. R. said, nor of his purpose, to inflate to a greater magnitude this exaggerated question of the admission of Missouri into the Union. But the question had now assumed that aspect which, had it depended on him, it should have taken at an earlier period of the session. It was, he said, not only congenial with the principles and practices of our free Government, but unless he was deceived with the practice of that country from which we had adopted, and wisely adopted, our manly institutions, that on any occasion when any person presents himself to a representative body with credentials of title to a seat, he shall take his seat, and perform the functions of a member, until a prior and a better claim shall not only be preferred, but established. It was seen that, but the day before yesterday, the Committee of Elections of this House came forward with a report, stating that the qualifications and returns of certain members were perfect who have been acting and legislating, and on whose votes the laws of the land have depended for the last three or four months. Just so it ought to have been with regard to the Representative from the State of Missouri. She had now, said Mr. R., presented herself, for the first time, in a visible and tangible shape. She comes into this House, not in forma pauperis, but claiming to be one of the co-sovereigns of this confederated Government, and presents to you her vote, by receiving or rejecting which the election of your Chief Magistrate will be lawful or unlawful. He did not mean by the vote of Missouri, but by the votes of all the States.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

The Election of President and Vice President.

H. OF R.

Now comes the question, whether we will not merely repel her, but repel her with scorn and contumely. Chui bono? And, he might add, quo warranto? He should like to hear, he said, from the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. LIVERMORE,) where this House gets its authority—he should like to hear some of the learned, or unlearned, sages of the law, with which this House, as well as all our legislative bodies, abounds, show their authority for refusing to receive the votes from Missouri. Mr. R. said, he went back to the first principles. The Electoral Colleges, he said, are as independent of this House, as this House is of them. They had as good a right to pronounce on their qualifications, as this House has of those of its members. Your office, said, he, in regard to the electoral votes, is merely ministerial. It is to count the votes, and you undertake to reject votes. To what will this lead? Do you ever expect to see the time when there shall be in the Presidential chair a creature so poor, so imbecile, not only not worthy of being at the head of the nation, but not worthy of being at the head of a petty corporation—do you ever expect to see in that office an animal so poor, as not to have in this House retainers enough to enable him to reject the vote of any State which, being counted, might prevent his continuance, and their continuance, and that of their friends, in office? He spoke not of the present incumbent—he was not so wanting in common decency and decorum as to do so—he spoke in reference not only to what is past, but to that which is prospective, and which every man, who looks the least into futurity, must know will happen, and, in all probability, will very shortly happen. He undertook to say that if this House should, by a vote of indefinite postponement—for the form was immaterial—or in any other way, and it would be observed, for the first instance in the person of Missouri, of this much injured, long insulted and trampled-upon member of this confederacy, was this example to be set—if, said he, you do, for the first time, now receive the votes of a State, it will be created into a precedent, and that in the life-time of some of those who now hear me, for the manufacture of Presidents by this House. The wisest men may make constitutions, on paper, as they please.

What, Mr. R. asked, was the theory of this Constitution? It is, that this House, except upon a certain contingency, has nothing at all to do with the appointment of President and Vice President of the United States, and when it does act, must act by States, and by States only can it act on this subject, unless it transcend the limits of the Constitution. What, he asked, was to be the practice of the Constitution, as now proposed? That an informal meeting of this and the other House is to usurp the initiative, the nominative power, with regard to the two first officers of the Government; that they are to wrest from the people of the United States their indefeasible right of telling us whom they wish to exercise the functions of the Government, in despite and contempt of their decision. Is there to be no limit to the power of Congress—no mound or barrier to stay their usurpation? Why were the electoral bodies established? The Constitution has wisely provided that they shall assemble, each by itself, and not in one great assembly. By this means, assuredly, that system of intrigue which was matured into a science, or rather into an art here, was guarded against. But, Mr. R. ventured to say, that the electoral college of this much-despised Missouri, acting conformably to law, and to the genius and nature of our institutions, if it were composed of but one man, was as independent of this House as this House was of it. If, however, said he, per fas aut nefas, the point is to be carried; if the tocsin is to be sounded; if the troops are to be rallied, and Missouri is to be expelled with scorn from our august presence—how august, Mr. Speaker, I leave it for you to decide—there are those who will be willing to take her to their arms. And, in point of mere expediency, he would ask of gentlemen—he put the suggestion in that shape, because he believed they were inaccessible to other considerations—in point of expediency, he asked them, what were they now doing but riveting those ties by which Missouri would, he trusted, forever be bound to that section of the country by which, with whatever reason, her rights have been supported on this floor? I do look with a sentiment I cannot express, said Mr. R.—I look with a sentiment of pity—and that has been said to be nearly allied to love, as I know it to be allied to a very different emotion—I look with pity on those who believe that, by their feeble efforts in this House, governed by forms and technicalities—your Sergeant-at-Arms and committees of attendance, and mummeries such as belong to other countries where I have never travelled, and trust in God I never shall—they can stop the growth of the rising Empire in the West. Let gentlemen lay a resolution on the table, let it be engrossed in a fair hand, and do you, Mr. Speaker, sign it, that the waves of the Mississippi shall not seek the ocean, and then send your Sergeant-at-Arms to carry it into execution, and see whether you can enforce it with all the force, physical or moral, under your control. Mr. R. concluded by expressing his hope that the gentleman from Maryland would withdraw his motion for indefinite postponement.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said he believed it was pretty well ascertained that he was willing to go as great lengths as any man in this House to support the rights of Missouri. He regretted that, even in this skirmish, he was obliged to separate himself from those with whom he had acted with so much pleasure and with so much zeal. But he could not maintain, what he should do by voting for this resolution, that Missouri is now a State of this Union. Was it contended that Congress has not a right to require the submission of the constitution of a new State to its consideration before she becomes a member of the Union? If so, would any man contend that Congress had not a right to pass, in some shape or other, upon the constitution of any new State? Was there any one of his colleagues who would say, that there was no possible case in which he might not be induced to reject the constitution of Missouri? Suppose the constitution she has offered had been notoriously aristocratical, was there any man among them who would not have given his vote for the exclusion of Missouri from the confederacy? We presume not. If he were to give his vote for this resolution, Mr. A. said, he should contradict all the language he had hitherto held in respect to Missouri; for, if she was a State without the consent of Congress, she had no right to complain of oppression by the refusal of Congress to recognise her.

H. OF R.

The Election of President and Vice President.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Mr. A. said, he should continue to reprobate the odious and foul combination by which Missouri is kept out of the Union; but should he give a vote for this resolution, he should feel himself precluded from doing so. If, indeed, the case were presented, whether the member from Missouri should be admitted to a seat on this floor, he should give a vote affirmatively; for it would be tantamount to an admission of the State of Missouri into the Union. But, were he to vote for this proposition, he should vote for an evident solecism; it would be saying that, though it has been decided that Missouri shall not be admitted into the Union, yet she shall exercise the highest functions of a member of the Confederacy. Mr. A. said he could not hold that language, or present himself in that character. Opposed in general to postponements, he should vote against the proposed postponement, in order to meet the question directly. He had no notion, he added, of the doctrine which he had heard for the first time to-day, that you may have a problematical or hypothetical election of a President and Vice President. Suppose the result of the election depended on the votes of Missouri, and the same course was to be pursued which was now indicated; the President of the Senate would have to announce that, in one event, we had a President, whilst in another we had not, and the Government would be left without a head, and a dissolution of the Union would be the possible immediate consequence. He was a little surprised, he said, at one ground which had been taken on this occasion: that the House had no power to pass any judgment on any return. He had always thought that, wherever was lodged the power to receive a return, there also was the power to pass a judgment on the validity of that return. Suppose any territory, not within the limits of the United States at the time, Florida, for example, to send votes here for Electors; was there no authority by which these votes could be rejected? Suppose a State, entitled to 27 votes, should send 37 votes, would any gentleman contend that there was no power in this House to judge of the proper number? Could there ever be a pure election—could it ever be ascertained who was elected, in the event of the establishment of a doctrine of that sort? Mr. A. concluded, by declaring his readiness to adopt any measure to bring Missouri, now trampled down by power, into the Union, but he could not vote for this resolution.

Mr. CLAY next obtained the floor, but gave way to allow Mr. RANDOLPH to make an explanation.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, it was highly probable that the few remarks which he had made might give rise to misapprehensions in the minds of other gentlemen, as they had done in the mind of his colleague. He, therefore, wished to explain. His position, he said, was misunderstood. It had been said, and pertinently said, that Missouri might be admitted into the Union in more ways than one. His position, then, was, that this is the first instance in which Missouri has knocked at the door and demanded her rights. It is now for us, said Mr. R., by permitting her to come in, or rather by refraining from extruding her from this Hall, to determine whether she shall now be one of our Commonwealth, or, as the fashion is to call it, of our Empire. Mr. R. said he had no doubt that Congress might drive Missouri into the wilderness, like another son of Hagar. If we do, said he, we drive her at our own peril. If either of the worthy Senators and Representative from Missouri, whose long forbearance had excited surprise in no man's breast more than in that of Mr. R.—he did not mean to blame them for pursuing the counsel of cooler heads than his—had presented themselves here, would you (addressing the Speaker) have felt yourself bound to exclude them from the communion with more than papal power; not only from the cup of wine, but from the bread of life itself? Let me tell my friend before me, (Mr. ARCHER,) we have not the power which he seems to think we possess; and if this be a casus omissus in the Constitution, I want to know where we acquire the power to supply the defect. You may keep Missouri out of the Union by violence, but here the issue is joined. She comes forward in the person of her Presidential and Vice Presidential Electors, instead of that of her Representative; and she was thus presented in a shape as unquestionable as that of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, or the proudest and oldest State in the Union. She comes forward by her attorneys—her Electors. Will you deny them admittance? Will you thrust her Electors, and hers only, from this Hall? Mr. R. said his friend had not given to this subject the sort of consideration which he knew him to be capable of giving it. I made no objection, said Mr. R., to the votes of New Hampshire, Maine, or Vermont: I have had as good a right to object to the votes of New Hampshire, as the gentleman from New Hampshire has to object to the votes of Missouri. Who made thou, Cain, thy brother's keeper? Who put Missouri into custody of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire? The Electors of Missouri are as much homines probi et legales as the Electors of New Hampshire. This, Mr. R. said, was no skirmish, as it had been called. This was the battle when Greek meets Greek; it was a conflict not to be decided between the phalanx and the legion, whether the impenetrability of the one or the activity of the other shall prevail. Let us buckle on our armor, said Mr. R.; let us put aside all this flummery, these metaphysical distinctions, these legal technicalities, these special pleadings, this dry minuteness, this unprofitable drawing of distinctions without difference; let us say now, as we have said on another occasion, we will assert, maintain,

The Election of President and Vice President.

and vindicate our rights, or put to every hazard what you pretend to hold in such high estimation.

Mr. R. said he recollected perfectly well, in the celebrated election of Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr—they live, said he, illustrious examples of the merits of their respective partisans—what were we then told? Why, that we must withdraw our opposition, or there would be no election; that a dissolution of the Union impended; that volcanoes began to play; that earthquakes yawned beneath us; and, recollect, sir, we had a President in the chair who had a majority in this House, small as it was. He treated the idea of giving way with derision and scorn. We said we will not give way, and you must take the consequences. We appealed, said Mr. R., to the good sense of the nation; and I do now appeal to this nation, said he, whether this pretended sympathy for the rights of free negroes and mulattoes is to supersede the rights of the free white citizens, of ten times their whole number. They gave way, sir, said Mr. R.; the sheep is the most timid and helpless of all animals; it retreats before any attack is offered to it. The President of the United States, said Mr. R., possesses great powers and highly responsible functions, and should be looked up to with veneration and deference, because he is the Chief Magistrate of a people, legally appointed by their suffrages. But a President of the United States, appointed by the exclusion of the votes of those who are the same flesh and blood as ourselves—for the people of Missouri are not natives of Missouri, with the exception of a few French and still fewer Spaniards—is no more the Chief Magistrate of this country than that thing—that pageant, which the majorities of the two Houses proposed to set up just twenty years ago—a President made by law—no, by the form and color of law, against the principles of the Constitution, and in violation of the rights of the freemen of this country. Sir, said Mr. R., I would not give a button for him. On his personal account, and for his personal qualities, I might treat him with respect as an individual, but as Chief Magistrate of this country, he would be more odious to my judgment than one of the house of Stuart attempting to seat himself on the throne of England, in defiance of the laws of succession and of the opinion of the people. We have, I am afraid, so long basked in the impure atmosphere, not of this House, but of this Court, that—

Mr. CLAY here claimed the floor, which he had yielded to the gentleman only for the purpose of making an explanation.

Mr. RANDOLPH took his seat, saying that he would give way to the honorable gentleman in every thing but one.

Mr. CLAY said he really saw no difficulty in this business; and, before he sat down, should make a motion, with a view to put an end to this discussion. The House and Senate have, by a joint act, this day agreed, that, in the event of an objection being made to the vote of Missouri, her vote should be counted hypothetically; that the whole number should be announced, including the vote of Missouri, and that the number should also be stated as it would be, the vote of Missouri being excluded; and, the result not varying, that it should be declared that, in either case, the person having the largest number of votes was duly elected. The motive which operated on the joint committee in recommending this course, and on the two Houses in adopting it, was to avoid the very difficulty into which the House was about to precipitate itself. It was an effort to provide, by previous arrangement, for the very contingency which has arisen. The moment the objection was made, in that instant the rule adopted this morning took effect. Mr. C. said it therefore appeared to him, with very great deference to the course of the presiding officer of the Senate, that he ought to have gone on, and, after the votes had been summed up, to have made the annunciation as proposed in the joint resolution adopted this morning.

The two Houses ought not, in the opinion of Mr. C., to have separated until they had consummated what had been stipulated for. He was now not willing to take up any proposition on this subject or any other, however unwilling he might have been to meet it at any other time. He was opposed to do so, because to do so is a violation of good faith between the two Houses, as pledged by the arrangement of this morning. He had not a doubt, he said, that Missouri might be admitted into the Union in a variety of ways, and very possibly, on proper examination, the mode now proposed might be one of them, by the two Houses, jointly or separately, giving her the exercise of a right which, as a State, would belong to her. The House, however, as well as the Senate, had virtually determined to get round that question to-day, and to put an end to any controversy which might arise in respect to it, in the manner contemplated by the second resolution passed this morning. Mr. C. therefore moved that the subject now under consideration be laid on the table, in order to resume the business which had been interrupted by the retirement of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER demanded the reading of the first resolution which passed this House, as compared with that which passed the Senate.

[Here took place an explanation of a variation which had taken place in the form of the resolve. As it came from the Senate the President of the Senate was to preside over the joint meeting. As reported by the committee on the part of this House the President of the Senate was to preside over the Senate, and the Speaker was to preside over the House of Representatives. This alteration was made, because it was known that the House of Representatives would not have agreed to the other course, and a collision might have arisen between the two Houses. It may be added, that the Senate were not aware, when they came into the Hall, of the change of the arrangement, but supposed it to stand, as they had voted it. Their retirement from the Chamber arose from the President of the Senate having learned these facts after he was seated in his place in the Hall. He would otherwise, it is supposed, have gone on to proclaim the result, immediately after Mr. LIVINGMORE'S objection, as prescribed in the resolution.]

Some conversation took place between Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, CLAY, RANDOLPH, NELSON of Virginia, FOOT, and COBB, as to the state in which matters would be, on the Senate's return. Some of the gentlemen contended that, on the Senate's return, matters would stand just as they did before, and the same difficulty as had already presented itself would again arise. Others contended, and the majority appeared to be with them, that, on the return of the Senate, the President would go on to declare the result, as directed in the second joint resolution of this morning.

Mr. LIVERMORE, in the course of these desultory remarks, took an opportunity to vindicate his conduct in offering the objection to the votes of Missouri. It was a duty necessary to be performed by somebody; having no wish to be forward in the business, he had endeavored to persuade several gentlemen to present it—but, they declining to do so, it had become his duty to do it, and in his opinion he had done it at the proper moment.*

The question was taken on Mr. CLAY's motion to lay Mr. FLOYD's resolution on the table, and decided in the affirmative, ayes 103. And then, on motion of Mr. Clay, it was ordered, that a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that the House is now ready to receive the Senate in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of continuing the enumeration of the votes of the Electors for President and Vice President, according to the joint resolutions agreed upon between the two houses; and that the Clerk go with the said message.

The Clerk accordingly went with the said message; and he being returned—

The Senate again appeared, and took seats in the House as before.

* FEBRUARY 17, 1821.

Messrs. Gales & Seaton :

In your report of the transactions in the House of Representatives on the 14th instant, you observe that "Mr. Livermore took an opportunity to vindicate his conduct in offering his objections to the votes from Missouri." But you omit the only circumstance which rendered any observations on his part necessary; for certainly the objection was in substance proper, and every member of Congress had a right to make it. The truth is, Mr. Smith, of Maryland, in the course of debate, said to this effect: that the abrupt departure of the Senate, and all the difficulty which ensued, ought to be imputed to the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. L., who made his objection too soon, instead of waiting, as he should have done, till after the Missouri votes were counted. In answer to this charge, Mr. L. made a few remarks, which you have not reported, but which probably convinced even Mr. Smith that the objection to counting the votes from Missouri was interposed at the proper moment.

A. D.

[Our correspondent is perfectly right. Mr. Livermore did not certainly vindicate the course he had taken, until it had been impugned by others. We were so cramped for room in our report, that we were obliged to generalize the incidental remarks, and, in doing so, perhaps a wrong impression may have been given to Mr. L.'s observations.]—Editors National Intelligencer.

The President of the Senate, in the presence of both Houses, proceeded to open the certificate of the Electors of the State of Missouri, which he delivered to the tellers, by whom it was read, and who registered the same.

And the votes of all the States having been thus counted, registered, and the lists thereof compared, they were delivered to the President of the Senate, by whom they were read, as already printed.

The President of the Senate then, in pursuance of the resolution adopted by the two Houses, proceeded to announce the state of the votes to the two Houses of Congress, in joint meeting assembled, as follows:

"Were the votes of Missouri to be counted, the result would be—For JAMES MONROE, of Virginia, for President of the United States, 231 votes: if not counted, for JAMES MONROE, of Virginia, 228 votes:—For DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, of New York, for Vice President of the United States, 218 votes: if not counted, for DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, of New York, for Vice President of the United States, 215 votes. But in either event, JAMES MONROE, of Virginia, has a majority of the votes of the whole number of Electors for President, and DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, of New York, has a majority of the votes of the whole number of Electors for Vice President of the United States."

The President of the Senate had proceeded thus far, or nearly thus far, in the proclamation, when Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, addressed the Chair, and inquired whether the votes of Missouri were or were not counted.

Cries of Order! Order! were so loud as to drown Mr. FLOYD's voice.

[The President of the Senate had hesitated in the proclamation, on Mr. FLOYD addressing the Chair.]

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and was addressing the Chair, when loud cries of Order! Order! resounded from many voices.

The SPEAKER pronounced Mr. RANDOLPH to be out of order, and invited him to take his seat.

Mr. BRUSH demanded that Mr. RANDOLPH should be allowed to proceed, and declared his determination to sustain his right to do so. Mr. B. was also loudly called to order.

Mr. FLOYD demanded of the Chair whether he was considered in order or not.

The SPEAKER determined that he was not in order at this time, the only business being at that present time that prescribed by the rule of this morning.

There was considerable murmuring at this decision; but order was restored; when the President of the Senate concluded his annunciation as follows:

"I therefore declare that JAMES MONROE, of Virginia, is duly elected President of the United States, for four years, to commence on the fourth day of March, 1821; and that DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, of New York, is duly elected Vice President of the United States, for the like term of four years, to commence on the said fourth day of March, 1821."

As the President concluded—

Mr. RANDOLPH addressed the Chair; but was required to take his seat.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

On motion by a member of the Senate, the Senate retired from the hall.

After they retired, and the House being called to order—

Mr. RANDOLPH, who had still retained the floor, was heard addressing the Chair. He spoke for some time, without being distinctly heard, owing to the confusion in the hall. He had, he said, seen every election of President of the United States, except that of the present Chief Magistrate, and he had never before heard any other form of proclamation than that such was the whole number of votes given in; that such a person, A or B, had so many, and was therefore elected President or Vice President of the United States. On this occasion no such announcement had been made, and the presiding officer might just as well have said that James Claxton or Thomas Dunn was elected President of the United States. Were gentlemen to be put down by clamor and by force here for getting up to assert, not only their rights, but the rights of the whole people of the United States? Sir, said he, your election is vitiated; you have flinched from the question; you have attempted to evade the decision of that which was essential to the determination of who is and who is not elected Chief Magistrate of the United States. Mr. R. concluded his remarks by moving resolutions declaring the election to be illegal, &c. They were as follows:

1. Resolved, That the electoral votes of the State of Missouri have this day been counted, and do constitute a part of the majority of two hundred and thirty-one votes given for President, and of two hundred and eighteen votes given for Vice President.

2. Resolved, That the whole number of Electors appointed, and of votes given for President and Vice President, has not been announced by the presiding officer of the Senate and House of Representatives, agreeably to the provision of the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the proceeding has been irregular and illegal.

Whilst Mr. R. was reducing his motion to writing, several gentlemen claimed the floor.

The SPEAKER determined that Mr. LATHROP was entitled to it; and Mr. L. moved to adjourn.

Mr. FLOYD claimed the right of the floor, as rising first, and demanded to be heard.

The SPEAKER affirmed Mr. LATHROP's right.

Mr. FLOYD was about appealing from the decision of the Chair, but did not.

Mr. RINGGOLD having demanded the yeas and nays on the question of adjournment, the question was taken accordingly, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Anderson, Baker, Bateman, Beecher, Boden, Buffum, Cannon, Case, Clagett, Clark, Clay, Cook, Crafts, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Dennison, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Folger, Foot, Forrest, Fuller, Gorham, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hardin, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Hostetter, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Livermore, Maclay, McCoy, McCullough, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, Meigs, Monnell, R. Moore, S. Moore, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Nelson of Massachusetts, Parker of Massachusetts, Patterson, Phelps, Philson, Pitcher, Plumer, Rankin, Richards, Richmond, Robertson, Rogers, Ross, Russ, Sergeant, Silsbee, Sloan, Stevens, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tracy, Udree, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Wendover, Whitman, and Wood—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Barbours, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Campbell, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Culbreth, Davidson, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Garnett, Gray, Hall of North Carolina, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Little, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Mercer, Metcalf, T. L. THURSDAY, February 15.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to abolish certain ports of entry; to establish ports of delivery, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for the year 1821; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the purchasers of public lands prior to the first day of July, 1820," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill regulating the payment of debts due from the purchasers of public lands.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, waived for the present his intention to make a motion on the Missouri subject, according to his notice of yesterday, partly because he had little hope of success in the motion, and partly because it was probable some motion might be made more palatable to the House.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, submitted the following motion, accompanying it with some remarks in support of it:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever, on the first Monday in December next: Provided, That, previous to the said first Monday in December next, Missouri shall have expunged from her constitution the following clause, to wit: "It shall be the duty of the Legislature, as soon as may be, to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to or settling in this State, under any pretext whatever." And that on said day, certified copies of said constitution, so amended, shall be delivered to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

The Slave Trade.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

On the question to proceed to the consideration of this resolution, it was decided in the affirmative, by a vote of 60 to 46.

Mr. CLARK, not desiring the resolution to be acted on to-day, moved to lay it on the table; and the motion was agreed to—ayes 73.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Colonel Decius Wadsworth, of the Ordnance department, explanatory of the circumstances attending the loans of powder, lead, &c., belonging to the United States, to private individuals, and which have been made the subject of inquiry in this House, as, also, containing a defence of his conduct in those transactions; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of War:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 12, 1821.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, directing "that the Secretary of War report to that House the progress which has been made by the Board of Engineers in determining the sites and places of fortifications of the coast of the United States; the sites which may have been selected; the estimates of the expense in completing the several works; the number of troops necessary to garrison them in peace and in war; the progress made in erecting the fortifications; the advantages resulting from the system, when completed, particularly in reducing the expense of defending the Atlantic frontier," I have the honor to enclose a report of the Board of Engineers, marked A, and a report of the Engineer department, marked B, which give the information required by the resolution.

It may be proper to observe, that the projected fortifications have been distributed into three classes, according to their relative importance, and that it is determined to erect those of the 1st class previous to the commencement of the 2d and 3d classes, with the exception of the works at Mobile Point and Dauphine Island. These works were commenced in preference to those projected at Bayou Bienvenue and Fort St. Philip; for, although the latter are placed in the first class, it was not, however, deemed proper to commence with them, as they were much less extensive than the two former, and could be completed in a short time, should the state of our relations with other Powers render it necessary.

The contractors for the works at Regolets were, by the arrangements with them, to have erected those contemplated at Chef Monteur, but so many impediments have been encountered that it has been necessary for them to confine their operations wholly to the former.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

HON. J. W. TAYLOR,
Speaker House of Representatives.

The letter and accompanying documents were ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER then announced the unfinished business of yesterday, being Mr. RANDOLPH's resolutions respecting the legality of the Electoral votes. And on the question, will the House now proceed to the consideration of these resolutions? it was decided in the negative, by a majority of about 30 votes.

BOUNTY TO FISHING VESSELS.

The House then, on motion of Mr. McLEAN, proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him some time ago, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the bounties and allowances paid to fishing vessels each year, from the commencement of the Government to the present time.

Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the same by adding thereto the following:

"And of the quantity of salt imported annually, and not re-exported with benefit of drawback; also the amount of duty annually collected on the same during the period aforesaid."

This motion to amend was negatived by a small majority.

Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, then moved to amend Mr. McLEAN's motion by adding thereto the following:

"And of the quantity of salt annually imported into each State and not re-exported with benefit of drawback; also, the amount of duty annually collected on the same in each State during the time aforesaid."

This amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the bounties and allowances paid to fishing vessels in each year, from the commencement of the Government to the present time; and of the quantity of salt annually imported into each State, and not re-exported with benefit of drawback; also, the amount of duty annually collected on the same, in each State, during the time aforesaid.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. MEIGS, of New York, rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to certain resolutions which he had the honor of submitting to its consideration at the last session of Congress. These resolutions related to the subject of slavery. He had, he said, somewhat modified the resolutions offered at the last session, and would now read them to the House before he proceeded further to explain his views in relation to them. He was aware that, on the first mention of this subject, unpleasant feelings might be excited in one part of the House, but he trusted, on examination of the proposed plan, it would appear less objectionable than was believed; and he ardently hoped, indeed, that ultimately it might be found the means of closing forever, by one of the most glorious acts of legislation that ever proceeded from any legislative body, the growing controversy between the North and South, acknowledged on all hands to be of a most serious and alarming nature. [Mr. M. read his resolutions, as below.] When, he said, it was considered that, in the certain increase of our population, doubling in twenty-five years, we should see, in half a century, not less than forty millions of people in the United States, of which perhaps twenty would be inhabitants of the vast countries beyond the Mississippi, we cannot fail to admit that the five hundred millions of acres, contemplated to be devoted as a fund for the emancipation of slaves, will have had a value more than competent to the redemption and colonization of all such of our slave population as it shall be found expedient or desirable to part with. Let me endeavor, said he, to show in a few words the practical operation of this fund. Suppose the lands, intended to constitute this fund, to be surveyed into the usual sections and quarter sections, and numbered; that the alternate numbered portions be sold for certificates of the value of slaves; that the intermediate portions be disposed of only for cash; that the certificates of value of slaves be furnished in the following manner: whenever the owner of slaves is willing to part with them, let him make application to the district judge of the district, who, with the marshal of the district, shall, together with the owner and some discreet person appointed on his part, ascertain the value of the slaves proposed to be emancipated; that, when such valuation is made, it shall be at the option of the owner finally to accede to it; that, on his consent, the district judge shall deliver to him a certificate of such valuation, which shall be receivable only in payment for the alternate sections of which I have spoken. Then, will it not be apparent, that, if such alternate sections are purchased with such certificates, the intermediate portions will acquire a value which will command sufficient sums of money to defray the expenses of colonization? Will not this operation proceed pari passu? Mr. M. said he had witnessed, with constant anxiety, the progress of the great controversy which now agitates us, and had, from the beginning of his career, as a member of this House, determined, if it should become necessary, to devote himself a sacrifice for the great object, if possible, of keeping the two great parties in peace. I do not know, said he, whether I have made such a sacrifice. It is probable I have, by the well known course which I have pursued upon this subject. But, sir, if indeed I have lost the confidence of those whom I represent, I will, before I leave my present station, at least make one effort for the purpose of uniting the parties by the only measure which appears to me to be calculated to unite them; one, too, in which both may participate, and in which they will, as I repeat, perform one of the most noble acts of legislation; one which I would not exchange for all the laws on our statute book from 1789 to this day. I have even indulged what may be considered an extremely romantic opinion, that the original plan of Las Casas, of preventing the destruction of the Indian race by supplying their place with the hardy natives of Africa, may yet terminate in restoring to Africa, from the pressure of the great necessity which we feel on the subject, her long estranged children, with the first principles of the Christian religion and of education, so that Africa, long benighted, may assume a respectable rank among the people of the world. Mr. M. then submitted the following resolution:

Whereas slavery in the United States is an evil acknowledged to be of great and increasing magnitude, and which merits the greatest efforts of this nation to remedy; therefore,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of devoting five hundred millions acres of public lands next west of the Mississippi as a fund for the purpose of, in the first place, employing a naval force, competent to the annihilation of the slave trade. Secondly, the gradual emancipation of slaves, by a voluntary exchange of the lands for them; and, lastly, colonizing such emancipated slaves in such way as may be conducive to their happiness in their original country, Africa: Provided, That no such exchange of lands for slaves shall ever be suffered or allowed, except upon the perfectly ascertained consent of such slaves, to be colonized in Africa: And provided also, That, wherever such exchanges are, or shall be made, no separation of husband and wife, or parent and child, shall be permitted contrary to their well ascertained consent.

The question on proceeding to consider the resolution was decided in the affirmative—63 to 50 votes.

Mr. FLOYD said, he did not much approve of this plan himself, but, if it was to be adopted, he wished to make it as perfect as he could. He therefore moved, as an amendment, to come in immediately before the proviso, the following: "or distributed in equal proportions among the Congressional districts of the different States, beginning with the State of Maine, and so in regular order southward."

Mr. CLARK, of New York, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MEIGS expressed his regret that the gentleman should have thought proper to offer this amendment, which had the air of treating his proposition with contempt. There was reason why a different treatment should have been extended to him; and he had hopes that the gentleman, to oblige him, would withdraw his proposed amendment.

Mr. FLOYD said, that the gentleman from New York was one of the last whom he should have thought of treating disrespectfully. To oblige him, he would withdraw his amendment. At the same time he thought it a good one, and that some such must necessarily be a part of any plan of the kind.

The question on laying the resolution on the table was decided in the affirmative—66 to 55.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

On the motion of Mr. COCKE, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to equalize the pay of officers of the Army.

Mr. COCKE explained to the House, much in detail, the amount of emoluments now received by the officers of the Army, &c.

The consideration of this bill, and the questions on filling the blanks with the various sums proposed, involving a discussion of the amount of compensation proper for the different grades, positively and relatively, occupied the Committee until the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, remarked, that he had hoped some member of the committee which reported the bill would have given the answer to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BUTLER) who moved to strike out the first section, with the avowed design of destroying the bill, and had expressed his full belief that no saving of money would be effected by its passage; and had also demanded of any member to point out a single instance in which even a cent would be saved by the passage of the bill. But, said Mr. F., as the gentleman who reported the bill is not in his seat, I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman, who has made the appeal to any member, to one good effect which will result from the passage of this bill; and I presume the gentleman will be satisfied that a very considerable reduction in the expenditures in the Treasury Department will be made by its passage.

H. OF R.

Pay of Army Officers.

The gentleman, on a moment's reflection, must see that the saving will not be confined to the emoluments of the officers of the regular army. For the precise amount in this particular, I will refer him to the committee, who will undoubtedly be both able and willing to give the gentleman full information. But, sir, it requires no proof to convince any one, who will for one moment turn his attention to the list of clerks in the Treasury Department, whose whole employment is to examine the accounts for rations, forage, officers' quarters, fuel, servants' hire, clothing for servants, transportation of baggage, &c.; that the labors of these clerks will not be required, and, of course, their further services may well be dispensed with, if the bill shall pass; and, let me inform the gentleman, that more than one half of the present emoluments of the officers arises from the allowances for rations, forage, &c.; and, under the present system, employs the labor of at least one-fifth of the whole number of clerks, who are engaged in the settlement of the accounts of the officers.

In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) I need only call his attention to the remaining sections of the bill, to furnish a complete and satisfactory answer to all his arguments in favor of striking out the first section. If the gentleman will consent to leave the first section in the bill, he may rest assured the remaining sections will obviate every objection which he has raised against the first section, and against the bill itself.

My friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) has challenged one good and substantial reason why salaries which have been established by law should be altered. Sir, I will endeavor to give him at least one good and substantial reason, and one which I think will satisfy him. If the salary of any officer, although it may have been fixed by law, is found inadequate to the support of the officer, or so low that a competent officer will not accept the office, I presume he would agree with me that it ought to be increased. But, sir, I have one reason to offer in favor of the reduction of the present salaries of the officers of the Government—they have within a few years been greatly increased. The Legislatures of almost every State in this Union have reduced the salaries of their own officers; this is an expression of the voice of the people, which cannot be misunderstood. I ask the gentleman to look at the proceedings of the Legislature of Pennsylvania! the voice of the people has been fully expressed, and it must, and will be respected.

But, sir, I have other reasons for voting against the proposition to strike out the first section of this bill. Equal justice is not done to the officers under the present system. Officers of the same rank, and performing the same duties, do not receive equal compensation for the same services. The monthly pay of your officers, which is fixed by law, forms but a small part of the emoluments; other charges and allowances depend upon the statements of the officers themselves, and it is by no means certain that the most honest receive the greatest emoluments.

It is important that the compensation be fixed and known to prevent imposition and frauds. The returns, which have been made to this House during the present session, of the amount of compensation to different officers, vary very much in amount. By recurring to the printed documents, it appears that the estimated compensation to a Major General varies, or rather vibrates, from five to seven thousand dollars, while the amount of pay fixed by law is but two thousand dollars per month, making $2,400 per annum.

Sir, the people have a right to know the amount which they pay for services. This House surely ought to know it. Pass this bill; give to each a fixed salary, and you will know the precise amount. But, under the present system, I do not hesitate to say, no member of this House does know, or can know the amount which has been, or will be, paid to the officers of your army.

The Committee on Military Affairs are certainly entitled to the thanks of this House, and of the nation, for their patient and laborious investigation. And it will not be claimed that the bill does not provide liberal salaries for most of the officers in the army; but, sir, I beg leave to inquire for some reason why the salary of the Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, who is the President of the Military Academy at West Point, should not be entitled to the same salary as officers in the army of the same rank? By your laws, his rank is that of a Lieutenant Colonel; and, while the bill fixes the salary of Lieutenant Colonels at $1,600 per annum, the salary which is proposed by this bill is only $1,000.

One of the members of the committee had stated that the salaries of the professors in that institution have been regulated by those of other literary institutions. But, sir, I cannot be satisfied with the salary of $1,000 for the gentleman who presides over that institution, holding the rank which the law gives him, while officers of the same grade in the army receive $1,600; and I hope the House will not concur with the Committee in filling the blank with $1,000, but will allow to this officer a salary of 1,500, according to his rank.

No gentleman will contend that his services are less arduous, or less useful, or that less talents are indispensably necessary to fill this office, than of a Lieutenant Colonel in the army. Besides, gentlemen ought to recollect that this officer was selected, by Mr. Jefferson, (then President,) on account of his superior qualifications, at the time of the first institution of this school of military science, as the first President of the Academy; and, in addition to this, that he left an office with a salary of $2,000 per annum, at the particular and urgent solicitation of that enlightened statesman. And I appeal to the Committee, whether it would be just and reasonable to make the reduction of the salary of this officer, as proposed by the bill? Can the gentleman point out a single instance in which the president of a literary institution does not receive a greater salary than the other instructors? If you refer to your laws, you there find the other professors holding the rank of Majors, and of course receiving a less salary than this officer, who holds the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. I presume it is not designed to degrade this officer from his present rank, and I hope the House will be disposed not to reduce his pay below his rank.

Having got through the bill, the Committee rose, and reported it to the House with amendments; and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 16.

In calling over the States for the reception of petitions, when petitions were called for from Tennessee—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, rose and said that, from the commencement of the session, he had discovered that the presiding officer of the House had, in his call for petitions from the States, uniformly called for petitions from "the delegate from Missouri;" when, in his opinion, there was no such personage in this House, and therefore moved a discontinuance of such call.

Mr. SPEAKER declared such motion out of order at this time, and Mr. JONES reluctantly gave way, apparently with an intention to renew the proposition when it should be in order.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to authorize the building of lighthouses on Cross and Pond Islands, in the harbor of Boothbay, and at the mouth of Oswego river, and placing buoys on the Shoals of Nantucket and Vineyard Sound, near the harbor of Wickford, and on the Altamaha river, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for the year 1821.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of the legal representatives of Colonel John Girault, deceased, accompanied with a bill for their relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A Message, received yesterday from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, was read, transmitting to the House the following letter from the Director of the Mint:

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES.

January 1, 1821.

SIR: I have now the honor of laying before you a report of the operations of the Mint for the last year. From the statement of the Treasurer, herewith transmitted, it will appear that, during this period, there have been struck at the Mint—

In gold coins, 263,806 pieces, amounting to $1-319,030 00.

In silver coins, 1,821,153 pieces, amounting to $501,680 70.

And in copper coins, 4,407,550 pieces, amounting to $44,075 50.

Making, in the whole, six millions four hundred and ninety-two thousand five hundred and nine pieces; amounting to $1,864,786 25.

The above coinage of gold and silver has, in fact, been the work of no more than nine months; for, from the deficiency of deposits, the actual coinage did not commence till the beginning of April, and was even afterwards frequently interrupted, from the same cause. The press employed in the copper coinage did not continue in operation more than six months, as the quantity of copper coins had accumulated far beyond the public demand.

From the above statement, with other well ascertained data, it may, I presume, be confidently affirmed, that the Mint, in its present improved state, will be found fully adequate to all the purposes for which it was originally established.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. PATTERSON.

JAMES MONROE, President of the U. S.

The Message was ordered to lie on the table.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole to the bill to fix and equalize the pay of the officers of the Army of the United States; and the said amendments being read, were in part concurred in, and in part disagreed to by the House.

Mr. CANNON moved further to amend the bill, by striking out these words, being the latter clause of the 4th section: "to a cadet, one hundred and forty-four dollars per annum, and two rations per day." And, also, to insert in the bill a new section, as the fifth, to wit:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all laws or parts of laws, allowing pay and rations to the cadets of the Military Academy, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, from and after the 1st day of May next, and that from and after the period aforesaid the cadets are released from any obligation they may be under to remain at said Academy, or in the service of the United States.

And the question being taken to agree to the said amendment, it was determined in the negative—yeas 27, nays 116, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Tennessee, Baker, Ball, Blackledge, Bryan, Cannon, Cocke, Earle, Gray, Gross of New York, Hooks, Hostetter, Johnson, Kendall, McCreary, Metcalf, Patterson, Philson, Rhea, Ross, Sawyer, Strong of Vermont, Tarr, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker, and Wallace.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Beecher, Bloomfield, Boden, Brevard, Brush, Buffum, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Case, Clagett, Clark, Cobb, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Edwards

Moore, S. Moore, T. L. Moore, Morton, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parker, of Massachusetts, Parker of Virginia, Phelps, Pinckney, Pitcher, Plumer, Rankin, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Ringgold, Robertson, Rogers, Russ, Sergeant, Shaw, Silsbee, Simkins, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of North Carolina, Stevens, Street, Strong of New York, Swearingen, Tomlinson, Tracy, Tyler, Udree, Van Rensselaer, Warfield, Wendover, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wood.

Mr. FOOT moved further to amend the bill by adding to the 4th section thereof the following proviso :

Provided, That no appointment of cadets in said Academy shall be made until the number shall be reduced to one hundred : and from and after that period the number of cadets in the Military Academy at West Point shall not exceed one hundred : And provided further, That each cadet shall be liable to serve in the Army, at least five years, unless dismissed the service for misconduct.

And the question being taken to agree to the said proviso, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to amend the bill by inserting therein the following section, as the fifth :

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the number of cadets in the Military Academy shall not, after the first day of May next, exceed one hundred ; and that the supernumerary cadets shall be discharged from service, in such manner as the Secretary of War shall determine.

And the question being taken thereon, it was also determined in the negative.

Mr. CANNON then moved to amend the bill by inserting therein the following section, as the fifth, viz :

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no cadet now in said institution, or hereafter admitted, shall be entitled to the pay and rations allowed by law, unless it shall be made appear, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, that the parents of the cadet are unable to pay for his support while there.

And the question being taken thereon, it was also determined in the negative.

The bill being further amended, Mr. CANNON moved to amend the fourth section thereof by striking out the word two, contained in the twelfth line of that section, and, in lieu thereof, inserting the word one, so as to reduce the cadets to one ration per day each ; which motion being negatived—

Mr. JOHNSON said he would propose to strike out that part of the bill which related to the salaries of the officers of the army. His reasons for doing so he would state in as concise a manner as he could. He said he had voted for the reduction of the army with a view to retrenchment and economy, and that, from a view to the same principles, he was induced to make the present motion. Two objects only, he said, had been suggested for the introduction of this bill : one was to prevent impositions upon the Government, in the commutation of rations, quarters, forage, &c., the other was to save the expense of some twelve or fifteen or more clerks that were engaged in keeping these commutation accounts ; that he did not conceive that that part of the bill was calculated to produce any saving to the Government, but would, in his opinion, tend to increase rather than diminish the expense. That he had been led to believe that some system of the kind proposed was necessary to prevent future abuses, and would cut off much expense to the Government ; that he had therefore been favorable to any plan which would effect a beneficial change. That since the subject had been agitated, he had examined into it, and had endeavored to understand it : that his investigations and reflections had induced him to believe that the provisions of this bill would produce a very different result from what the movers of it intended : that the accounts for the commutations of rations, quarters, forage, &c., had been furnished by the War Department, item by item, which every member of the House had seen : that he had examined them, and found no such contemplated impositions. He said that whatever may have happened in former times, he felt well satisfied that, from the clear manner in which these accounts were now kept, and from the strict accountability which was diffused throughout the whole of that department, impositions of that kind could now rarely happen without detection, and detection would produce discharge from office : that as to the saving of clerks, that part of the subject was left where it was before ; for by this bill, said he, you will allow transportation extra, and you will also allow the officers to have rations at the contract price, to be deducted from their wages : so that here are the same sort of accounts still to be kept, for the purpose of deduction instead of addition, which neither adds to nor diminishes the labor ; so that the second object proposed to be attained, the saving of the expense of clerks, is also defeated.

There is, said he, another objection to the proposed change, that, however well it might look on paper, or sound in theory, it would operate most unequally and unjustly among officers of the same grade. For, example, said he, the pay of a colonel is 900 dollars per annum ; his rations, if commuted for money, would amount to 438 dollars, making a total of 1,338 dollars for pay and rations. This bill proposes to give each colonel $1,800 per year, in lieu of the present pay and rations, &c., except transportation, which is still allowed.

This addition of near five hundred dollars was, he presumed, intended in lieu of forage, quarters, &c. Great portion of our army, said he, are quartered on the frontier, where quarters are furnished by the Government, and forage and fuel by the soldiers, and does not now cost the Government a cent. Is there any reason, then, for this additional

Death of William A. Burwell.

pay to them? Certainly not. The same grade of officers stationed in the interior and seaport towns, have necessarily to purchase their forage, fuel, &c., and the additional sum proposed may not be more than will meet what they may necessarily expend on those articles. The same argument will apply to, and the same results, said he, are applicable to, every other grade of officers in the army. The same rule is fixed for all.

Mr. J. said, for his part, he could see neither justice to the officers nor saving to the Government from the plan proposed by the sections he wished stricken out. Besides, you propose to pay each officer the same, whether he is on furlough or in actual service. By the present regulations of the War Department, no officer on furlough is entitled to either forage, fuel, transportation, or quarters. Nor does he receive them either in kind or in money, nor as many rations. Yet you give all by this bill, in service or on furlough.

Mr. JOHNSON said, that the gentleman who had reported this bill, (Mr. COCKE,) he understood to say, that the additional allowances made to the different officers was barely sufficient for the perquisites thus commuted. If, he said, it was barely sufficient for the officers on the outposts, they are not, then, sufficient for those stationed in the interior and at seaports. But, if sufficient for those in the interior and seaports, where every thing is to be purchased at the dearest rate, it is then more than sufficient for those stationed at the outposts, where these things are purchased by the soldiers and the Government without charge, and therefore operates unequally and unjustly upon the officers of the Army, and against the Government. He said he believed the old way the best, to pay for so much as is necessary, and where necessary, and not pay for it, whether necessary or not. He further said, that no officer now was allowed for forage, fuel, nor any thing else, unless necessary, and was actually used; for such, he repeated, was the accuracy and strictness with which that department was now administered, that no improper or unnecessary charge was now allowed or paid, and, if attempted, would not escape the animadversion of the head of the department.

Mr. J. said he had another objection to this part of the bill: that it was a novel attempt to convert the military into a civil department. The history of no country furnished an instance of the kind; that gentlemen would acknowledge—it would not answer for a state of war. So far as he had understood, there was no complaint as to the salaries of the officers. He believed the pay to officers was the same now as in the Revolution. But if the pay of the officers is too high, he would go with gentlemen to reduce the wages, to reduce the rations, to reduce the forage, the quarters, and every other perquisite. He could not view the present proposition as effecting any reduction; and from every view he had been able to give the subject, he saw no purpose to be answered by that part of the bill, unless it were to increase expense, to produce inequality in the pay of officers of the same grade, and to convert the military into a civil establishment. He was the advocate of economy, but not that sort of economy proposed by this bill; an economy enhancing expenditure, and destroying the system it proposed to regulate.

Mr. J. said, that the residue of the bill he was in favor of, because it tended to lessen the expense of the Military Academy, which was in fact stationary, and a civil establishment, intended to produce materials only for war, not to move in war itself; and in relation to which no difficulty existed in commuting all perquisites.

Mr. J. said, in conclusion, that, from every consideration he had given the subject, he was of opinion that the present plan of payment, under the present arrangement and management of the department, was to be greatly preferred, in its economy to the Government, in its equality and justice to the officers, and as more consistent with the nature of military operations, to the one proposed by the part of the bill he then moved to strike out.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, the bill was then ordered to lie on the table.

DEATH OF WILLIAM A. BURWELL.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, then announced the death of WILLIAM A. BURWELL, a member of this House from that State: Whereupon,

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of WILLIAM A. BURWELL, deceased, late a Representative from the State of Virginia.

Mr. NELSON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. NEWTON, Mr. MCCOY, Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. TYLER, and Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, were appointed the said committee.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of William A. Burwell, late one of their body, by wearing crape on the left arm for the remainder of the session.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members will attend the funeral of the late William A. Burwell, to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify them of the death of WILLIAM A. BURWELL, late a member of this House, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Mr. NELSON informed the House that it was the wish of the deceased to be interred in the city of Baltimore, and the attendance of the members on the funeral would not be required beyond the lines of the city.

And the House adjourned to 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

SATURDAY, February 17.

The House met, and, together with the Senate, attended the funeral of the late WILLIAM A. BURWELL, in the manner recommended by the Committee of Arrangements appointed for that purpose; and, having returned to their Chamber, on motion—

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, February 19.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of Pennsylvania, enclosing the returns of the election of persons to represent that State in this House during the Seventeenth Congress; which letter and returns were ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the precise amount of the special deposits to the credit of the Treasury of the United States, rendered in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 16th of January last; which letter and statement were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to prevent abuses in public contracts; which was read twice and ordered to lie on the table. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passage of this act, no clerk in any department, or other person holding an office under the Government of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person in trust for him or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in the whole or in part, any contract or agreement hereafter to be made or entered into with any officer of the United States, on their behalf, or with any person authorized to make contracts on the part of the United States; and if any clerk or person holding an office under the Government of the United States, directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, enter into, accept of, or agree for, undertake, or execute, any such contract or agreement, on the whole or in part, every such clerk or officer so offending shall, for every like offence, upon conviction thereof before any court of the United States, or of the territories thereof, having cognizance of such offence, be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined one thousand dollars, and also be deemed incapable of holding any appointment or office under the Government of the United States; and every such contract or agreement, as aforesaid, shall moreover be absolutely void and of no effect: Provided, nevertheless, That in all cases where any sum or sums of money shall have been advanced on the part of the United States, in consideration of any such contract or agreement, the same shall be forthwith repaid; and, in case of delay or refusal to pay the same, when demanded by the proper officer of the department under whose authority such contract or agreement shall have been made or entered into, every such person so delaying or refusing, together with his surety or sureties, shall be forthwith prosecuted at law for the recovery of any such sum or sums of money advanced as aforesaid.

Mr. BALDWIN submitted to the House an amendment which he intends to propose to the bill to regulate the duties on imports and for other purposes, when the same shall come under the consideration of the House; which amendment was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee appointed to present to the President of the United States the resolution adopted by this House on the 10th instant, in relation to the contest now carrying on between Spain and her South American colonies, reported—

That the committee had according to order presented the resolution to the President; that the President assured the committee that, in common with the people of the United States and the House of Representatives, he felt great interest in the success of the provinces of Spanish America which are struggling to establish their freedom and independence; and that he would take the resolution into deliberate consideration, with the most perfect respect for the distinguished body from which it had emanated.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the reimbursement to the Planters' Bank of New Orleans, of certain advances made by it upon pay rolls of the Army.

Mr. CLAY accompanied the above resolution with sundry documents in support of the claim of the said bank; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to fix and equalize the pay of the officers in the Army of the United States; when—

Mr. CASE moved further to amend the said bill, by striking out the fourth section thereof, and inserting the following sections in its stead, viz:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there be paid to the Superintendent of the Military Academy, one thousand eight hundred dollars per annum; to the professor of natural and experimental philosophy, one thousand six hundred dollars; to his assistant, nine hundred and fifty dollars; to the professor of mathematics, one thousand six hundred dollars; to his assistant, nine hundred and fifty dollars; to the professor of engineering and military tactics, one thousand six hundred dollars; to his assistant, nine hundred and fifty dollars; to the chaplain and professor of geography, history, and ethics, one thousand six hundred dollars; to the teacher of the French language, nine hundred and fifty dollars; to the teacher of drawing, nine hundred and fifty dollars; to the master of the sword, five hundred dollars; to each cadet, one hundred and forty-four dollars and two rations; Provided, always, That whenever the place of residence of a cadet shall be at a greater distance than one hundred miles from said Academy, he shall be allowed at the rate of twelve cents and a half per mile for his travelling expenses in going to, and returning from, said Academy; first deducting from the distance travelled one hundred miles, and allowing for no more than once going and returning.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no more cadets shall be admitted in said Academy until the number shall be reduced by the annual graduation to one hundred and ninety, and that after that period no greater number of cadets shall be educated at the same time in said Academy.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That in selecting the cadets for said Academy, one shall be taken from each Congressional district, one from the District of Columbia and one from each territory, provided that application be made to the Secretary of War from the respective districts before the time for filling the vacancies has arrived; and in case there should be no application from any one or more districts, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of War to select a cadet or cadets from the other districts from which applications for admission in said Academy have been made, until the whole number of cadets shall amount to one hundred and ninety.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That other persons than cadets, of a suitable age, (not exceeding in number one hundred,) who may be desirous of being instructed in said Academy, shall be permitted so to be, on making application to the Secretary of War for that purpose: Provided, That they conform in all things to the rules and regulations of said institution, and submit to the discipline of said Academy, in all respects as if they were cadets, and support themselves at their own expense during the term of their education.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the superintendent and each of the professors of said Academy shall be permitted to reside, during the time he shall be employed as aforesaid, in said Academy, in such one of the public buildings as the Secretary of War may designate, rent free.

MR. CANNON moved to amend this amendment by striking out the rations, with the view of adding in lieu of them a certain sum to the annual allowance in money.

This motion was negatived; and the amendment of Mr. CASE, being supported by himself and opposed by Mr. COCKE, the question was taken on agreeing thereto, and decided in the negative.

MR. F. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, proposed the amendment to the bill indicated by him on Friday last, to strike out the whole of the bill except that part which relates to the Military Academy.

This motion was negatived without debate.

MR. CANNON, expressing his regret at having failed in his several motions to amend this bill, said he would make one other effort. He, therefore moved to amend the part relating to the pay of the cadets, so as to allow them ninety-six dollars per annum instead of one hundred and forty-four dollars, as proposed by the bill.

MR. CANNON said, he would not have brought this subject before the House by an amendment to the bill now under consideration, only for the circumstance that it could not be brought up in any other way during the present session. The committee to whom it had been referred had not yet made a report, and, when made, would not probably be in time to be finally acted on; and, in addition to this, the bill before the House contains provisions regulating the pay of the teachers, professors, and cadets, of this Academy; therefore, he thought this the most proper time, and the only opportunity that would be afforded, to try the sense of the House, which he wished to see expressed on the subject. He said, the amendment he had offered did not contemplate the discontinuance of this Academy, but, if adopted by the House, would lessen the public expenditure on it very much. The Academy, and the teachers and professors employed in it, would still be supported out of the Treasury of the United States, but the cadets would not receive the enormous pay and emoluments they had done heretofore. He thought the amendment he had offered went far enough, and, indeed, farther than he would go, was it entirely left to him, for he would not give one dollar out of the Treasury of the United States for its support, or that of any other institution conducted on the same principles. He had always thought that the principles of equality were amongst the best principles maintained in our Government. Equal liberty, equal rights, and equal privileges, should always be maintained to the utmost extent by the Congress of the United States; and when peculiar favor is shown, or peculiar privileges and emoluments granted, it ought to be done only on the ground of peculiar merit. But, sir, I ask this House to reflect and consider what we are doing by maintaining this establishment, and paying to the sons of rich men the amount of $372 per year, besides some other emoluments. This is the amount that has been heretofore allowed, in pay and rations, to 250 boys or young men that may have this peculiar favor bestowed on them by the President of the United States or Secretary of War, which amounts to nothing more or less than giving to these Departments of the Government not less than one hundred thousand dollars, (the amount expended on this institution heretofore, including the pay of teachers, professors, &c.,) to be distributed among their peculiar favorites, or their sons, or relatives. I am unwilling to continue this kind of patronage to the President of the United States and the Secretary of War, or to give it to any other person; and this is not all, sir: these cadets are generally the sons of your heads of Departments, members of Congress, Governors of States, officers of the Army and Navy, and other public characters; men of wealth and influence, on whom you are not only so lavishly bestowing the people's money, but are doing what is worse, if possible; you afterwards give commissions in your Army and Navy in preference to, and to the utter exclusion of, every other person in the United States, who is not so fortunate as to be made one of this privileged order, but who has been educated at the expense of his parents or the sweat of his own brow. No matter what their merits may be; no matter how much military science, or however well qualified, they are all excluded from being officers, to give place to these favorites; and if they enter your service at all, it must be as private soldiers, to be "hewers of wood and drawers of water," for these highly favored few. Is this, I ask you, sir, consistent with the plain principles of a Republican Government? I say it is not. Let your offices be left free and open to all who may wish to obtain them by fair and honorable competition, on the ground of superior merit alone. I object to the patronage that is afforded by this institution. I also object to this mode of bestowing favor where there is no merit; and teaching, at the public expense, persons, not only for the purpose of giving them commissions in the Army, but also leading them on to be your rulers and governors in the end. The circumstance of giving these cadets a preference to the commissions in the Army, he said, was calculated to put down all spirit of emulation to acquire military science in all the other literary institutions in the United States, as well as amongst the militia officers.

What encouragement, he asked, could any young man have, to acquire military science, who is not made one of this "privileged order?" Or what inducements are held out to the officers of the militia to improve in military science, so long as these highly favored cadets are to hold of right all the commissions of your Army? You keep out all others to give places to them. But, sir, withdraw your support from this aristocratic institution, and abandon this system of keeping up a privileged order in our country, and military science will, I have no doubt, soon become a part of the instruction at other academies and colleges in the United States. He said, if he was correctly informed, there was an institution now in existence in the State of Vermont, (he alluded to the school under the direction of Captain Partridge,) where every branch of military science was taught to the same perfection that it was at West Point, and he had no doubt that it would be sufficient to furnish the Army with plenty of officers, could they have a preference given them, without the expenditure of the public money to qualify them. I am in favor, said he, of military science, when taught on any general plan that will diffuse it among the great mass of the people, and I am opposed to this kind of science being confined to a few, as is the case, in regard to the course heretofore pursued. He denied the right of the House of Representatives to appropriate the people's money to any such partial purposes. I will admit, said he, that benefits are derived from this institution to all those who obtain so much of the favor of the Executive as to get their sons not only educated at the public expense, but receive large sums of money besides, as a bounty.

H. OF R.

Pay of Army Officers.

This benefit, I have no doubt, is generally bestowed on the rich; the poor never have nor never will obtain much of it; and he did not know that it added much to the science of the country in general; for those persons who had their sons educated at this academy, at the public expense, were generally able to give them an education at their own expense, and would do so if deprived of this privilege, which enabled them only to save the expense they would otherwise incur, and lay up something besides out of the pay given the cadets. This institution was first set on foot, said Mr. C., in the year 1802, when only ten cadets were allowed to be kept there; and this continued to be the whole number until the year 1812, (about the time the declaration of war took place,) when the number of the cadets was increased to two hundred and fifty, the present number allowed by law, with the pay of sixteen dollars per month, and two rations each; some other emoluments have been allowed, he believed, besides. Thus it has crept along, in the shade of executive and legislative patronage, about eighteen years, without any inquiries having been made respecting the amount of public money expended on it, or the people of the United States knowing much about the policy or principles it is calculated to promote. He believed he could venture to say that the people knew very little about this Military Academy; nor had they generally enjoyed much of its benefits, notwithstanding the vast amount of their money that has been expended to keep it up. He had no doubt but that the heads of the departments of the Government, the members of Congress, and their particular friends, had enjoyed a very large share of the benefits resulting from this mode of expending the public money. Establish a few more institutions of the same character, and what is the consequence? Why, sir, it must be to take the Government out of the hands of the people. And, if it is so important that you should educate officers for your regular Army at public expense, it is equally as important to educate persons at public expense to fill all the other departments of the Government; and, by the same rule, when you establish those institutions, you must exclude all who are not admitted to be educated there from a participation, or even a chance of obtaining those offices. Sir, I have said, on a former occasion, it was an aristocracy; and I repeat it to be one, of the rankest order, not only that ever existed in this Government, but that ever existed in any known Government on the face of the earth. I have repeatedly challenged the supporters of this institution to meet me on this point, and show its Republican features; but they have not as yet undertaken it, nor is it in their power to controvert the facts I have stated to the House.

Gentlemen misunderstand me when they suppose that I am opposed to the encouragement of military science. If they will only take the trouble to examine the provisions of a bill I have reported to the House, (by the direction of the committee on the subject of militia,) they will find I am in favor of diffusing military science throughout the whole United States, not only to extend it to every State and Territory, but equally to every brigade, regiment, and even to every captain's company. They will there see a plan proposed annually to teach and instruct 60,000 (being the whole number of the militia officers of the United States, of every grade) in all the duties necessary for a state of war; and that, too, on principles of republicanism, on principles consistent with, and congenial to, the free principles of our own Government. This was, he said, a great system, for it was calculated to diffuse military science throughout the whole United States, and to extend it equally to every militia officer. This system has been objected to, in conversation and out of doors, because it will cost too much; but if the House should, in the course of the session, indulge him so far as to take up the bill he had referred to, he would show, by arithmetical calculation, that this system to extend military science to the whole militia of the United States would cost less than $500,000 annually, a sum not much greater than was required to maintain, in the regular service, one regiment, and only five times the amount expended at this Military Academy; the sum he had stated he could show would be sufficient to encamp the whole militia officers of the United States one week, for instruction, in each year, and pay them their full pay, as though they were in service, also provide them with rations. His course was to retrench the expenses of this Military Academy, in order to enable us better to adopt the system he had alluded to.

Public Land Debt.

H. OF R.

But, Mr. Speaker, if we keep up a Military Academy at the public expense, for whose benefit should it be maintained? I say, sir, it ought to be for the benefit of the orphan of him who has fallen in defence of his country; but they have not enjoyed the benefit of this institution, nor ever can, until you change your laws on the subject. I hold the doctrine that there is an obligation on the part of the Government to support the widow and orphan of those who have fallen in its defence, until they are able to protect and support themselves; but what have you done for them? Why, sir, you have turned them off at the age of five years; they are driven from the door of your bounty, to starve or be supported and protected by their friends, or the society of their neighborhoods, to give place to these favorites—this privileged order, composed of the sons of the wealthy, who never fought in your defence. This is what we are doing; and I beg gentlemen to reflect, and look at the course they are pursuing. I am indeed glad that the orphans of those whose blood has been shed in defence of our liberty have been taken notice of by Congress; but let us see what it is we have done for the family of a poor soldier whose life has been sacrificed on the altar of our liberties, and has left in our charge a wife and nine helpless children. We have, it is true, allowed them half pay for five years, amounting, in the whole period, to $240: this is all you have done to support this whole family, of ten times in number, for five years, while you give a much larger sum to support the son of a rich man, who never shouldered a gun in the defence of his country, one year, as a cadet at this Military Academy. You have given each of the orphans I have alluded to only forty cents per month for support, while you give a cadet thirty-one dollars per month in pay and rations for his support.

You have given your orphans only four dollars and eighty cents each year.

And have given your cadets three hundred and seventy-two dollars each year.

You have given your orphans only twenty-four dollars each, in the whole five years.

And have given your cadets one thousand eight hundred and sixty dollars each in the same period, in pay and rations, besides other emoluments that are not taken into view in the above estimate.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you, and I ask every member of this House, if this looks as if we had been governed either by the principle of justice or equality. No, sir, we have abandoned them long since, and pay no regard to them whatever, for the purpose of creating and supporting this odious aristocracy. I have found great difficulty in even obtaining an inquiry respecting it, and I fear it will be still more difficult to put it down. I fear the anticipations of a very respectable and intelligent correspondent of mine will be realized, who, after speaking of the course I have heretofore pursued, and am now pursuing, in regard to this institution, in terms of approbation has said, "he feared all my exertions would be unavailing, because it gives patronage to all the members of Congress." Yes, sir, it is too true: it does give patronage to the members of this House and of the Senate, as well as the Executive and heads of Departments, for it is them, and their particular friends, who enjoy the whole benefits of this vast expenditure of the public money; nor do I believe they will unite with me in reducing the expenditure of the public money on it until forced to do so by their constituents, who will remain silent on this subject just so long as they are kept in ignorance. This has been the case heretofore, I have no doubt; but the people generally have known little or nothing about the principles on which it was conducted, nor the effect it is calculated to produce in our Government. But, sir, so far as it is in my power to give the people of the United States information, they shall have it, on this subject as well as on all others. It is their right to know the purposes to which you appropriate their money; and they ought to know and understand truly the principles on which we legislate. I deny that any public benefit whatever is derived from this Military Academy. Your Army would be as well filled with officers without it as it was with it—perhaps better—and with an equal portion of military science. Put down this aristocracy, this way of monopolizing the offices in the Army, and leave them free and accessible to all, on the ground of merit alone, and you will always find a sufficient number who will qualify themselves in order to obtain them. But, so long as you keep up this system of giving such bounty without regard to merit—this system of a kind of hereditary succession to offices from which all others are excluded, you suppress and discourage every possible motive in others to obtain the qualifications requisite to fill those offices. Such a course is calculated in the end to sap the very foundation of our liberties, and will not, I have no hesitation in saying, be supported by the people in any part of the United States, when they fairly examine and properly understand the effects that it is calculated to produce in our Government.

Mr. WARFIELD replied to Mr. CANNON, and, the question being taken on Mr. CANNON's motion, it was decided in the negative, 70 to 31.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

PUBLIC LAND DEBT.

On motion of Mr. CROWELL the several orders of the day were postponed, in order to take up the bill from the Senate for the relief of certain purchasers of public lands; and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill.

Some time was spent in Committee of the Whole on the bill, in the course of which Mr. CROWELL made some remarks in favor of the bill, Mr. McCoy, and Mr. ALLEN, of Tennessee, against it, and Mr. WOOD, rather in doubt on the subject than in opposition to the bill. Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. HENDRICKS, and Mr. COOK, suggested and supported the propriety of the Committee's rising and obtaining leave to sit again, it being obvious that the House had prematurely entered on the subject, and were not prepared to act upon it. [There were barely a hundred members in the House, many being absent, attending the argument on the great question this day argued in the Supreme Court.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Tennessee, observed, that he was in favor of the motion made by his honorable friend from Virginia, to strike out the second section of the bill before the Committee, and would be glad to see the first section go with it, being opposed to the principle entire.

Sir, said he, before I can agree to part with as much of the public revenue as is contemplated to be thrown away by this bill, I must be better satisfied that the objects upon whom it is to be bestowed deserve it. If the people learn that debts can be paid with petitions and fair stories, you will soon have your table crowded. The next application will be from those who have completed their payments, asking Congress to refund as much as will place them on an equality with those now to be relieved. Numbers have already forfeited, and thought themselves well out of a bad bargain at that; but, have they not a fair claim on having returned to them all that was paid, if you cancel the contract and prevent such an occurrence with others. Sir, if we begin the work either with a view of doing justice, or an act of beneficence, there is no point at which we can stop without greater cause of complaint. At this time the Government is under no obligation or promise, directly or indirectly, to meddle at all in this matter; but, advance one step in changing the contracts of these people, and, by a legislative interference, alter the relation between debtor and creditor, and you will have to go the whole length; nothing short of the land, in their own way, and at their own price, will suit them. We are told there is not money in the country to pay this enormous debt, and to attempt exacting it is requiring from the people who owe it impossibilities. Not so, Mr. Chairman. Let them alone, and the existing laws will set the matter right; in five years, the Government will either have the money or the land; and the situation of him who has had the worst of it—if you please, forfeited his claim to the land on which he has paid something—still his situation is preferable to that of all others who went in debt for property when every thing run high, and, as it were, was at a bubble price, which burst round him before pay day came. The purchaser of public land under existing laws is relieved from debt by forfeiting a bad bargain, losing only one-fourth, or the sum paid in advance, often in that way advantageously getting out of a bad bargain. But, between individuals, the last farthing must be paid, whatever may have been the loss upon the purchase; and in every part of the country you may find men that have purchased property that would not now sell for half the sum given for it. No relinquishment for them; no cancelling the contract, or compounding with creditors, as long as there is any thing found to make the money out of, although the money for which the debt was raised will not satisfy one-tenth part thereof under an execution. What has that class of debtors done to prevent their sharing in this benevolent act of grace? Have they no part in the common stock about to be distributed? We have the same right to relieve the one as the other; the difference is only between giving money out of the Treasury and permitting that to be withheld which ought to be there. I know of no class of men who have less claim upon the paternal indulgence or gracious favor of the Government than most of the purchasers of public land—I mean that portion most clamorous for relief, and the most to be benefited by this bill. They associated themselves in companies, with all the money the banks (with whom they were mostly connected) could lend, and at the auction sales put down all competition from actual settlers; the prudent man's home was bought over his head, at a price he could not give for it. It is now in the hands of one of these speculators, who has other lands adjoining. Will you pass a law that permits him to keep it by a relinquishment of other bad bargains, thus avoiding the payment of a price which deterred the occupant from buying? Certainly nothing is more unjust.

Such is the effect intended to be produced by the first section of this bill, going to make the Government insure a profit to him who bids highest, and a party with him, in fact, in a fraud practised on others by a show of price never intended to be paid. Could any scheme be invented more effectually to suit the purpose of those who were determined to have the choice that they have had, and, after selecting and buying all they wanted, and effectually trying the market, and finding what could be made out of the speculation, we must play to their hand, and secure to them all that is profitable, and relieve them from that which is not. I don't know who would not buy lands under these circumstances.

Sir, I am aware that these remarks do not apply to all the purchasers of public land, and that many actual settlers will find great difficulty in making payment; but they never would have thought of coming here with such a demand as this bill embraces had they not been encouraged by that knowing class which depends on management to get relieved, and out of the toils they had intended for others. I do not believe that many of the actual settlers on tracts purchased alone for cultivation are going to forfeit their lands, notwithstanding all we have heard said. They have carefully laid up every dollar that they have been able to lay their hands on since the purchase; the sum lacking they can procure at a trifling sacrifice, which they are content to make. The land forfeited will be by the speculator, whose only dependence was on making sales to meet the purchase money. If he has been disappointed, has he any right to call on the whole community to bear his loss? No; no more than they would have had to share his profit, had his expectations been realized. Let us not direct all our sympathy to one particular class of traders; others are looking on. The sufferers in the late war remember how coldly many of them have been treated here, who in their favor could plead that their loss grew out of acts of the Government over which they had no control. What will they say at this display of beneficence towards those who only have themselves to blame?

If sympathy and feeling are permitted to guide us in legislating for the Union, have the purchasers of the public land any right to the exclusive exercise of it? I think not; and, in making this demand, their friends have inconsiderately defeated an object, that might have been attained, by going too far, and asking too much; for, whatever might have been my course towards them in times of peculiar difficulty like the present, had their application been confined to an extension of time only, I have no hesitation in saying that what they now claim is unreasonable, and has put me on my guard against doing any thing that encourages demands that must lead to a total abolition of the whole debt. Before we begin this gracious act, would it not be well to inquire whose money it is we are bestowing away, and think of an old maxim, which teaches us to be just before we are generous?

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

REDUCTION OF SALARIES.

On motion of Mr. CULBRETH, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take into consideration the bill for a general reduction of the salaries of the officers of the Government.

The bill having been read—

Mr. CULBRETH stated that the Committee had been influenced by different considerations in agreeing to the report; but that, for himself, he had been influenced by the single consideration whether the salaries in the several cases embraced by the bill are or are not at present more than sufficient. Where he thought them no more than sufficient he had voted against their reduction, and for their reduction where he thought them otherwise.

The Committee then proceeded with the consideration of the details of the bill.

On motion of Mr. KINSEY, after a considerable debate on the merits of the Patent Office, its duties, &c., that part of the bill which proposes to reduce the salary of the Clerk of the Patent Office to five hundred dollars per annum, was stricken out.

On motion of Mr. LIVERMORE, the part of the bill which proposes to reduce the salary of the Superintendent of the Patent Office to one thousand dollars, was also stricken out.

A motion, by Mr. SERGEANT, was under consideration for excluding the Librarian's compensation from the proposed reduction; when the Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, and to lay it on the table; but the motion was negatived, 63 to 48.

TUESDAY, February 20.

Mr. KENT presented a memorial of Joseph Pearson, Thomas Law, and Daniel Carroll of Duddington, proprietors of a large amount of real property in the City of Washington, complaining of the conduct of the corporate authorities in the said city, and of the exorbitant amount of taxes levied and collected by them, and praying that further provisions may be enacted by Congress upon the subject of the imposition and collection of taxes in said city; which petition was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Nathaniel Carver, and others; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill further to amend the several acts relative to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments; which was twice read, and committed. [This bill proposes to abolish the agency of the Treasurer for the War and Navy Departments.]

Mr. FORREST presented a letter addressed to him by Lieutenant Colonel George Bomford, accompanied with sundry documents, in relation to the loans of gunpowder and other munitions of war, from the public magazines, to private individuals; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate for the relief of Samuel Tucker, late a captain in the Navy of the United States, with an amendment.

Mr. METCALF moved to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COBB moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely, which motion was negatived, by yeas and nays—79 to 66.

The amendment to the bill having been agreed to, the question was taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, as amended, and decided in the negative, by a majority of one vote. So the bill was rejected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to fix and equalize the pay of the officers of the Army of the United States," was read the third time; and on the question, Shall the said bill pass? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 39, as follows:

REDUCTION OF SALARIES.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were discharged from the further consideration of the bill to reduce the salaries and fix the maximum of the compensation of certain officers and other persons employed in the Civil Department of the Government.

Mr. CROWELL then moved that the bill lie on the table; which being negatived.

The House then proceeded to consider the bill: when, Mr. SILSBEE moved to amend the same by adding five hundred dollars per annum to the salary of each of the Commissioners of the Navy Board; which motion was negatived.

Mr. WOOD moved to strike out of the first section of the bill these words: to the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, one thousand five hundred dollars. Agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to insert, after the word dollars, in the 22d line of the first section of the printed bill these words: "To the Secretary of the Senate, three thousand dollars; to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, three thousand dollars." Negatived.

Mr. SILSBEE moved so to amend that part of the first section of the bill which relates to the salaries of the Naval Constructors, to read thus: "To the first Naval Constructor, two thousand three hundred dollars, and to each of the other Naval Constructors, two thousand dollars; which being negatived,

Mr. SERGEANT moved to strike out from the first section of the bill these words: "To the Librarian, one thousand dollars;" which motion was also negatived.

Mr. COCKE moved to amend the first section of the bill by adding five hundred dollars to the salary of the First Comptroller of the Treasury. Negatived.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, then moved to amend the bill by inserting after the word designated, in the fifth line of the second section of the printed bill these words: whose compensation exceeds eight hundred dollars per annum; so as to confine the reduction of twenty per cent., therein provided, to such salaries as exceed eight hundred dollars per annum.

Mr. WARFIELD moved to amend the amendment by striking out eight hundred dollars, and inserting one thousand two hundred dollars; which motion was negatived.

Mr. NELSON then modified his amendment, which was agreed to as follows: "Provided, nevertheless, that no salary now established by law at or under eight hundred dollars per annum shall be reduced: And provided, further, that no salary now established by law at a sum above eight hundred dollars per annum shall be reduced below that sum."

The bill was then further amended: when

Mr. CAMPBELL moved further to amend the same by inserting the following sections, to come in after the first sections thereof, viz:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That at every session of Congress, and every meeting of the Senate in the recess of Congress, each Senator shall be entitled to receive six dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate, and shall also be allowed six dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance by the most usual road from his place of residence to the seat of Congress; at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting; and in case any member of the Senate shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from such session or meeting, or after his arrival shall be unable to attend the Senate, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance; and the President of the Senate pro tempore, when the Vice President shall be absent, or when his office shall be vacant, shall, during the period of his services, receive, in addition to his compensation as a member of the Senate, six dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate: Provided, That no Senator shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of six dollars a day from the end of one such session or meeting, to the time of his taking a seat in another.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That at every session of Congress, each representative and delegate shall be entitled to receive six dollars for every day he shall attend the House of Representatives, and shall also be allowed six dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance by the most usual road from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, at the commencement and end of every such session; and in case any representative or delegate shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from the session of Congress, or after his arrival shall be unable to attend the House of Representatives, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his compensation as a representative, six dollars for every day he shall attend the House: Provided, always, That no representative or delegate shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of six dollars a day from the end of one session to the time of his taking his seat in another.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said compensation which shall be due to the members of the Senate shall be certified by the President thereof; and that which shall be due to the representatives and delegates shall be certified by the Speaker, and the same shall be passed as public accounts, and paid out of the public Treasury.

The said amendment was read; when
The House adjourned.

H. OF R.

WEDNESDAY, February 21.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;'" and a resolution proposing the appointment of a joint committee to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him of his re-election to that office, and have appointed a committee on their part; in which bill and resolution they ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made on the 8th instant, in the case of James Morrison, concerning his advances to Colonel Buford, together with the additional documents presented by him on the 19th instant, was recommitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to report thereon to the House of Representatives at the next session of Congress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating the information required by the resolution of the 15th instant, on the subject of bounties and allowances paid to fishing vessels, and the quantity of salt imported, and not re-exported with benefit of drawback, and amount of duties thereon; which letter and statement were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, amendatory of the charter of the Bank of the United States, was twice read and committed.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, reported the same without amendment; and, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the bill was ordered to lie on the table, with a view to being called up thereafter.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That where any State or States, having complied with the recommendation of Congress in the resolution of the 23d of September, 1789, shall have withdrawn, or shall hereafter withdraw, either in whole or in part, the use of their jails for prisoners committed under the authority of the United States, the marshal in such State or States, under the direction of the judge of the district, shall be, and hereby is authorized and required, to hire a convenient place to serve as a temporary jail, and to make the necessary provision, until provision shall be made by law for that purpose, and the said marshal be allowed his reasonable expenses incurred for the above purposes, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The resolution having been briefly explained by Mr. SERGEANT, to have become necessary by the recent proceedings of the State of Ohio, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without a division.

Mr. CLAY rose to give notice to the House, that he should on to-morrow make a motion, the ultimate object of which was the declaration of the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, who were instructed to inquire into the practicability of more effectually ventilating the Hall of the House of Representatives, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein submitted concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioner and the Architect of the Public Buildings be instructed to take measures more effectually to ventilate the Hall of the House of Representatives by the next session of Congress, either by tubes communicating with apertures in the body of the Hall, or in such other way as may, on further inquiry, be deemed more advisable.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, a committee was appointed, jointly with such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to inquire and report what subjects before the two Houses are proper to be acted on during the present session of Congress; and Messrs. STORRS, SERGEANT, and BARBOUR, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The resolution from the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of his re-election to the office of President of the United States, was read, and agreed to by the House; and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and EUSTIS, were appointed of the committee on the part of this House.

CAPTAIN TUCKER.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, the House agreed to reconsider the vote, whereby the bill granting a pension to Commodore Samuel Tucker was yesterday rejected.

The bill was amended, so as to reduce the proposed annuity to the rate of $20 per month; and, the question being put on ordering the bill, so amended, to be read a third time, it was decided by yeas and nays: For the third reading 70, against it 70, as follows:

The votes being equal, the SPEAKER voted in the affirmative. So the bill was passed, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

MISSOURI.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, submitted for consideration the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the 8th section of the act of Congress, approved March 6, 1820, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories;" said 8th section imposing a prohibition and restriction upon the introduction of slaves in all that territory ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of 36 degrees 30 minutes north latitude, not included in the State contemplated by that act.

On submitting the resolution, Mr. BROWN addressed the Chair as follows :

Mr. Speaker : I rise, with unfeigned reluctance, to present to the consideration of this honorable body the resolution which I hold in my hand, with a concise statement of the views upon which it is founded. Nothing short, sir, of an imperative sense of duty would have influenced me, at this late day of the session, to have consumed one moment of that time which has become so important to the interest of this nation. I have been imboldened to ask your attention, and that of the honorable body over which you preside, from a reflection that a few days more will close my Congressional labors, probably forever, and that, up to this period, I have been sparing of your time, and do not expect again, while I remain on the floor, to ask your indulgence.

Mr. Speaker, while taking leave of those with whom it has been my honor to be associated in the councils of the nation, I feel a pleasure which I cannot suppress, at the recollection that there has prevailed between myself and them entire personal respect, and as much harmony and friendship as has been at all possible, considering the embarrassing and distracting subject which has haunted us, by day and by night, from the beginning to the end of each session ; and I can say, with an approving conscience, that I have not malice or ill will against any. Sir, while indulging this pleasing train of reflection, an unpleasant occurrence of the last session intrudes itself upon my mind ; and I cannot fail to do what I consider an act of justice towards an honorable and venerable member from New Hampshire, (Mr. LIVERMORE,) the only person towards whom I have been betrayed into an illiberal expression. Designing to be ever prompt in the protection of my own feelings, I hope I shall always be inclined, when convinced of having unwarrantably assailed the feelings of another, to make reparation. The occasion has passed by ; the honorable member and myself are, and have been during this session, upon good terms ; but the injury, if it deserve the appellation, was a public one, from this seat ; and before I leave it, I will use it to do as ample justice. During the fermentation of the last session, under the influence of excitement from this miserable subject, in some remarks made by me to the House, I attributed to the gentleman what I then believed an attempt, with an unworthy view, to operate upon the minds of members. During the present session I have had an opportunity, and have used it, to become better acquainted with that honorable gentleman, and I have found him an useful, fair, and liberal member, and an agreeable associate ; and, had further evidence been wanting, a late occasion has afforded it. After the resolution for the admission of Missouri into the Union had been rejected by about three votes, it was believed by his friends that, if several members who were accidentally out of their seats had voted, Missouri would have been admitted. This gentleman, although opposed to them on the resolution, to afford an opportunity of a fair and full trial of strength, moved and obtained a reconsideration ; and, although the result did not justify our expectations, I accord most heartily to the gentleman the reward of my humble applause for his magnanimity ; and I am now free to say, that I did him injustice in the imputation of the last session.

Having closed, Mr. Speaker, my affairs with the House, I now proceed to prepare for a settlement of the account with my conscience and my constituents. Sir, this is the more necessary when I assure you that I came here upon their feelings of good will and indulgence, more than upon an exercise of their judgments ; and that, having thought it prudent to decline a re-election, they still bore evidence of a continuation of their kindness, by uttering some expressions of regret. I feel grateful for their favors, and my highest ambition, on leaving the disturbed theatre from which I retire, is to maintain their good opinions and wishes. I made them no vain promises of doing, or attempting to do, much ; but I did promise to be faithful and zealous in watching over and preserving their best interests, as far as my humble qualifications should enable me to do. Owing, sir, to that credulity incident to sincerity and inexperience, I feel myself constrained to acknowledge my co-operation in so managing the subject of Missouri and restriction, as to have inflicted upon their interest an extensive injury. My object is to regain for them, by following up the purpose of this resolution, a part of what has been lost by mismanagement ; but, should I fail in this, I shall gain the consolation of having done my duty. The object of this resolution I never should have favored ; so far from it, that I should have felt myself dishonored by giving it support or encouragement, had not faith been broken by the other party to the compact, and Missouri been rejected. This having been done, I feel myself at liberty—nay, more, I feel it my imperative duty—to offer this resolution. I will state that, at the solicitation of a friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BALDWIN,) I have been already induced, for a short time, to delay the introduction of the resolution, upon the ground that the majority would probably originate some measure by which Missouri would be admitted before Congress adjourned, and that it might, by some, be construed into a menace. Having no such design, feeling a high confidence in the good will and judgment of my friend, and wishing not to disoblige him, I have yielded to him in making some delay. If, sir, I have any trait in my character more prominent, and in which I feel more pride than others, it is that of sincerity. I happily feel a contempt for one who endeavors to beget impressions, and raise expectations, without an intention of supporting and realizing them. I have but little charity for the man who falls below his boasted feats and purposes. I acknowledge that I can see no good ground for an expectation that any thing further can now be done. The few remaining days of the session are fast whiling away, and I contemplate leaving here before its close. The minority, sir, have urged peace and good will, and have acknowledged and cringed, until I feel myself driven to the wall, and my feelings outraged. There is a point beyond which importunity deserves reproach; and gentlemen should recollect that there is danger even in pressing humility, itself, too far. She might at length raise her lowly head, and bring dismay upon her oppressors. Should the majority relent, and admit Missouri into the Union, I shall be satisfied; otherwise, (and should I not be upon this floor when this resolution can be taken up,) I wish it brought before Congress, and gentlemen will do me the favor to recollect such of my views as they may think deserving consideration; and also further recollect, that I have laid by the tone of supplication, and demand its adoption as due to faith, to honor, and to right.

Mr. Speaker, knowing no wish incompatible with the perpetuity, the happiness, and tranquillity of the Union, I have, upon every subject brought before Congress, consulted the good of the whole, without regard to the class of individuals or section of country from which it proceeded; whether merchants, manufacturers, or farmers: from the North, or from the South: from Maine, in the East, or Missouri, in the West, has been the same thing to me; I have not permitted myself to inquire who they were, or where from; and, for the few days that I shall yet remain with you, I will pursue the same wide and liberal policy; and that, too, whether called to act upon navigation acts, for the benefit of commerce; tariff laws, for the benefit of agriculture and manufactures; bankrupt bills, called for by our merchants of the East; or relief land laws, loudly required by our Western friends of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. And, sir, I will take this as the last occasion which I shall have, to say, that, had I remained in Congress, I would have pursued the same policy until every impartial man in the nation should have said, nay, until the marble columns themselves, that stand in stately pride around us, should have acknowledged that my feelings and desires of good will were not reciprocated; and that sectional feelings and views had usurped the habitation of those which warmed into life and usefulness our happy Constitution. And after becoming thus satisfied, that kind offices, persuasive arguments, and solid reasoning, were appealed to in vain, I frankly acknowledge that I know of no course left more likely to avoid greater evils, than a mild, but unvarying system of retaliation; under the operation of which, different classes and sections of the United States might become convinced, from appeals to their interest, that mutual kindness and a reciprocal spirit of concession ought to influence our councils: begetting a due and tender respect to the interest, the principles, the wishes, and even the prejudices of all classes and portions of our great national family.

Before I advance to the investigation of the merits of the resolution, I owe it to my colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) who is also my friend and messmate, to explain why, having communicated to several others my design of proposing this resolution, I have carefully avoided mentioning the subject to him, though in daily habits of intimacy, and although I have no friend, living, whose approbation I more highly prize. My mind has been made up, after much reflection, upon the purpose of this resolution, so soon as it should be decided that Missouri was not to be admitted into the Union; that decision has already taken place, and there is not, apparent to me, any reasonable ground for expecting its reversal here. My colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) who has labored arduously and zealously to settle this question, and tranquilize the Union, is not willing yet to despair; he indulges the hope that something may still be done. Had I communicated my design to him, I thought it likely that he might advise the withholding it, yet longer; and admonished and determined against further delay, by a recollection of the early close of my privilege on this floor, and the still earlier day at which circumstances required me to leave it, I have thought it better to proceed, without the possible approbation of my colleague, than against his probable advice.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a peculiar aptness between the subject which I propose for your consideration and the remnant of the session; let it be recollected, that two sessions have been wasted away in the fruitless discussion of propositions relating to Missouri; all parts of the United States and all classes of your citizens have suffered and groaned, without that legislative aid which was required by their wants, and called for by their petitions; while you have denied them your attention, and even withheld from them your sympathy. Sir, there exists a further objection to this untimely effort to despatch the important business of the nation; nearly an equal half of this House, from the South and West, feel themselves and their constituents deeply aggrieved; they cannot bend and confine their attention, at this late hour, to new and important subjects, called for by those who have, with apparent unconcern, set at naught their rights, their interest, and their feelings; and, if stoical enough to do so, they should recollect the frailty of humanity, and avoid temptation. Sir, with me, (I cannot dissemble,) the salt of legislation has lost its savor. The subject I propose is one rendered just and necessary by the result of the legislation of almost the whole preceding part of this Congress: I mean your refusal to admit Missouri into the Union. I do not believe the few remaining days of the session can be better employed than in adapting the laws and measures of this Government to the extraordinary crisis, at which we have at length arrived.

Mr. Speaker, you will perceive that the same act of Congress which contains the clause authorizing the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, contains also the clause which I now propose to repeal. The history of that act is better known in this Hall, than it is out of it; and as it has become important that it should be fully understood by the nation, although I referred to it on a former occasion, while addressing the House, it seems so necessary to a clear comprehension of my proposition, that I must entreat your patience, while I again make a statement of the facts. I appreciate the indulgence shown me, and will be as concise and rapid as possible.

I now, sir, proceed to make the statement upon which my resolution is predicated, and I invite the correction of gentlemen who may believe me in any degree incorrect. Upon the motion of the present honorable Speaker of this House, who was also the mover of the restriction, a committee was raised early in the last session, upon the subject of the contemplated restriction on Missouri, for the avowed purpose of compromising and allaying a subject which even then, in the cradle, gave indications of its being an infant Hercules: and I will do the honorable Speaker the justice to say, that I do not believe he would have proposed a mode or suggested a principle by which this affair should be settled, that he did not believe consistent with the dictates of morality and reason. The committee thus raised did not disagree upon principles, but upon lines of longitude and latitude. All were willing for a compromise, but the position of the lines presented insuperable difficulties, and the committee, on their application, was discharged. The bill preparatory to the admission of Missouri passed the House of Representatives with a restriction, and was reported to the Senate; the Senate had a bill before them for the admission of Maine into the Union: Maine was on the extreme eastern, Missouri on the extreme western limb of the United States. Maine was called for by the non-slaveholding States of the North and East; Missouri, by the slaveholding States of the South and West; the East was jealous of the growth and power of the West, which excited alarm and jealousy in the West: Maine in the east was to be admitted without restrictions; Missouri in the west claimed the same exemption from the intrusion of the General Government: to calm these jealousies, allay these fears, and at the same time to do equal justice to the East and West, the Senate determined that Maine and Missouri should, by the same act, and at the same instant, pass the threshold into the Union; and that each should enter, equally unfettered by restriction. This was just and wise, and did honor to the calm and well-balanced minds of that venerable body. The bill from the House of Representatives preparatory to the admission of Missouri, being thus amended by the Senate, was reported to the House; the House disagreed; the Senate insisted; the House rejected; a committee of conference was appointed to settle, if possible, these differences between the two branches of Congress and the friends of Maine and Missouri. The joint committee, after much anxious deliberation, came to a settlement, satisfactory to a large majority of Congress, and to a much larger proportion of this nation; the friends of Missouri having agreed that Maine, unfettered, should be admitted forthwith into the Union; and having reluctantly consented to the imposition of a restriction upon the territory west of Missouri. Those who opposed Missouri agreed to withdraw their opposition, and to consent to her admission without restriction. When I speak of the parties agreeing to propositions, I do not intend to be understood that every person agreed, but a sufficient number to constitute a majority, and to carry their arrangement through Congress. The terms of the compromise being thus well understood and agreed upon, the bill for the admission of Maine into the Union immediately passed; and this bill also passed authorizing Missouri to form a constitution and State government without restriction, and containing upon its face a stipulation that she should be admitted into the Union upon the footing of the original States; which bill also imposed the restriction upon the territory, which restriction I now contend should be repealed. Missouri assembled her convention, and formed her constitution, laid down, according to the practice of other States, the territorial government, and put into full operation her State government: she chose her Representative and Senators, who, under the faith of this law, presented her constitution, and asked admittance into the Union. They have been unjustly and unkindly rejected; and the attempt has been renewed to impose upon her the odious restriction, bought off at the last session; and, what would seem almost incredible, none can have been more zealous to produce her rejection than the Representatives, with a single exception, from this very State of Maine, who could not have been upon this floor at this time, or probably in all after time, but for the compromise; for Massachusetts, whose consent was indispensable to the emancipation of Maine, had cautiously given it with a limitation, which would have run out in a day or two after the compromise and her admission; and it was represented here to be very doubtful whether Massachusetts would ever afterwards have again yielded her consent. To the honor of Maine, her Senators (Holmes and Chandler) and one of her Representatives (Shaw*) have preserved good faith, and have contended and voted for the admission of Missouri, and the fulfilment of the terms of compromise, with such modification of her constitution as obviated the objectionable feature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, upon the principles of eternal justice which govern the intercourse and contracts of individuals, and the negotiation and compacts of communities, states, and nations, I demand of Congress, not for myself, but for one half of the United States, the repeal of this restriction upon the territory west and north of Missouri. The consideration promised for this restriction has not been paid; the plighted faith of Congress for the admission of Missouri has been violated; then take off, at least, the restriction. Give us Missouri without restriction, or place us in the same situation, by taking it off of the territory, in which we were when you entered into the covenant, and gave us the solemn pledge of a law to do so. Sir, the course of the majority can be justified by no principle of reason or sound policy, but must rest, for its support, upon the antiquated doctrines of schoolmen and casuists, of pious fraud; the end sanctifying the means; of doing evil that good may come of it; which, though they have received the reprobation of true moralists, may find a place in the new code of ethics, likely to grow out of these times. Are we to hear it contended, that the furtherance of humanity and religion will justify making the Southern and Western people dupes to your promises and their credulity? Will you sir, (do not misunderstand me, Mr. Speaker, I do not mean you personally, but the House over which you preside,) contend, that the restriction is right and just, and that, unimportant how obtained, it ought to be maintained and continued?

Sir, if this principle were correct, the conclusion does not follow; I deny your premises, and will proceed to show that the restriction, which I seek to repeal, is unjust—unjust, because this immense territory, this fair portion of America, over which the honorable Speaker has said he contemplated with pleasure the numerous States that would hereafter unfurl their banners; this spacious territory was procured by the wisdom, the policy, and the money, of all the States within this Union; each contributed their due proportion of the fifteen, nay, all things considered, nearer twenty millions of dollars towards its purchase; it is, therefore, the common of the United States, into which all should equally have the privilege to enter, to roam, and to sit down. But will it be said that, notwithstanding the restriction against the introduction of slaves, all may now do so? I grant you they may. But we should view and speak of things practically. Will they do so? Sir, I will take occasion to say, that if I have any capacity, capable of being rendered of the smallest use to my country, it results from the humble faculty of viewing things in their practical operation. When you recollect their prejudices and habits, and that slaves constitute the principal fortunes in many of the slaveholding States, will you not grant that the prohibition of slavery in this territory is virtually and practically the exclusion from it of those and their posterity, who have contributed so largely and most largely to its acquisition? Sir, we have jointly toiled and paid to acquire it, but our Eastern friends and their new Western allies now contend, and are likely to obtain, the exclusive enjoyment.

Mr. Speaker, when this Confederation was formed, the characters and rights of the people in the slaveholding States were known, respected, acknowledged, and secured; and now, upon any supposed principle of policy, without their deliberate consent, to destroy or abridge them, deserves the appellation of (what I consider it in fact) an usurpation. I trust I have shown the restriction to be unjust. Sir, the idea of a restriction upon the introduction of slaves into Missouri, or the territory being better for the slaves, seems at length exploded, abandoned, and given up, upon this floor, as untenable. Indeed, it should never have been urged. The permission asked by Missouri, which you have denied, and that now urged by me for the territory, for the liberty to decide for themselves upon the policy of introducing slaves, did not, nor does it now, contemplate an augmentation of one to the number of slaves; not one human being is asked to be reduced to the condition of a slave, who is not so already. So far, sir, is it from being better for slaves with whom you so strongly sympathize, to impose the restriction, that it is manifestly worse for them; impose the restriction, and slaves are thereby kept crowded together in the South; you chain them to their sterile and burning fields, and to their present owners, many of whom have great numbers, and are thereby rendered the less able to provide for them abundantly, and the less disposed to treat them with humanity and indulgence; but give up your unmeaning contest about restriction, and permit slaves to be taken into those extensive and fertile regions of the West, you will thereby disperse them; increase the numbers of owners, and you decrease the number of slaves held by each; the effect of which, and that clear to the view of every practical man, must be to secure more abundant provision and humane treatment, and further to increase the prospects for manumission by masters, and gradual abolition by the State governments. But, sir, I have said, that withholding the restriction increases the prospect for manumissions, because universal experience proves that correct notions of the rights of man and the principles and feelings of humanity are gaining ground, and in proportion as you increase in any section of country the white population over that of the black, you remove the pressure from the growth of those principles and feelings, and increase the quantum of sentiment in favor of the blacks. This encourages, persuades, and excites to manumissions; and has led, and would always lead, to gradual but ultimate abolition. Sir, I am free to declare it as my opinion, the result of some reflection, that if you were to abandon the contest, and permit slaves to break up from crowded plantations, and scatter over our vast Western world, whilst a portion would be relieved from Southern servitude, and, as some would have it, want, and would have brighter prospects opened to their view, the condition of the residue would, from the operation of the same principles, become greatly ameliorated. So far from the principles favorable to African slavery being on the growth, as has been inconsiderately asserted, they are rapidly on the wane, as is attested by the policy of all civilized nations, in relation to the African slave trade; and, beyond all others, by the feelings and policy of the people of the United States, in regard to it. From these considerations, and some others, which I will not detain you by presenting, I have, sir, contemplated, with no unpleasant sensations, the extension of these principles and the dispersion of the blacks, until a portion of the present slaveholding States, and all those which might be hereafter admitted into the Union, would find it consistent with their feelings and not incompatible with their interest, to pass laws for their gradual emancipation. Their numbers being reduced comparatively low, this might then be done without danger, serious apprehensions, or great inconvenience—the chief obstacles, everywhere, to such laws at this time. But, Mr. Speaker, driven from the ground of the restriction being better for the unfortunate blacks, whose condition, gentlemen profess, impelled by feelings of humanity, they are desirous to improve; they now contend that it is, at all events, better for the whites. This position, not as disinterested and magnanimous as the former, remains also to be proven. Sir, I have been forcibly struck at the want of correct information in Legislatures of the non-slaveholding States, upon the subject of slavery, and particularly the extent of the present contest, as evidenced by their proceedings and resolutions, and have also made the same remark, on gentlemen of great information, occupying high stations and possessing undoubted integrity. I do not, therefore, esteem it at all remarkable that the mass of the population in those States should labor under gross misapprehensions.

* When this question was again revived, and Missouri admitted, Mr. Hill, of Maine, voted for her admission.

The honorable Speaker, who, I am quite sure, would represent no fact otherwise than as he believed it, proceeding, in one of his speeches, upon a mistaken view of the state of society in the slaveholding States, asks the question, Who but slaveholders were elected to the State Legislatures, &c.? And he appealed to us to say whether the selection of a laboring man, however well educated, would not be considered an extraordinary event? I answer, sir, without the fear of contradiction from the Representatives of those States, and in the face of their people, that, when a candidate presents himself for office, it never entered into the mind of folly itself to inquire, by way of ascertaining his qualifications, whether he held slaves? I have reflected, and could, would it not be an unprofitable consumption of your time, enumerate very many of my acquaintances and friends, not being slaveholders, who have been preferred to office, and, like others, elected to the Legislature; and, I further state, with the most sincere conviction of its truth, that if the possession of slaves, more than the possession of money, or other property, elevates a man in the estimation of society, I have remained to this hour altogether ignorant of such an effect. Sir, a venerable and distinguished Senator from New York, (Mr. KING,) said, when speaking of the slaveholding States, that in them “manual labor dishonored the hands of freemen.” And the same sentiment has been re-echoed in this House. I deny the proposition to be true; and can and now will proceed to show that this is not one of the evils of African slavery; but, that its existence in a society elevates the poor and laboring white man, and that its non-existence invites and leads to his depression and dishonor. Sir, where slavery is tolerated, slaves perform, for others, the servile and menial duties of the stable, the kitchen, and the house—I say they perform for others, because no one would expose himself so much as to contend that a man was dishonored by catching his own horse, or a female by doing her own house labor; the whites engage in the dignified and honorable labor of agriculture and the mechanic arts; and in these, respectable men and their sons, slaveholders and non-slaveholders, indiscriminately join; and, if I have not to learn all that I have seen and known, a man is respected among us in the degree that he is industrious, honest, and honorable; and is degraded and dishonored, as he is vagrant, lazy, and unprincipled. Men ought to be, and are, graduated in society by the principles which I have mentioned. When, sir, in the State which I have, in part, the honor to represent, a man in the higher walks of life meets his poor, but honest neighbor, he salutes him, and treats him with the attention which belongs to merit; if he comes to his house, he is met at the door, and cordially taken by the hand, invited to a seat in the hospitable circle, and constitutes a welcome guest at his smoking board. But what is the picture in the non-slaveholding States? I speak the language of experience and truth. The wealthy employ, I do not say culpably, the poor and miserable whites in all the round of servile duties from the stable to the kitchen; they ride before and behind their carriages, and stand often trembling in the presence of their august employers, in practice and truth their masters; they act as their cooks, their shoe-blacks, and their scullions. The wide chasm between their stations and pursuits forbids intercourse at all, much less a cordial one. Thus the miserable, poor, and laboring white man is degraded and dishonored in the non-slaveholding States; whilst in those of the opposite character, he is saved and redeemed by the intervention of blacks. Since the days of Adam to the present time, men have occupied the various stations of high and low, rich and poor, dignified and servile; and the practical difference betwixt the slaveholding, and the non-slaveholding States upon this subject is, that the former has degraded their black, and the latter their white brethren, to those servile duties. Mr. Speaker, I hope it may be understood, that I have not made these remarks in a spirit of reproach; and do hope that I shall be pardoned for having examined this false doctrine, of labor dishonoring the hands of a freeman, a little at large, when it is recollected that by far the greatest portion of those generous freemen, by whose votes I have been elevated to a seat in this hall, do not own slaves; it is my duty, no, sir, it is my privilege and pleasure, to defend their honor as well as their rights; and I do, with indignation, repel the insinuation, though from high authority, that they are dishonored by labor; sir, I repel it for myself, for I too find pleasure and advantage in labor, and cannot, patiently, listen to such an imputation. Sir, I will use this last occasion to impress upon our brethren of the non-slaveholding States the extreme indelicacy, censoriousness, and impolicy of raising our latches and attempting to disturb the sacredness of domestic relations and quiet; and will say to them "Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?"

We never have, and never will submit to have our natural and Constitutional rights revised and qualified by them; we deny their authority to catechise us, and to fulminate their denunciations against our principles of morality, religion, or honor. I will not, sir, engage in the invidious task of comparing, much less in attempting to elevate ourselves above our brethren of the East; if I can show that we occupy the level with them I shall be satisfied. There is one fact of which I entreat gentlemen to be assured, that in the States beyond the mountains, so far as I have been enabled to collect from observation and inquiry, there exists as much, not to say more practical morality, religion, and honor, as can be found in the land of steady habits. Sir, while the Congress of the United States keeps within its proper limits, which will be without the pale of State authority, confining its operations to Federal and not State duties, as they have failed to do, in the attempt to impose a restriction upon Missouri; while it magnanimously, disregarding local feeling, listens to the rights, wants, nay wishes, of every class and section of the Union, kindly affording relief where practicable; and where not, as kindly rejecting, taking care to proceed upon strong and satisfactory, not nice and technical reasoning; while Congress will proceed thus, it will answer the designs of its authors, and gain for itself the love of the people and the admiration of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I feel so deeply impressed with its importance that I must be allowed to say, that above all things, the bitter subject of African slavery is one which can never be touched with impunity by the General Government. The Convention that formed the Constitution found it so; a celebrated Convention to the East found it so; and so have Congress and the nation fully ascertained. The Convention was constrained to leave it as they found it, save that to effect the very object of confining it to the condition in which found; the citizens of other States are required, on the escape of slaves to such other States, upon the application of their owners, to deliver them up for the purpose of being taken whence they came. Congress should not meddle, and will never be permitted to meddle, nor will other States, further than to pass laws for securing, on an escape, their custody to their owners. Such, sir, are the mischievous and alarming consequences incident to the interference of the General Government with this subject, which, if once permitted, might be followed by another and another measure of encroachment, all exciting and eliciting in slaves themselves and in those who might engage in the crusade, as well as in their owners, the most deep-rooted prejudices and violent passions of the human heart. I say that such are the consequences attendant upon this assumption of power by the General Government, that every parent should impress upon the susceptible mind of his child its great danger, and the necessity of carefully avoiding it; and much more should those in the slaveholding States enjoin upon theirs the necessity of constant vigilance; and upon the first discovery of an attempt at encroachment, of raising the alarm, and never ceasing resistance, until every Constitutional effort should be exhausted. Sir, I wish it understood that I am no friend to African slavery, not for many of the reasons usually assigned, but because it is a violation of the rights of man, as derived from his God, and I will pledge myself to go as far as most men for its amelioration or abolition. But I owe higher obligations to the white population of the United States, particularly to those who have sent me here; to my friends and family, than those which I feel, or ought to feel for the black. Mr. Speaker, it should never be forgotten that, according to the laws of the slaveholding States, slaves are property, and protected by the Constitution of the United States; which Constitution vests the General Government with no power to touch the subject; that the condition and treatment is better understood, and exclusively understood, by those States themselves, and that, whatever ought or can be done for this unfortunate class of people, should be left to the States respectively in which they are situated.

But, sir, I have been strongly reminded of the necessity of this resolution by a recollection of the manner in which an honest post-rider, and no slaveholder, in my neighborhood, reprimanded and put me to silence, on my return home last Spring: for the people in the Western country not owning slaves, hold their heads, and that justly too, as high as those who do, and take upon themselves to inquire about public business, and into the conduct of those whom they elevate to office.

This honest man asked me what important measures we had passed during the session. I proceeded to enumerate all, which you know were but few, and apologized for not doing more, from the great length of time which had been employed on the Missouri question. Sir, said he, that ought not to have taken so wise a body as Congress half an hour to decide it; for I satisfied my mind upon it in less time. I endeavored to evade the severity of the stroke, by remarking that it was an important question, and the arguments on both sides had been lengthy and able. He promptly replied that he could not see what ground there was for argument upon so plain a question as the right of Congress to dictate to Missouri about having or not having negroes; a matter which concerned her, and which other States had decided for themselves. I was heartily tired of the Missouri question, and made another attempt to divert him, by remarking that we had this consolation, that, at the next session, the public business could be attended to, having finally compromised and settled the disagreeable contest, by allowing a restriction on the Territory; and there, said he, you suffered yourselves to be yanked, by giving up the restriction on the Territory, for a right to which Missouri was entitled without it. Such is the force of sound, impartial, unsophisticated sense, that it carried conviction to the bystanders; they laughed to hear the post-rider gain so fair a triumph, and I could not deny him a victory. Now, sir, I have anticipated with some concern, that I should meet this plain, common-sense man again; and, if so, I have imagined that he would say, sir, I thought you told me that the Missouri question had been finally settled, and that you would, at the next session, be able to do the people's business. I would answer: true, I did, but the friends of restriction found fault with the constitution of Missouri, because free blacks and mulattoes were forbidden to go there; and they were said to be citizens of the United States, and therefore privileged. He will be almost certain to say, because he has a knack of putting things in a strong point—and what! are blacks and mulattoes citizens of the United States! and have they, therefore, a right to be members of Congress or President of the United States? But, I shall repeat that this was the opinion—right or wrong I leave you to decide—of a majority of the House of Representatives, and, therefore, they were dissatisfied. He will then likely inquire, is not the Constitution of the United States above all other laws? for, I assure you that it is a principle well known to our constables and magistrates, who sometimes decide a law to be repugnant to the Constitution, and therefore void. I must repeat it to have been the opinion of a majority, that they could not trust to the Constitution of the United States to weigh against the constitution of Missouri. The inquiry will then be made, whether, as the first section of the law which provides for the admission of Missouri had been violated, the last section of the same law, which imposed the restriction, as the consideration of the admission of Missouri, had not been repealed? I wish, sir, to be prepared to tell this honest man and others, for great is the solicitude, and numerous will be the inquiries, that the restriction has been repealed; or, at least, to have the poor consolation of being enabled to say, that I performed my duty, by endeavoring to have it repealed. And I beg that my dilemma may not be disregarded; for, if the restriction should not be repealed, he will surely repeat the charge before made, and with greater reason, that we had suffered ourselves to be thoroughly yanked. For, if this resolution be not adopted, you will have the advantage both in land and negroes.

Mr. Speaker, I feel myself constrained to communicate my sensations on a late occasion, although I had designed, until this moment, to confine them within my own breast. I verily believe, sir, that if members would, upon this floor, use more ingenuousness, not only in disclosing their views, but in temperately exposing their feelings, our discussions would be much simplified and curtailed. We should then know where to direct arguments, or whether it were worth while to use them at all. But, sir, to proceed: After the late vote by which Missouri was refused admittance into the Union, while descending the hill westwardly from this Capitol, with my face turned towards ill-fated Missouri, my home, and my friends, strongly and deeply feeling the unkind blow given to her rights and those of one-half the Union, I felt such maddening sensations as I only recollect to have experienced on a few former occasions: One, sir, on the occlusion of the port of New Orleans by Spain; when distress and ruin threatened our land! Another, when the President's proclamation arrived in the West, containing an annunciation that the sovereignty and flag of the United States had been violated and insulted in our own waters, by the attack of the British ship Leopard of 50 guns, upon the United States frigate Chesapeake of 38; and the third, when, at the commencement of the late war, owing to the weakness or treachery of General Hull, or both, Detroit and the Northern army were surrendered, and the whole northwestern frontier of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, threatened with blood and desolation. Upon all these occasions, my voice was heard endeavoring to explain our wrongs and dangers, and to inspire my fellow-men with just feelings of resentment; nor did I decline offering the aid of my feeble arm.

Mr. Speaker, I beg that I may not be misunderstood; these were my involuntary emotions, but they have subsided and become calm. I know my rights and my duty as an American citizen; and I am incapable of thinking of any force except that which is moral and Constitutional. But, sir, though I retire from this magnificent hall to my humble fireside and my fields, the injuries of Missouri shall not be forgotten or concealed; they will continue to be uppermost upon my mind, on my lying down and rising up, on my going out and coming in. Mr. Speaker, it surely becomes the councils of this nation to inquire with care and anxiety into the course likely to be pursued by Missouri. I, sir, will use this occasion to say to their Representatives and Senators, and, through them to the people of Missouri, what I have not communicated to those gentlemen, personally, that, as they have come forward and offered her constitution, or, to use the language of court etiquette, have called and left their card, which has not been returned, but rejected, and have also offered to pay a personal visit, but have had the door shut in their face, and refused admittance, that they now, although mortified and humiliated, should return quietly to their growing State, and there remain, with an elevated mien and inflexible purpose, until the future agents of this Government shall forward to them an invitation to attend her councils in this Chamber. Will Missouri lay down the full and proud dress of State government, and again cover herself with the lowly dishabille of a Territory? Sir, I know the character of the population of Missouri, and have the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with many of her respectable and influential citizens; they are enterprising, intelligent, and bold; they have an ardent and invincible attachment to liberty; while they reverence legitimate government and laws. And, sir, from my knowledge of this people, I will venture to say, with great confidence, that you might as soon expect, by your mandate, to roll back the onward floods of her majestic Missouri from the ocean! You, sir, may desolate their fields, and raze their habitations, but you cannot bend their necks to your unconstitutional yoke.

Mr. Speaker, I do not design to use, I will not use, the language of menace. I speak, however, fearless, and without disguise. Sir, he knows but little of the character of the Southern and Western delegation and States, who, while Missouri's wrongs remain unredressed, can look for happy and calm legislation on this floor. While our young sister Missouri, for imputed wrongs, not her own, but ours, remains bowed down and covered with distress; while she remains shut out from this Hall pale and sorrowful, and exposed to the most wasteful elements, your sentinels may cry peace, peace, all's well!—but, I tell you, deceive not yourselves, there is no peace!

Mr. Speaker, I have detained you longer than I designed to have done; my remarks have been warm and desultory, but I beg you to believe, that I have honestly and frankly laid open the feelings and sentiments of my heart, and have advanced no principle, not matured by reflection. Permit me, sir, to return to you, and the members of this House, my kindest thanks for the patience and attention with which you have heard my valedictory and uninteresting discourse. And, with the most fervent sincerity of heart, I implore, for the tranquillity and future grandeur of our common country, the blessing and protection of that God who has guided us, triumphant, through the perils of two wars; that God, who binds the winds of heaven in his hand, and calms the troubled seas.

Mr. B. having concluded—

The preliminary question was put—"Will the House now proceed to consider this resolution?" It was decided in the negative—seventy-nine votes to 43. So the resolution lies on the table.

REDUCTION OF SALARIES, &c.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the bill to reduce (on an average by twenty per cent.) the salaries of the officers of the Government, with the amendment proposed by Mr. CAMPBELL, the object of which was to reduce the pay of the members from eight dollars to six dollars per diem.

Mr. SIMKINS, of South Carolina, said he could not refrain from expressing his warm and decided approbation of the sentiments delivered by the two gentlemen from Kentucky, (Messrs. ANDERSON and ROBERTSON.) In doing this the House cannot but see how utterly mistaken the gentleman from Ohio is when he attempts to justify his motion by saying that, for six dollars a day, the ablest men can be got to serve in Congress, and that they will be sufficiently permanent. Every step this debate progresses, and almost every member that rises to address you, contradict the gentleman's position, and show that scarcely a man can be got to serve here for any considerable length of time. Many are induced to come from a spirit of patriotism, some from the eclat of being for a while members of Congress, some from one motive, and some from another; but experience, the best of all tests, has invariably proved (in a very few instances excepted) that, by the time such members learn the routine of business—yes, at the very time when they become fitted to render real service to their country—they are literally driven from Congress by the poverty of the salary at eight dollars a day. What then are we to think of a proposition that goes to lessen even this allowance? Sir, I, with the gentleman from Kentucky, from Maryland, and, indeed, almost every gentleman who has spoken, can speak disinterestedly on this question. A few days will also number me among those who were so kind as to send me here, free from all Congressional interests and duties; and I venture to assert for the Southern States, and I think I might for the Middle States, that no man with a family can, at the present pay, hold a seat here for any length of time, unless he would madly and unnaturally sacrifice his domestic comforts and private interests—unless, indeed, he would sacrifice his family. Sir, do you not see that even every two years there is a change of a third, and sometimes a half of this body? What does this show but that professional men and others so sacrifice their interests by seats here that they are driven to abandon them? And hence, this House is doomed to an instability and a fluctuation so ruinous as to unsettle and sacrifice every thing dear to the country. In truth, almost every class of the community are denied to come here, except two—those who are very rich, and those who are seeking other and more profitable places through Executive patronage and otherwise. If the present order of things exists, the endeavor to preserve this body pure and independent will be fruitless and vain. In vain will it be that the Constitution, for the wisest purposes, has declared the three main branches of the Government separate and independent. Lower your present pay, (already too low,) and this independence and purity will exist only in name.

Sir, the importance of this subject swells as we progress. I should not have risen but from a consideration of its being of the last importance. I forbear to press a view indelibly stamped with interest, though not with novelty.

The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. CAMPBELL) says that, whilst diminishing the salaries of the military and civil officers, the majority would be inconsistent not to embrace their own; that they ought first to have begun with themselves. With the consistency of the majority in this matter I rejoice to have had nothing to do—no sin to answer for. Let gentlemen look to their own consistency. They have made their own choices. I not only opposed the change in the method of paying your military officers, as a retrocession instead of an advance in military science, as novel, unequal, and unprecedented, but I have opposed the diminution of pay and salaries, both civil and military, for various reasons, but particularly because this is not the proper time to settle them. Some salaries, I admit, upon the change of times, may be a little too high; but is it not clear that we ought not to unsettle and render fluctuating every salary, at a time when the state and circumstances of the nation are evidently unsettled? Look at the state of our importations and of our currency. They are at their lowest point of depression; perhaps may have already risen a little from the lowest point. Is it not evident that the importations will increase; that bank stock is rising, because our banks will discount more liberally, and throw into circulation a great deal more money? Is it not seen from these premises, that no man can now tell what would be an adequate salary for any number of years; that what may be ample pay this year, will be too little the next, and still more inadequate the next after; that, by legislating at this moment, we not only act with too much precipitation, but are actually legislating in the dark? I know these arguments, which were urged by me on the bill reducing the salaries of military officers, two or three days ago, had no weight. They were not even answered, because every thing then was carried by a dead, determined, unyielding majority. On our own pay I trust they will have more weight.

But the gentleman from Ohio says, we must legislate according to our circumstances. Sir, this is the very reason, urged in part before, but which permit me to repeat, why we should not now legislate at all. How do we know under what circumstances the next Congress may meet? Here we are at the very heel, not merely of the session, but of the Congress, legislating, not for ourselves, with a due and becoming delicacy, but legislating, hastily and officiously, for the next Congress. The gentleman should have begun earlier. He should have begun as soon as it was ascertained by the annual Treasury report of the last session, that loans or taxes would be necessary.

Sir, with the first gentleman who addressed you, from Kentucky, (Mr. ANDERSON,) I regret extremely that this subject was now touched, because, as has been well urged, it is one of extreme delicacy, and the investigation of which has hardly failed to agitate the continent from one end to the other. This is not all; for nothing is so well calculated to create distrust towards us, and so to humble this body in the eyes of the people.

Mr. Foot observed, that he had determined not to take any part in the discussion of the merits of this bill; but, since the chairman of the committee had only stated his own views of the subject, and the reasons which had influenced himself—and in addition to this had also stated, that he was prevented by ill health from attending with the committee during their investigation of the subject referred to them, and had assigned this as the reason for not answering the questions which had been proposed by several gentlemen respecting the principles which had governed the committee—he felt himself bound, by considerations of respect to the House, as well as to individual members, and in justice to the committee to state frankly his own views, and also the reasons which had induced the committee to present this bill to the consideration of the House, so far at least as he was able to understand and to express their sentiments on the subject.

Sir, the committee have investigated, with considerable labor and attention, the several subjects referred to them; and the bill now under consideration is the result of their examination, so far as respects the amount of the compensation to the officers and others embraced in the resolution. They have endeavored to equalize and apportion the compensation to the services performed, with a due regard to the talents and qualifications necessary for the faithful discharge of the duties assigned to them. They have been guided in some measure by the amount of salaries, which the officers and others received previous to the year 1815, since which period most of the salaries have been increased.

The committee believed that if the compensation was not reduced below the amount fixed by law, previous to 1816, it could not be claimed that the salaries contemplated by the present bill would be insufficient, considering the present appreciation of the value of money; and they do not hesitate to say that salary officers, even with the reduction proposed by the present bill, would suffer less than any other portion of the community; for, if the same salaries furnished an adequate support in 1815, they certainly would be amply sufficient at the present time.

It will not be denied that the present state of the finances of the country, and our future prospects of revenue, demand a very considerable reduction of the present salaries of the officers in the civil, as well as in every other department of the Government, in addition to other practicable retrenchments, in order to bring our expenditures within our means, and prevent the necessity of resorting to loans or direct taxation to meet the expenditure of Government in profound peace.

The committee have endeavored to discharge faithfully the duties assigned to them; they feel no personal solicitude for the fate of this bill, but in common with those who consider retrenchment in our expenses necessary for the welfare of the country. But, sir, they do feel a deep solicitude, that some measures may be adopted by which the Government may, by a reasonable retrenchment, prevent the entire destruction of our most valuable institutions, which will be the inevitable consequence of our increasing expenses and our diminished resources.

Sir, my attention has been drawn to this subject from the first commencement of the last session, in consequence of the enormous increase of the appropriations for the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments. It will be recollected that a resolution was introduced by me at the last session for instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act of April, 1818, increasing the number, as well as the compensation of the clerks in the several Departments, but which, with every other effort in favor of retrenchment during the session, failed.

I consider the extraordinary and unprecedented increase of expense in the various Departments of our Government, after the conclusion of the war, a growing evil, wholly inconsistent with that republican simplicity which formerly characterized our Government, and which, in my opinion, is essential to its very existence.

Sir, we have been too much in the habit of apeing the manners, luxuries, and extravagance of the Old World; we have taken the monarchical governments of Europe as a pattern for the administration of our plain republican system; and we have been following, with rapid strides, in the path which has led to the destruction of all the ancient republics, and unless our progress is soon arrested, the same inevitable doom awaits our own.

The investigation of this subject has convinced my mind that a radical reform has become necessary; and, to use the phrase which a gentleman at the last session applied to the revenue system on the tariff bill, there is something rotten in the system.

The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. KINSEY) has my warmest acknowledgements, for the motion which he has made to amend the bill by erasing the clerk of the superintendent of the Patent Office, with the explanation made by him; and confirmed by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who has informed the House that the superintendent and clerk of the Patent Office are officers unknown to our laws. They have relieved me from the necessity of appealing to the laws to prove the fact. By your laws the Patent Office is a branch of the State Department, and has always been kept by a clerk of that Department until the act of 1818, and until 1808 is not even found in your appropriation bills. But what is its present condition? It has lately grown into a department with all the paraphernalia of office, a superintendent, with his clerk and messenger, created by your appropriation bills. Yes, sir, messenger! another creature of appropriation bills, which have become of late a very convenient mode of creating offices, and increasing the number of officers without the usual formalities of ordinary laws.

It is only necessary to call the attention of the House to the consideration of the subject, to convince every member of the impropriety of this mode of legislating men into place. Look at your appropriation bills! What is their language? "For paying an assistant to the Chief Clerk and messengers" not authorized by existing laws, &c., "and for extra clerks" — dollars.

Sir, this mode of, (I had almost said of smuggling) officers into place by appropriation bills, has become a most fertile source of abuse and of extravagant expenditure. Instead of creating those offices by special laws, when a thorough examination could be had, it has, I believe, often been found convenient after an appropriation bill has been under consideration for several days, and its details fully examined, to add a few more clerks by way of amendment, because it is said their services are found to be indispensable, and the motion prevails, because the bill must be passed, or the wheels of Government must stop.

The gentleman from Maryland has rather intimated than openly declared that the pay of the clerks has not been increased since the year 1815. Sir, in answer to this, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the printed documents on our tables, and to an examination of the gentleman's own appropriation bills, within the last five years. A document has been laid before us which purports to be "summary of compensations for executive departments in the years 1790, 1795, 1800, 1808, 1816, 1820," which shows a most enormous increase of the expenditures in those Departments even since the close of the late war.

I beg leave to call the attention of gentlemen particularly to this document, the authenticity and accuracy of which will not be questioned; and I would only ask the gentleman from Maryland to reconcile his remarks with this official statement.

We find, by turning to this document, the expenditure in the several Departments, at the different periods, to be as follows:

In 1790	-	-	-	-	$41,868 73
1795	-	-	-	-	71,997 06
1800	-	-	-	-	125,581 32
1808	-	-	-	-	142,352 83
1816	-	-	-	-	274,442 47
1820	-	-	-	-	353,097 60

Sir, this document speaks a language which cannot be misunderstood. It needs no comment.

Will the people of the United States consent to pay taxes, or borrow money to support this expensive, not to say extravagant, system? For one, I can say, my vote will not be given either for loans or taxes, in a time of profound peace, to support this rapidly increasing expenditure—nor on any conditions, until I can see some favorable prospect of a thorough reform and general retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL withdrew his amendment, and, in lieu thereof, proposed the following, to come in after the enacting clause of the second section, viz: "That the compensation now allowed to the members of the Senate, and members and delegates of the House of Representatives, and to the President of the Senate, pro tempore, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall be reduced twenty-five per cent., and"

The question then recurred on the amendment moved by Mr. CAMPBELL; when,

Mr. ARCHER moved to substitute, in lieu of that amendment, the following: "That an act of Congress, passed on the 22d day of January, 1818, entitled 'An act allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the delegates from Territories, and repealing all the laws on that subject,' shall, from and after the third day of March next, be repealed."

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The question then again recurred on Mr. CAMPBELL'S amendment.

Mr. RUEA moved to amend the same, by inserting, after the words "per cent.," these words: "from and after the first day of August, 1820."

Mr. CLAY, with the expressed intention of putting the bill and amendment to sleep, as one which would be productive of nothing but a useless consumption of time, moved to lay the bill on the table; and the motion was agreed to—84 to 62.

So the bill was laid on the table.

THURSDAY, February 22.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An engrossed resolution providing for jails, in certain cases, for the safe custody of persons committed under the authority of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COCKE,

Resolved, That this House will, at 12 o'clock on Monday next, proceed to ballot for a printer to execute its work during the next Congress, according to the provisions of the "resolution directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a printer, or printers," passed on the 3d day of March, 1819.

Mr. CROWELL moved that the several orders of the day which precede the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of public lands prior to the 1st of July, 1820," be postponed, for the purpose of taking the said bill into consideration.

And the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the orders of the day which precede the bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States, were postponed until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a report on the subject of weights and measures, prepared in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th December, 1819; which letter and report were ordered to lie upon the table.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, between the United States and Spain, signed on the 22d of February, 1819, having been ratified by the contracting parties, and the ratifications having been exchanged, it is herewith communicated to Congress, that such legislative measures may be taken as they shall judge proper, for carrying the same into execution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 22, 1821.

The Message was read, and, together with the Treaty, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1821; and on the bill to authorize the building of lighthouses on Cross and Pond Islands, in the harbor of Boothbay, and at the mouth of Oswego river; and placing buoys on the Shoals of Nantucket and Vineyard Sound, near the harbor of Wickford, and on the Altamaha river, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. FOOT reported the former of the said bills with amendments, and the latter without amendment.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments aforesaid; when

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the bill with the amendments lie on the table; which being rejected, the said amendments were concurred in, and the bills were ordered to be engrossed, and severally read a third time to-morrow.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Case of Commodore Tucker.

H. OF R.

CASE OF COMMODORE TUCKER.

The bill from the Senate, for the relief of Commodore Samuel Tucker, as amended in this House, so as to reduce the annuity to $20 per month, was read a third time. There was a good deal of debate on the bill. The gentlemen who spoke on the subject were:

For the bill—Messrs. MONTGOMERY, FULLER, and PINCKNEY.

Against the bill—Messrs. METCALF, COBB, HARDIN, LITTLE, and TUCKER, of Virginia.

The bill was supported on the ground of the great merit of Commodore Tucker as a warrior of the Revolution, and his present reduced circumstances. The objections were twofold: 1st, on the score of hostility to pensions in general, on any other principle than that of wounds or disability incurred in service; and, secondly, to paying out of a fund (the Navy Pension Fund) created since the adoption of the Constitution—a pension for Revolutionary services. To the first objection it was replied, that this case was very similar in principle to that of General Stark, and to other cases in which pensions had been granted for services, and not for disability; and to the second, that the act creating the Navy Pension Fund contained a provision that the surplus thereof should be applied to objects of this description, and that there was no reason for discriminating between our naval heroes, whether they served before or after the passage of this act; being in the one case or the other entitled to stand on the same footing.

These were the general grounds of argument, pro and con.

Mr. METCALF spoke as follows:

I do not rise, said he, in opposition to the passage of the bill now under consideration, because I have less of the good feelings of sympathy and of kindness for our distinguished Commodores, for officers and soldiers, than the worthy gentlemen who have so zealously advocated the measure. The bill will be partial in its operation—in principle unjust. Commodore Tucker, too wealthy to avail himself of the provisions of the general pension law, seeks to obtain a pension from the Government, by the passage of an act for his special and exclusive benefit. I will not call into question the merits of the application; but I believe the claims of many others, of equal merit, have been very righteously rejected. If we had an inexhaustible fund, a pile of jingling dollars as high as a mountain, to which we could resort for the purpose of obtaining the means by which to make a display of our generosity, I would go as far as any other man in dealing out the bounty of my country to Commodores, to officers, and soldiers. But in this, as in every case of a similar character, I consider it the duty of Congress to look at both sides of the question, and not altogether at the one side; that we should decide between the citizen and the soldier on principles of stern and undeviating justice.

It does seem to me, that we should not suffer our feelings in behalf of those upon whom the public treasury appears to have such powerful attractions, to mislead our judgment; or, rather, that we should not entirely forget to feel for that class of our fellow-citizens from whose pockets the cash is to be drawn, by which we are to manifest our liberality.

Reward the officers and soldiers of your country, I beseech you—amply reward them: give pensions to those who are entitled to pensions, and never withhold your bounty from those who have sustained injuries and wounds, and have shed their blood in the service and battles of their country; withhold justice from none. But do not sacrifice your industrious and productive citizens, whose lot it is to drudge and toil for the support of the whole, upon the altar of a misapplied generosity. When I reflect on the past and the present, said Mr. M., it fills me with the most afflicting and melancholy forebodings for the future. We have but little to fear from our enemies, much from our friends. In discharging the obligation of gratitude to public functionaries and military men, both liberty and property will in the end be required. Tell me not of precedents; a righteous cause requires no such propping, but relies for success upon its own intrinsic merits. If the Government has before done wrong, will you plead it in justification of another wrong which you wish to impose on your citizens? If the treasure of this people has, at any former period, been wasted with the hand of profusion and extravagance, until they have been imperceptibly conducted to the very brink of ruin, will you plead the precedent which met the sanction of an inconsiderate and an evil hour, for precipitating them from the precipice?

Shall we not retreat while it is in our power to do so, and when we have such fair warning of the dangers that lie immediately before us? Shall we go on to justify one wrong with another, until we oppress, with excessive burdens, the great mass of our fellow-citizens, and make them bow down, dispirited and despairing, beneath a load of intolerable taxation?

With these feelings and sentiments, I will only add, that I do enter the most solemn protest against the passage of the bill before us.

The yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill were as follows:

MISSOURI.

Mr. CLAY then rose to make his expected motion respecting Missouri, which was in the following shape :

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, on the part of this House, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report to the Senate and to the House, respectively, whether it be expedient or not to make provision for the admission of Missouri into the Union on the same footing as the original States, and for the due execution of the laws of the United States, within Missouri ; and, if not, whether any other, and what provision, adapted to her actual condition, ought to be made by law.

On this motion there took place a debate of about one hour's length.

Mr. FLOYD moved to amend the same by striking out these words, viz : "and if not, whether any other and what provision adapted to her actual condition ought to be made by law."

And the question being taken so to amend, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken to agree to the resolution, and passed in the affirmative, yeas 101, nays 55, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Bateman, Beecher, Blackledge, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Campbell, Cannon, Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Crowell, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Davidson, Dickinson, Earle, Eddy, Eustis, Fisher, Folger, Ford, Fuller, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hardin, Hendricks, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Jackson, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Kinsey, Little, Livermore, McCoy, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Meech, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, Montgomery, R. Moore, S. Moore, T. L. Moore, Morton, Murray, Neale, Newton, Parker of Massachusetts, Pinckney, Pitcher, Plumer, Rankin, Reid, Rhea, Ringgold, Robertson, Rogers, Ross, Simkins, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, A. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Southard, Stevens, Storrs, Strong of New York, Swearingen, Terrell, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Udree, Upham, Walker, Wendover, and Williams of North Carolina.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Bayly, Boden, Buffum, Butler of Louisiana, Case, Clagett, Crawford, Denison, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Floyd, Foot, Forrest, Garnett, Gorham, Gray, Hall of New York, Hemphill, Herrick, Hibshman, Hostetter, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Kendall, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Maclay, McCullough, Marchand, Monell, Moseley, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Parker of Virginia, Patterson, Randolph, Rich, Richards, Russ, Sergeant, Shaw, Silsbee, Street, Strong of Vermont, Tomlinson, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Williams of Virginia, and Wood.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, it was ordered that the said committee consist of twenty-three members ; and that they be elected by ballot, pursuant to the rules and orders of the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH then moved that one member of the said committee be chosen from each State ; which being negatived,

Mr. CLAY moved that the House do now proceed to the said election.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, moved that the House proceed to the election to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. TRACY moved that the House proceed to the election on Monday next, at 12 o'clock.

This latter motion being rejected, the question was taken on the motion to proceed to the election to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and passed in the affirmative.

FRIDAY, February 23.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States in the city of Washington," reported the same with an amendment ; which was read, and the bill and amendment were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENT, from the same committee, also reported a bill to regulate the fees of the register of wills in the several counties within the District of Columbia ; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit :

An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1821 ; and an act to authorize the building of light-houses on Cross and Pond Islands, in the harbor of Boothbay, and at the mouth of Oswego river, and placing buoys on the Shoals of Nantucket and Vineyard Sound, near the harbor of Wickford, and on the Altamaha river, and for other purposes ; were severally read the third time, and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the bill authorizing the Secretary of State to issue a patent to Thomas Oxley ; and the same being read—

Mr. LITTLE moved that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow ; which being negatived—

Mr. MALLARY moved to amend the same, by adding thereto the following, viz :

Provided, That the said Thomas Oxley shall take no advantage of this act after the time limited by the laws of the United States for the naturalization of foreigners, unless he becomes a citizen of the United States.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Public Land Debt.

H. OF R.

And the question being taken thereon, it was also determined in the negative, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting the reports numbered 10 and 11 of the land offices at Jackson Courthouse, in Louisiana, on claims for land; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill to continue in force the act for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and, a motion of Mr. TRACY to lay the bill on the table having been negatived, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PUBLIC LAND DEBT.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CROWELL, again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of purchasers of the public lands prior to the 1st of July, 1820.

Mr. MCCOY had moved to strike out so much of the bill as permits a conditional surrender to the United States of the land purchased; so much as dispenses with interest on the money due for lands; and so much as makes a deduction, in certain cases, of twenty-five and thirty-seven and a half per cent. from the amount of the debt.

This motion gave rise to a wide debate on the merits of the bill, in the course of which the principle of the bill was supported and opposed by the following gentlemen: For the bill—Messrs. ANDERSON, BRUSH, HENDRICKS, JONES, and CLAY. Against the bill—Messrs. HARDIN, CULPEPER, ALLEN of Tennessee, and MCCOY.

Mr. ALLEN, of Tennessee, said: The argument so much relied upon by the friends of the bill, that the Government is the creditor, and ought not to exercise that rigor in exacting compliance with contracts ruinous to her debtors that individuals would, because it is the common stock of all, as well as that urged on account of the depreciation of certain bank paper that will not pay the holder's debts without a discount equal to the reduction contemplated in the second section of the bill, would apply with force if the whole community were debtors of this description, and to be provided for in this bill; but, when not one in a thousand has purchased public land, and all are laboring under the difficulty so feelingly described, can it be right to apply the remedy to a few and leave others to struggle through as they can?

I hope I shall never be found hindmost in binding up the wounds inflicted by misfortune upon any of the sons of Adam. But, sir, the wretched and the poor presented to us here in such lively figures, have no part or lot in this matter; it is not the poor that buy land in any country.

Can any man make me believe that a farmer, owning a plantation on which he has resided three or four years without rent, is to be broken up and ruined by the payment of eighty dollars a year, the sum required to complete his title to a tract of a hundred and sixty acres of fertile land, under the law as it now stands? Such purchasers, I repeat it, can and will pay, and the greater part of them have done so already.

The provisions of this bill give such purchasers the liberty of paying annually fifty dollars, without interest, for eight years. If punctually paid it is not half the rent the poor have to pay for a home in any country; and if in default, you give them the chance of eight years more without paying anything. This is going further than they could ask. But, in getting at the class of purchasers for whom this bill is intended, it is necessary to attend to the poor, as, on other occasions, sometimes it is done to suit the views of the rich; they are the class whose interest is consulted in this bill; they have contrived to get all the land that is worth any thing in their possession; and a careful examination of the first section of the bill will convince any disinterested man that the object is to get the whole eventually for nothing.

If it is to be given away, I want a distribution more equal. The most deserving get none; men who risked their lives disputing the title of the aborigines, and marched over the dead bodies of your enemies to gain this land, get not one foot of it, but that which has been refused by these avaricious landmongers.

Independent of all the injustice that must follow this gratuity, among the land debtors, I view the precedent as a dangerous one in relation to the collection of revenue—I think I see another class of debtors ready to put in for their share.

The whole dependence of this Government is on revenue derived from imports that is now owing by merchants who have experienced greater losses than any class of men in the community. They are too useful and meritorious to be left beggars, after we finish the good work in the West. And, sir, the cordial support given this bill, by a certain section of the country, puts me on my guard, not being accustomed to see any extraordinary display of sympathy for the people of the West, except for those who we all know hold no land. I do not know that self-interest would influence any one in a solicitude for the passage of this bill. I am a stranger to all management in legislation. I belong to no party; I know of none; and far be it from me to impeach the motives of any. It is enough for me to judge for myself—in doing so, on this occasion, I believe sound policy and impartial justice requires from me a vote to strike out the first and second sections of this bill, and as much more as will defeat its passage.

The question being taken on Mr. MCCOY's motion, it was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. ANDERSON moved to strike out that clause of the bill which proposes to allow an absolute reduction of thirty-three per cent. on the amount due by the debtors, and so to amend the bill as to confine the discount to those who should make prompt payment of the whole sum due.

This proposition brought on a long debate, in which Messrs. BRECHER, JONES, COOK, HARDIN, SERGEANT, ANDERSON, and CLAY, joined.

The amendment was finally negatived—yeas 55, nays 62.

Missouri Committee—Imprisonment for Debt.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved to add the following proviso to the first section of the bill:

Provided, also, That where any purchaser has purchased at the same time two or more quarter sections, he shall not be permitted to relinquish less than a quarter section.

This amendment was also negatived.

Mr. HARDIN then, for reasons which he stated, moved the following additional proviso to the third section of the bill:

And provided further, That the discount allowed in this bill shall not be made where the debtor shall fail to pay any of the said several instalments, as the same shall become due and payable.

This amendment, after some debate, was also rejected.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill to the House without amendment.

An unsuccessful motion was made to lay the bill on the table, with the view (it being late) of receiving the report of the tellers relative to the appointment of the committee on the subject of Missouri, (in examining the ballots for which the tellers had been employed nearly four hours.)

Mr. HARDIN then renewed the motion he made in Committee to amend the bill; when, a motion to that effect prevailing, the bill and proposed amendment were laid on the table.

MISSOURI COMMITTEE.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, then reported that the tellers appointed to examine the ballots given for a committee of 23 members on the Missouri subject, according to the resolution of yesterday, had performed that duty—the result of which ballot he delivered in.

It appeared that 157 members had been voted for, but that the following 17 gentlemen only had a majority of the ballots given, and were elected, viz:

Messrs. Clay, of Ken.	Messrs. Eddy, of R. I.
Cobb, of Geo.	Ford, of N. Y.
Hill, of Maine.	Culbreth, of Md.
Barbour, of Va.	Hackley, of N. Y.
Storrs, of N. Y.	S. Moore, of Pa.
Cocke, of Tenn.	Stevens, of Con.
Rankin, of Miss.	Rogers, of Pa.
Archer, of Va.	Southard, of N. J.
Brown, of Ky.

Seventeen only being elected, there remained six members yet to be appointed.

Mr. CLAY moved, as the operation of balloting again to-morrow would be tedious and create delay, that the House agree, by general consent, to select the remaining six members from those having received the next highest number of votes.

It was also suggested that the Speaker appoint the remaining six; and the Speaker having intimated to the House that if the duty devolved on him, he should, from a sense of propriety, make the appointment from the names standing next highest to those elected on the list, the latter course was concurred in by the House, Mr. CLAY having withdrawn his motion in favor of that course.

It appeared then that the five following gentlemen are also elected on the committee, being the next highest on the list:

Messrs. Darlington, of Pa.	Messrs. Gross, of N. Y.
Pitcher, of N. Y.	Livermore, of N. H.
Sloan, of Ohio.

After these, Messrs. RANDOLPH and BALDWIN were next highest on the list, and having an equal number of votes, it remains for the Speaker to designate the gentleman who shall make the twenty-third member of the committee.

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 24.

Messrs. RANDOLPH, BALDWIN, and SMITH, of North Carolina, were appointed, in addition to those already named, to be of the joint committee on the Missouri subject; the first of these to fill up the number of the committee, and the two last to supply the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of Mr. LIVERMORE, and Mr. GROSS, of New York, who were excused from serving on the committee.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a memorial of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, and formerly, a merchant residing in Cadiz, in Spain, setting forth the nature and extent of his demands against the Government of that country, and praying that in such act or acts as may be passed for carrying into effect the stipulations contained in the treaty concluded and signed between the United States and Spain, on the 22d of February, 1819, and ratified, and the ratifications exchanged on the 22d instant, provision may be made for paying, without deduction, his claims which have been liquidated and acknowledged by the Government of that country, amounting to $491,153 33, according to the obligations of good faith contracted by the United States to Spain, under the express stipulations of the treaty aforesaid; which memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the current year; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. CUTHBERT gave notice that he would, on Monday next, move the House for leave to bring in a bill to provide for sick seamen in the port of Savannah, in the State of Georgia.

The engrossed bill authorizing the Secretary of State to issue a patent to Thomas Oxley, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the committee appointed on the 2d instant to inquire into the expediency of abolishing imprisonment for debt on process issuing from the courts of the United States, made a report, accompanied with a bill for that purpose; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report and bill are as follows:

The committee to whom was referred a resolution directing them to inquire into the expediency of abolishing imprisonment for debt on process issuing from the courts of the United States, report:

That the practice of imprisoning the body of a debtor, though sanctioned by very ancient usage, seems to have had its origin in an age of barbarism, and can only be considered an amelioration of that system by which the person of the debtor was subjected to be sold. Were it not wholly repugnant to every principle of free government, and incompatible with every sentiment of generous humanity, the exposure to sale of the debtor might seem more tolerable than his subjection to imprisonment. Policy and individual interest appear to combine to justify the servitude of the debtor, in preference to his seclusion from society, and his confinement in a dreary dungeon. By the former system, the profits of the labor of the debtor, brought into the common stock, would contribute to augment the wealth of the nation, and might eventually reimburse to the creditor the amount of his demand. It would certainly avoid those expenses which are annually incurred by subsisting so many unprofitable prisoners, without occupation, confined in the jails of the country. The unfortunate debtor, himself, might at least be blessed with the enjoyment of air and of light, and the occasional society of family and friends, from which, by the latter, he is oft-times most cruelly secluded, and closely immured within the walls of a prison; yet, who is there in this liberal age, and in this country, where the blessings of freedom are so extensively diffused, who would not recoil with horror and disgust from a proposition to expose to sale and servitude a fellow-citizen, whose misfortunes might subject him to the griping pressure of a hard creditor? And yet how few are there among the fortunate and successful, and even among those whom the benign precepts of our religion have taught "to melt at others' woe," who will be roused from apathy and indifference, when they daily learn that our jails are crowded with groups of these victims of misfortune; and who do not bury, in the oblivious round of frivolity and pleasure, even the momentary sensibilities which such a picture may produce! Nor are the rulers of this happy land free from the reproach which such a stain upon our code of laws cannot fail to imprint. Year after year has elapsed, and misery upon misery has been heaped upon these victims, and yet the hand of mercy is withheld. This crying indifference to the miseries of the wretched; this cold insensibility to the distress and suffering of our fellow-creatures, has too long stained the annals of our country, and blurred with the imputation of incongruity our boast of independence, liberty, and happiness, when contrasted with our practice of imprisonment for misfortune, not for crime. Rescued from this thralldom, the ingenious and the active, restored to a condition for energy and enterprise, may happily find means for accumulation, to the advantage of their creditors, and the subsistence in comfort for their families and themselves. Nor will it fail to add one other and important item to the long catalogue of blessings which spring from the fruitful source of happiness, founded in the liberal principles of free and equal government. Whilst, in other Governments, regulated by no such principles of equity and justice, imprisonment at the will of the despot may be enforced; whilst subject may prey upon subject, through the instrumentality of law and the extinction of his liberty; here let it be our boast that none can be deprived of his liberty but by the judgment of the law, upon conviction of crime; that none can be imprisoned by his fellow-citizen for his poverty or misfortune; here let the possessions and the effects of the debtor be made subject to his debts, but spare his person at least for the solace and the comfort of his beggared and impoverished family.

In some of the States of this Union laws exist whereby the unfortunate may be relieved from this confinement. It is an example worthy of imitation by this Government. This singular phenomenon is presented, that a man imprisoned under one jurisdiction, in the same country, may, by one code of laws, be liberated from confinement, whilst another, confined in the same prison, under another jurisdiction, is denied this privilege, and must continue in hopeless and irremediable occlusion. To rescue the character of this Government from such a stigma, is the object of the committee. Aware that great delicacy and difficulty are to be encountered in devising such a system as would conduce to the complete attainment of this desirable object, and at the same time combine with it the most ample security to the rights of individuals, your committee might be deterred from making the attempt, were they not encouraged by the benevolence of the object, and strengthened by the persuasion that any errors which may spring from the novelty of the trial, may in future be corrected by the experience which will be readily acquired in the progress of the experiment.

Believing that the remedy heretofore extended to the creditor, whereby he has been enabled to use this coercion for the recovery of his debts, is completely within the control of the National Legislature to alter and modify as in their discretion shall seem wise, and, whilst they endeavor to exempt the person of the debtor, they supply the most unrestrained control over his goods and effects, they have no scruple to recommend the interference of Congress. Nor have your committee been unmindful of one of the happy consequences which may result from this innovation, in the limitation of that unbounded credit which has so extensively prevailed, to the great injury, and even ruin, of many honest, but imprudent debtors. The diminution of this system, so fascinating and seductive to many, may prove a real blessing to those who so often disregard the strongest dictates of prudence and discretion.

Upon the whole, whilst your committee attempt to shield the unfortunate debtor from cruel and useless oppression, they propose, in the most ample and unrestrained manner, to subject all his property to the rights and interests of the creditor.

They therefore beg leave to report the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, imprisonment for debt on process issuing from the courts of the United States be, and the same is hereby, abolished; and, for the further enabling creditors to recover their just debts, Be it enacted, That the lands, tenements, goods, chattels, rights, and credits, of every debtor, shall be subject to be seized and taken, on execution, to satisfy any judgment, attachment, decree, or award of execution, rendered in any of the courts aforesaid. And the Supreme Court of the United States is hereby authorized and required to prescribe the necessary forms of all such process and executions, to be used in the courts aforesaid, as may be required to enable creditors to recover their just debts in every case whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not be construed to repeal any of the laws now existing which enable creditors to sue for and recover their debts, (except so far as relates to abolishing imprisonment for debt,) but shall be construed in aid of, and for the furtherance of, the prompt recovery of all just debts and demands whatever.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The amendment was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TRADE WITH THE INDIANS.

The engrossed bill to continue in force the bill to establish trading-houses with the Indian tribes was read a third time.

A motion was made by Mr. RANKIN, to recommend the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with instructions to report a bill for winding up the present establishments on the first day of September next.

On this motion there took place a debate, in which Messrs. SOUTHARD and WALKER opposed the motion, and Messrs. STORRS, TRACY, and FLOYD, supported it. The grounds on which the motion was opposed were, of course, the utility of this establishment; its value as a means of civilizing, and, at the same time, protecting the Indians, and the necessity of its present continuance, for the purpose of protecting the public property employed in it. The grounds taken on the other side, were, that the system was no longer recommended by the considerations which induced its first establishment; that it did not contribute to civilize the Indians, but rather to keep them in the hunter state, by holding out inducements to them to preserve furs; and that abuses were practised at the public trading establishments, by exacting profits not authorized by law, and not accounted for to the Government.

The motion to recommit, as above, was decided in the affirmative by a majority of fifty votes.

DUTY ON SALES AT AUCTION.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take into consideration the bill laying a duty on sales of merchandise at auction.

Out of this bill grew a debate, which lasted the whole day.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to strike out the proposed duty of two per cent. in order to insert a duty of one per cent.

This motion was supported by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, SILSBEE, and GORHAM, and opposed by Messrs. BALDWIN, SERGEANT, MEIGS, FOOT.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, being hostile to the whole bill, moved to strike out the first section; and then the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 26.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," reported the same with sundry amendments; which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to borrow a sum, not exceeding $4,500,000; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting an annual return of the militia of the United States, prepared by the Adjutant and Inspector General, conformably to the militia laws on that subject; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to continue in force for a further time the act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" "An act confirming the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge;" and "An act to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

MISSOURI.

Mr. CLAY, from the joint committee appointed on the Missouri subject, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition, that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of said State to Congress shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States in this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact: whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete.

The said resolution was twice read, and ordered to lie on the table, on motion of Mr. CLAY, with the avowed intention of calling for its consideration in the course of this day.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of certain purchasers of public lands.

Mr. FOOT moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to report a bill to amend the third section of the act of the 24th of April, 1820, entitled "An act making further provision for the sale of public lands," so as to fix the price at which the public lands shall be offered for sale at one dollar and sixty-four cents per acre; and also to provide for suspending, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands, for failure in completing the payment thereon.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Public Lands.

H. OF R.

This motion was opposed by Mr. ANDERSON, supported by Mr. FOOT, and negatived by no large majority.

Mr. Woon moved to amend the bill, so as to strike out that part which classifies the land debtors, deferring their payments for eight, six, or four years, &c.

After a few remarks from one or two gentlemen, for and against this motion, it was decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. ROBERTSON then, after some introductory remarks, moved to amend the bill—his object being avowed to be to exclude mere speculators from the benefit of its provisions—so as to confine the right of relinquishment to "as much thereof (of the land) as shall then be paid for, and no more nor less: Provided, That all persons who reside on or have improved, before the passage of this act, any section, half section, or quarter section, upon which the whole purchase-money has not been paid, shall have the privilege of relinquishing any legal division or subdivisions thereof."

This motion was earnestly opposed by Mr. HENDRICKS, and as zealously supported by Mr. ROBERTSON; and was finally negatived by a small majority.

Some other amendment was made to the bill, which the reporter did not distinctly understand.

Mr. MERCALF, of Kentucky, rose and said, the times had truly been such, especially in the Western country, as to involve almost indiscriminately the rich and the poor, the prudent and the imprudent. That almost all classes were suffering, and he was fearful those difficulties, embarrassments, and sufferings, were increasing. He rejoiced to see such a disposition prevailing to pass an act of general amnesty and relief to those individuals who had been beguiled into error by the injudicious and impolitic movements of the Government, and hoped it might be done without detriment to the public interest. If so, it was kind and parental in the Government to shield a portion of its citizens from inevitable ruin. He was delighted with the sentiments which had just been expressed by his friend from New York, (Mr. Woon,) who sat near him. He concurred most heartily in opinion with that gentleman "that it was better to settle than to sell the public lands." To people this vast region of country with innumerable happy human beings, ought to be the first and primary object of every statesman and politician, whose own happiness is so nearly connected with the happiness of his fellow men as to form a material part of it. The revenue to be derived from the sale of those lands was a matter of but secondary consideration. His reflections had long since conducted him to such a conclusion.

Mr. M. said he was also delighted with the sentiments which were yesterday expressed by both the advocates and opposers of this bill. All parties professed to be in favor of relieving the poor man and the actual settler. The only objection urged against the bill, was made upon the ground that the relief was too liberal to extensive purchasers, and to those whom gentlemen were pleased to denominate speculators. The relief of the poor man and the actual settler, was professedly the principal object of the advocates of the bill, but they insist upon the impracticability of distinguishing, or of drawing a line of demarcation between the various classes of purchasers.

Entertaining no doubt, said Mr. M., of the sincerity of gentlemen on both sides of the question, I cannot but feel a lively hope that the proposed amendment will meet with the approbation of all parties. All of us roundly assert our readiness to relieve from oppression the suffering poor; and none but the poor can be relieved by the amendment. That class of citizens which it embraced were generally stigmatized with the name of squatters; and it was said they had located themselves on the public lands in violation of the law. What law? A law, if any such there be, both unnatural and unjust. They were moved by the paramount law of necessity—by the strong and irresistible impulse of nature. They were destitute of the means with which to purchase in the interior or elsewhere. They had families to provide for—they moved to the wilderness; surmounted all the obstacles to which the first settlers are subjected; paved the way, he hoped, to the future way and residence of a numerous and happy population. In doing so they had thrown themselves upon the mercy of the Government; and who can be more entitled to legislative protection? All those, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. M., who live in the same age with you and me, are no doubt deeply interested in a fair and proper disposition of the public land. And future generations are probably more interested than the present.

The soil, the territory which we are about to dispose of, may be considered in the light of a goodly inheritance—a rich legacy bequeathed to us by our common parent, who is all kindness, for the use and benefit of those who wish to cultivate it. And I am persuaded that the happiness and prosperity for centuries to come, will, to some extent at least, depend on the wisdom and justice of those to whom the power of disposing of this vast tract of country is delegated.

Then will it not be well that we should endeavor to base our measures on principles of equity and justice? And that we should suffer no part of the soil to be diverted from its legitimate purposes to that of speculation or monopoly.

History informs us that when the German and Scythian nations conquered and took possession of a portion of the Roman empire, a few great military chieftains usurped themselves the whole of the lands. Add to this the laws of primogeniture, and of entailments that succeeded, and who that does not close his eyes against the light can be at a loss to discern the causes that enabled the few to bind in chains not to be broken countless millions of their fellow sojourners here, and to make them bow in base and degrading submission for a succession of ages—for many centuries—to their arbitrary and despotic rule. Will not the same causes produce the same effects? And what is the difference, whether your landed domain, this joint inheritance of all, shall be seized upon by military force, by unjust laws, or by the magic power of cash in hand?

But, perhaps, I may be told that we have no laws of primogeniture—no entailments; that landed estate is alienable, and even subject to the payment of debts; and, therefore, that there is no danger of creating a feudal aristocracy; and at all events, that the time is very remote. But, it does seem to me to be a solemn duty we owe to ourselves and to posterity, in the first place, not to deliver over all the rich and valuable portions of this great national domain, so as to exclude from a just participation all those who are without money, lest those to whom it is given, should, in time, discover the art of securing it to themselves in large quantities, to the great injury of the multitude who may live in a future day and generation.

What is this territory, this soil, but a vast capital in the hands of the nation? And a capital that ought not to remain inactive as long as there is a solitary individual laborer who wishes to cultivate it unemployed. Is it not by the application of labor to capital that a nation contributes to the comfort, and happiness, and wealth of its citizens, and, consequently, to its own greatness and grandeur? Then shall we withhold a small portion of this vast capital of which we possess so much from the use and benefit of those who wish to apply their labor to it; who have already made some improvements which you are about to wrest from them by the strong arm of power; who are extremely poor, and who, if they are thus driven out from beneath their only shelter, have no other resource beneath the sun from which they can expect to procure the means of comfortable living and of raising a family? And shall it be said that the acts of a great, a magnanimous, and free people are more oppressive, and less humane, than were the acts of His Catholic Majesty touching this matter? We all know that, to the man with a family, he gave without price four hundred arpens, and fifty additional arpens for each child, on condition that he would settle upon, cultivate, and improve it. To the single man, who had been four years a resident, who was industrious, and under a good moral character, he gave two hundred arpens on the same conditions. But, if he could obtain a certificate from a meritorious old farmer, stating that he was willing to give him his daughter in marriage; in that case, he was entitled to his two hundred arpens as soon as the marriage contract was consummated, though he had not been so long a resident. Admirable policy! and well calculated to prevent a fearful and dangerous increase of old bachelors in the land. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. M., that I am surrounded even on this floor by a number, I will not say of old, that would be an uncourteous expression, but I will say of honorable bachelors—bachelors who have become so from choice, and not from compulsion. But, from my knowledge of these my worthy and respectable friends, of their generosity, of the nobleness of their feelings, and of their gallantry, too, I am warranted in saying that they would be among the very last who would interpose the slightest barrier to matrimony, or make bachelors from compulsion. I, therefore, confidently calculate on their assistance in removing every obstacle of the kind alluded to out of the way of our young but poor fellow-citizens.

This policy of the Spanish Government, in my estimation, sprung from the soundest suggestions of wisdom; and the voice of humanity too, was consulted in its adoption.

Now, let us look at the condition of a vast population in the Union, and, though we shall find much cause for gratulating and rejoicing, we shall also find that much remains to be done, for thousands and tens of thousands of our fellow-citizens.

If I am not mistaken, it has lately been said on this floor that at least one-half of the free white citizens of one of the old States were deprived of the inestimable right of suffrage because they were not possessed of the landed, or some other property qualification.

Other old States have adopted similar provisions; and with their State regulations, however repugnant to my feelings, I have nothing to do. I only mention it incidentally in adverting to the condition of our common country. It will be admitted, I presume, that, in all the old States, and, in some of the new, there is a vast proportion of the citizens who own no land, who are destitute of house and home; who cannot find employment in manufacturing establishments, or otherwise, by which to procure the means of comfortable living and of raising a family.

What is the language of an aged patriot and statesman, (who was once President of the United States), in the late Convention of Massachusetts? It is that "more than half of the citizens of that State have no property." Mark this language well—"more than half have no property." Here, then, are objects upon whom their representatives might legitimately exercise all their benevolence.

But, sir, let the Government beware of a policy so oppressive, lest in the end we endanger if not subvert the liberties of the country. Is there no danger in a loose, disjointed, floating population, whose interests are utterly disregarded? With all the deference and all the respect so justly due to gentlemen with whom it is my lot to differ in opinion on this subject, I must say that I would not dispose of the public land with an eye solely to the immediate revenue derivable from it; but, I would guard most cautiously against either speculation or monopoly.

With all his superior intelligence and his knowledge, man is, perhaps, less consistent with himself than any other animal. He is blessed with certain powers to do good; and, notwithstanding the narrow and contracted limits within which these powers are circumscribed, yet if he would give a proper direction to his energies, if he would exert them on objects within his sphere of action, as would seem to be the duty of a rational being, his virtues, his benevolence, and his philanthropy, would be seen, and felt, and acknowledged with feelings of gratitude by his fellow men. But he overlooks the real and substantial good which he has in his power to render with certainty and effect, and in search of remote and visionary objects he travels on in trackless mazes,

"Led on by Fancy's meteor ray,
By passion driven."

Though the poet's other couplet, I fear,

"But yet the light that leads astray Is light from Heaven," is wholly inapplicable to such an individual. He seems to have some unsubstantial and unattainable object always in view. He is tickled with the idea of an Abolition Society, well pleased with a Colonization Society, (in which I wish him success with all my heart,) and he thinks he has discharged his duty to his Maker by promoting the views and giving an impulse to missionary societies. Yes; to missionary societies—objects laudable enough in themselves. The restless mind must have employment; and by the evening's fire-side the Christian, the philosopher, and the philanthropist, may indulge in these pleasing but abstract and speculative views and theories—and a pleasant dream that night is the fruit of their labors, and, I fear, their only reward.

Shall the practical statesman, too, when he is contributing, with his purse and his influence, to the extension of his religion among the heathen—while he is commiserating the condition of the unfortunate and devoted African, and magnifying his merits by making them the constant theme of his conversation, the seasoning and chief ingredient to his eloquence, the unceasing burden of his song; and that, too, without even pretending that he has made the slightest discovery of the means by which his condition is to be ameliorated—while his bosom is burning with the most ardent desire for the success of the South American Patriots in their generous struggle for self-government;—shall he, too, I say—the practical statesman, with all these seemingly generous and noble feelings, spurning dull reality, neglecting to be serviceable where it is in his power to be so, overlooking those immediately around him, who ought to be the first objects of his care and his solicitude—raise himself on the pinions of fancy, penetrate the clouds, and from thence attempt to direct his idle gaze to the remotest corners of the habitable globe, in search of a Hindoo, a Brahmin, a Tartar, a Hottentot, or of some such object, upon whom to bestow his benevolence! If he does this thing, sir, will he not in the end be apt to share the fate of an ambitious one of old, who was cast down from a very desirable height for his arrogance and his presumption? Or, at least, like the dove from the ark, (the innocence of its nature excepted,) may he not expect to return at last among his brethren, without having found whereupon to rest the sole of his foot?

Now, in the disposal of the public lands, he has

it in his power to render certain, substantial, and lasting services to thousands and tens of thousands of the sons and daughters of men—"bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh," his neighbors—I mean, his white neighbors, his relations, children of the Republic, individuals who would rejoice to have a home upon those lands, where they might cultivate the soil in peace, and raise, for the benefit of their country, a virtuous, a laborious, agricultural, and republican family. I confess, sir, said Mr. M., that, if I could have my way, instead of pushing off these poor individuals from the small quantity of public lands they now occupy—instead of turning them out to the buffetings of the pitiless storm, and violently wresting from them their little cabins and other improvements, I would consider that we already had land enough in the market, and I would invite a stream of population from the old States. Many Eastern boys and girls among them, who, though poor at first, and "owning no property," would, in time, like so many lofty pines or sturdy oaks, with roots shot deep beneath the ground, defy the howling storm—defy the rude assault of their country's foes. Yes! I would plant the young couple, whose whole estate consisted in nothing more than a horse, a cow, a bed, and gun—perhaps not so much as that—but who had health and strength to labor, while their hearts were warm, and cheeks still glowing with the blood of youth, far from the haughty landlord's frown, where they might rear their lovely offspring, and learn them how, in the paths of virtue, of innocence, of patriotism, and of independence, too, to walk with souls erect, acknowledging no superior, save Him alone who made us all—who made this land for the use of those who might wish to cultivate it; and of which they can only be deprived by the mistaken policy or injustice of their fellow-men.

Mr. METCALF then moved to amend the bill, by adding thereto the following as a new section:

"Be it further enacted, That every person, or the representatives of every person, who, prior to the passage of this act, did actually inhabit or cultivate a tract of unappropriated land belonging to the United States, shall be entitled to a preference in becoming the purchaser of one quarter section, including his or their settlement, at the minimum price of the Government. And the fact of such settlement being established in conformity to existing laws, before the Register and Receiver in either of the land districts of the United States, before the day upon which the same is exposed to public sale, the said sale shall be suspended for the term of — years: Provided, however, That every person who it shall appear is the owner of any other land shall be excluded from the benefit of this act."

And the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative by a large majority.

The bill was then further amended, on the motion of Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia.

Mr. MCCOY moved to amend the bill by striking out the whole of the bill, after the enacting clause, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"That the operation of all acts providing for the sale of the lands of the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended until the 30th day of April, 1822.

in favor of purchasers of public lands, at any of the land offices of the United States, for any instalment or instalments, remaining unpaid, or which may fall due, previous to the day aforesaid."

The question being taken on this motion, it was negatived—68 to 40.

Mr. CANNON moved to amend the bill so as to allow to those who purchased lands at a rate less than three dollars per acre the same discount as is allowed to purchasers above that rate, and to reduce that discount from thirty-three and a third per cent. to twenty-five per cent.

This amendment was supported by Mr. CANNON, and spoken upon by Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. HARDIN, and was agreed to—69 to 53.

Mr. ANDERSON then moved to amend the bill, (since the system of the Senate had been broken in upon) so as to strike out all that proposes an absolute reduction of 25 per cent. on the amount due by each purchaser of public land, his object being to substitute for it an allowance of discount for prompt payment.

This motion was opposed by Mr. CLAY, and supported by Messrs. ANDERSON, FULLER, and COBB. The vote thereon was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer, of Maryland, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Bloomfield, Bryan, Buffum, Case, Cobb, Cocke, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Denison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Gray, Guyon, Hall of New York, Hardin, Hibshman, Hill, Hooks, Hostetter, Little, Livermore, Macclay, McCoy, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Mercer, Metcalf, Monell, Montgomery, S. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Street, Strong of Vermont, Strong of New York, Swearingen, Tarr, Tyler, and Van Rensselaer—70.

So the motion of Mr. ANDERSON was agreed to. On motion of Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, the House then agreed to reconsider the amendment, adopted on Friday last, on the motion of Mr. HARDIN; and Mr. H. then withdrew the same.

Mr. ANDERSON then moved to amend the bill, by adding thereto a provision contemplating the allowance of a considerable deduction (37½ per cent.) for prompt payment of the money due.

This motion was opposed by Mr. CLAY, as going to favor moneyed men only, who have no occasion for indulgence from the Government. He concluded, by moving that the bill and amendment lie on the table, with a view of taking up the Missouri resolution, which, he hoped, there was a general wish to see acted upon this day.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI.

The House then took up the resolution, as above reported by the joint committee on the Missouri subject.

Mr. CLAY briefly explained the views of the committee, and the considerations which induced them to report the resolution. He considered this resolution as being the same in effect as that which had been previously reported by the former committee of thirteen members; and stated that the committee on the part of the Senate was unanimous, and that on the part of this House nearly so, in favor of this resolution.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, delivered his objections to the resolution, on the ground of the defect of power in the Congress of the United States to authorize or require the Legislature of a State, once admitted into the Union, to do the act proposed by this resolution to be demanded of the Legislature of Missouri.*

* To the Editors of the National Intelligencer :

GENTLEMEN : In your paper of Tuesday last, stating the proceedings of the House of Representatives, on the resolution for the admission of Missouri into the Union, is the following erroneous paragraph : "Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts, delivered his objections to the resolution, on the ground of the defect of power in the Congress of the United States to authorize or require the Legislature of a State, once admitted into the Union, to do the act proposed by this resolution to be demanded of the Legislature of Missouri."

I did not object to the resolution on the ground in this paragraph mentioned. But, on that occasion, I did say that Congress had no power to authorize those who are called the Legislature of Missouri, to declare the assent of said State to the fundamental condition contained in said resolution; neither had the people of Missouri given their said Legislature authority to give any such assent; their constitution, by which they are to be governed, directly forbids it; therefore, if this Legislature should give their assent to this fundamental condition, it would not be binding on the people of Missouri. If Missouri is to be admitted on this fundamental condition, under the power of Congress, why have this assent transmitted to the President? Let Congress empower the gentlemen Missouri has sent here as Senators and Representative, by their solemn public act, to declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition; and let them transmit this to Congress, and have the whole business settled at once. This would be equally as binding upon the people of Missouri as the other.

I also said that Congress, at the last session, passed an act authorizing the people of Missouri to call a convention, form a constitution, and be admitted into the Union upon certain conditions; one of which was,

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, replied to the arguments of Mr. ADAMS, and defended the resolution from the objections set up against it. He earnestly invited the House to support the resolution, and thus to end the distracting and painful controversy respecting Missouri.

Mr. ADAMS spoke in explanation.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, next obtained the floor, and delivered his sentiments with much earnestness, and pretty much at large, in opposition to the resolution, on the ground as well of its terms, as of hostility to the toleration of slavery in any shape, or under any pretence, by the legislation of Congress.

[During the progress of this speech, Mr. ALLEN was called to order by Mr. TRIMBLE, because discussing not the question before the House, but a question decided at the last session. The SPEAKER, however, overruled this objection.]

Mr. ALLEN concluded, by moving to amend the resolution by striking out the word "citizen," wherever it occurs in the resolution, as above printed, and to insert in lieu thereof, "free negro or mulatto."

that her constitution should not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The people of Missouri did call a convention, and this convention did virtually declare that Missouri would not come into the Union upon the conditions proposed by Congress in said act. But they formed a constitution which the Senate and this House, by their votes, have declared to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Missouri, not accepting the terms of admission set forth in the act of the last session, that act, so far as relates to Missouri is at an end, and Missouri is just where she began; and, if she desires to come into the Union, she must begin anew, unless Congress will admit her into the Union with a constitution repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. These constitutions, so far as they are repugnant to each other, cannot both stand; one of them must give way. In forming this compact for the admission of Missouri into the Union, the Congress of the United States is one party and Missouri the other, and in this particular case their powers are equal. Missouri has as good a right to say upon what terms she will become a member of the Union, as for Congress to say upon what terms she shall be received. When one party proposes terms, and the other accepts them, there is a union and binding on both parties. Missouri, in her constitution, has said upon what terms she will become a member of the Union; if she be admitted, Congress must admit her on these terms, and no other.

Should Congress admit Missouri into the Union upon a fundamental condition, which has not been agreed to by the people of Missouri, but is in direct opposition to what they, in their constitution, have declared are the terms upon which they would come into the Union, and should enforce this condition, Congress would usurp a power over Missouri, it not having been given by the Constitution of the United States.

These are some of the remarks I made on that occasion, and I will trouble you with these only, which tend to place the said paragraph in its true light.

Your very humble servant,

MARCH 1.

BENJAMIN ADAMS.

Mr. R. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, then required the previous question, believing that this subject had been so long debated, as to require that it be decided, in one way or another, without further consumption of the time of the House.

Ninety-five members having risen to second this motion, and the yeas and nays having been required thereon by Mr. RANDOLPH—

The question was stated in the following form: "Shall the main question be now put?" and was decided—for the previous question 109, against it 50, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Maryland, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Beecher, Blackledge, Bloomfield, Boden, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Buffum, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Claggett, Clark, Clay, Cocke, Crawford, Crowell, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Dewitt, Eddy, Fisher, Foot, Forrest, Fuller, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hackley Hardin, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Hostetter, Jones of Tennessee, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lincoln, Little, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, McCullough, McLean of Kentucky, Marchand, Meech, Meigs, Metcalf, Monell, Montgomery, R. The main question was then put, to wit: Shall the resolution be engrossed and read a third time? and passed in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 82, as follows:

The resolution was then ordered to be read a third time this day, but not without considerable opposition.

The resolution was accordingly read a third time, and put on its passage.

Mr. RANDOLPH, in a speech of some twenty minutes, delivered the reasons why he should not vote for the resolution.

The final question was then taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Blackledge, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Bryan, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Ford, Gray, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of N. So the resolution was passed, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. CLAY moved that the House do now resume the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the purchasers of public lands, prior to the 1st day of July, 1820;" and, the question being stated thereon, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 27.

Mr. CULBRETH presented a printed copy of a report made to the Senate of the State of Maryland on the 30th of January, 1821, and assented to by that body, and by the House of Delegates on the 13th instant, relative to appropriations of public land for the purposes of education; to which is attached resolutions expressive of the opinion of the General Assembly of Maryland, "that each of the United States has an equal right to participate in the benefit of the public lands, the common property of the Union." That the States in whose favor Congress have not made appropriations of land for the purposes of education, are entitled to such appropriations as will correspond, in a just proportion, with those heretofore made in favor of other States; and that their Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States be requested to lay the said report and resolutions before their respective Houses, and use their endeavors to procure the passage of an act to carry into effect the just principles therein set forth; which report and resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KENT presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, praying that the said bank may be included within the provisions of the bill which has passed the Senate, and is now pending before this House, to renew the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia; which petition was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Alexander Roddy, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and to inform him of his re-election, reported that the committee had performed that duty, and were informed by the President that he would attend in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday next, at 12 o'clock, to take the oath of office prescribed in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. STORRS, from the joint committee appointed to report what subjects before the two Houses are proper to be acted upon during the present session, made a report; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for carrying into execution the treaty between the United State and Spain, concluded at Washington, the 22d of February, 1819; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to authorize the appointment of certain Indian agents;" "An act to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate certain boundaries;" "An act to establish the district of Blakeley;" and "An act providing for the adjudication and payment of claims arising under the Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act to continue in force, for a further time, the act entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" "An act to authorize the appointment of certain Indian agents;" "An act confirming the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge;" "An act to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia;" "An act to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate certain boundaries;" "An act to establish the district of Blakeley;" and "An act providing for the adjudication and payment of claims arising under the Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty;" were severally read the first and second time, and referred; the first and second to the Committee on Indian Affairs; the third to the Committee on Private Land Claims; the fourth to the Committee for the District of Columbia; the fifth to the Committee on the Public Lands; the sixth to the Committee of Commerce; and the seventh to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill further to amend the several acts relative to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, was taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, the bill for the relief of Robert Purdy was passed through a Committee of the Whole; when

Mr. COBB moved to postpone the bill indefinitely. This motion gave rise to debate, in which Messrs. COBB, MOORE, CANNON, ROSS, MCCOY, RHEA, COCKE, METCALF, CULPEPER, BALDWIN, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, took part. [From the debate, it appears that this bill proposes to indemnify Colonel Purdy from a judgment obtained against him by an individual, who was the keeper of a disorderly house on the skirts of an encampment of the army, which house, in order to preserve the discipline of the army, Colonel P. had caused to be destroyed.]

The vote being taken on the question of indefinite postponement, was decided in the affirmative, 57 to 47. So the bill was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, with a view to acting on the great mass of private bills before the House, moved that the House now have a recess of two hours, with a view to acting on business of that description on meeting again. This motion was negatived, 49 to 46.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. A. SMYTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill to reduce the Military Peace Establishment, reported the same with sundry amendments thereto—one of which was a section adopting for the government of the army and militia, when in service, the system of Regulations for the Army, compiled by Major General Scott—the other amendments were of a minor character.

The amendments reported by the Military Committee were severally agreed to.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out of the Senate's amendments the provision for "one Major General, with two Aids-de-Camp;" which motion was supported by Messrs. COCKE, FOOT, COBB, HARDIN, LITTLE, MALLARY, and R. MOORE, on principle and expediency; and it was opposed by Messrs. BARBOUR, STORRS, CLAY, and NELSON, of Virginia, on the ground that as the Senate had made the amendment, they would probably adhere to it; that if disagreed to by this House, it might put the whole bill in jeopardy; that much would still have been done in the way of retrenchment even if this provision passed, and it would be better not to endanger the bill by rejecting this provision. Mr. KINSEY opposed the motion on principle, deeming a Major General necessary to make the proposed system perfect and fully efficient. After an ineffectual call, by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, for the previous question—the debate having continued some time—

The question was taken on striking out the provision for the Major General, and was negatived, by yeas and nays. For striking out, 73; against it 79, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Ball, Bateman, Bayly, Blackledge, Boden, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Cannon, Clagett, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Fay, Fisher, Foot, Forrest, Gray, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hardin, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Hostetter, Jackson, Jones of Virginia, Kendall, Kent, Kinsley, Lathrop, Little, Livermore, McCoy, McCreary, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, Metcalf, R. Moore, Murray, Neale, Patterson, Phelps, Plumer, Rankin, Rhea, Richards, Shaw, Stevens, Strong of Vermont, Tarr, Terrell, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Upham, Walker, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina—73.

Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Southard, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Tracy, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Udree, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Wendover, Whitman, and Wood—79.

Mr. COBB moved further to amend the said amendment by striking out the word two wherever it occurs in the eighth line of the second section, and inserting in each place the word one; so that there should be one first lieutenant, and one second lieutenant, to each company of artillery, instead of two first and two second lieutenants.—Negatived.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to strike out the provision "for one Judge Advocate, with a salary of two thousand dollars;" and the motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. CANNON then moved so to amend the amendments of the Senate, as, instead of four regiments of artillery and seven regiments of infantry, to reduce the number of regiments to two of artillery and four of infantry; and to make the companies consist of eighty-four, instead of forty-two men. After some remarks by Mr. C. in support of his amendments,

The motion was negatived without a division.

The amendments of the Senate, as amended by this House, were then agreed to; and ordered to be returned to the Senate for concurrence in the amendments of this House thereto.

THE RELIEF BILL—PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of the purchasers of the public lands—the following section proposed to be added to the bill, by Mr. ANDERSON, being still under consideration, viz:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where complete payment of the whole sum due, or which may become due, for any tract of land purchased from the United States as aforesaid, shall be made on or before the — day of —, a deduction at the rate of thirty-seven and a half per centum shall be allowed on the sum so remaining.

Mr. CROWELL moved to fill the blank in the amendment with the 30th of September, 1823; which was negatived—yeas 9.

The blank was then, on motion of Mr. McLEAN, filled with the 30th of September, 1822.

Mr. McCoy made an unsuccessful motion to strike out thirty-seven and a half, and insert twenty-five per cent.

These questions, as well as the merits of the amendment, were largely discussed by Messrs. ANDERSON, CLAY, HARDIN, McCoy, Cook, and McLEAN.

The amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON was finally adopted by yeas and nays—yeas 72, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Beecher, Boden, Brown, Brush, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cook, Crow-ford, Crowell, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Denison, Earle, Fay, Fisher, Garnett, Gorham, Hackley, Hardin, Hendricks, Herrick, Hill, Hostetter, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Livermore, McCullough, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, Montgomery, S. Moore, T. J. Moore, Moseley, Patterson, Pitcher, Plumer, Rankin, Reed, Rhea, Rogers, Ross, Settle, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, A. Smyth of Virginia, Street, Strong of New York, Tarr, Tyler, Van Rensselaer, and Wallace—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Buftum, Butler of New Hampshire, Case, Clagett, Culbreth, Dane, Dewitt, Dickinson, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Ford, Gray, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hall of New York, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, Meech, Morton, Murray, Neale, Newton, Parker of Massachusetts, Phelps, Philson, Rich, Richards, Ringgold, Robertson, Russ, Simkins, Smith of Maryland, Stevens, Swearingen, Terrell, Tompkins, Tracy, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Udree, Upham, Wendover, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, Wood—62.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time to-morrow.

DUTIES ON FRENCH VESSELS.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill to exempt French ships from certain duties.

Mr. N. explained the object of the bill. By the original act, time enough had not been allowed to give notice to French vessels of the passage of the act; in consequence of which, a few vessels had found their way into our ports, and the extraordinary duty had thus been levied in cases not intended by the act. This bill was to provide for a remission of the amount of extra duty in such cases.

Mr. BALDWIN said that he thought the original law wrong; but if right at the last session, it could not be wrong now. Why not let the experiment go on and be fairly tried? He wished that the course of the Government should be uniform; that it should be either one way or the other. If the law be right in itself, said he, let it stand. If not, let it be repealed at once.

Mr. MALLARY said there was nothing whatever in this bill which went to defeat the legitimate effect of the act of last session, but rather to make that act what it was intended to be, an act with fair notice to the parties. Mr. M. further explained the cases to which the act applied, and expressed his hope that the bill would be passed.

Mr. CLAY expressed the same sentiments. If a partial and rigorous construction had been given to the act of last session, the effects of it ought to be remedied. He was the more disposed to this course, since it was understood that an arrangement was in negotiation between the two Governments, which would produce a reciprocal revocation of the extra duties by both Governments. France, Mr. C. said, is our natural friend, and he should be glad that Congress would, by the passage of this bill, add another motive to a conclusion of the arrangement which is necessary to a good understanding between the two Governments.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was subsequently read a third time and passed, without a division.

Mr. BALDWIN then moved that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to take into consideration the bill laying a duty on sales at auction. This motion was negatived.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The House then, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the act for the gradual increase of the Navy, so as to reduce the annual appropriation therefor from one million to half a million of dollars per annum, and extend the term of appropriation from three to six years.

Mr. BARBOUR indicated his intention to propose an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to limit the reduced appropriation to three years; his object being to have the ships contemplated to be built, so far completed as regarded the frames of them, as to be in a state to be secured and covered in by houses built over them. Mr. B. explained at large his views of this subject, the leading feature of which was, that however advisable it might be to build more ships, it was not necessary at present to put them afloat. He therefore moved that the Committee rise, with a view to moving that the bill lie on the table, giving notice that at 12 o'clock to-morrow he should call it up, with a view to moving the amendment which he had indicated.

Mr. FULLER rose merely to say, that when the amendment should be before the House, he should endeavor to show why, in his opinion, the bill should not be adopted at this session at least.

The Committee then rose, and, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the bill was laid on the table.

WEDNESDAY, February 28.

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland, from the Committee on Expenditures, in the Navy Department, made a report upon the subject of the expenditures in that Department; which was laid on the table.

Mr. ARCHER, from the same committee, also reported a bill providing for the pay and reorganization of the Marine Corps; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish the district of Blakeley;" reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House entitled "An act for the relief of James Brady;" "An act for the relief of Nicholas Jarrott," with amendments; and they have also passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to John Gooding and James Williams;" "An act for the relief of General Robert Swartwout;" "An act to authorize the clerk of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana to appoint a deputy to aid him in the discharge of the duties of his office;" "An act for the relief of J. L. B. Macarty;" and "An act for the passage to the credit of Nathaniel Allen of certain moneys by him disbursed in the public service;" in which amendments, and five last mentioned bills, they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act for the relief of James Brady," was concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Nicholas Jarrott," were also concurred in by the House.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to John Gooding and James Williams;" "An act for the relief of General Robert Swartwout;" "An act for the relief of J. L. B. Macarty;" "An act for passing to the credit of Nathaniel Allen certain moneys by him disbursed in the public service;" and "An act to authorize the clerk of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana to appoint a deputy to aid him in the discharge of the duties of his office;" were severally read twice, and referred, the first to the Committee of Ways and Means; the second, third, and fourth, to the Committee of Claims; and the fifth to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the charters of certain Banks in the District of Columbia," was read the third time and passed—Yeas 74, nays 34.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act further to amend the several acts relative to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported without amendment the bill to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate certain boundaries. Mr. SIBLEY moved to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole, in order that he might have a proper opportunity of stating his objections to it.

Mr. HENDRICKS opposed the motion on the ground of its tendency to defeat the bill. But the motion prevailed, and the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, reported without amendment the bill from the Senate to amend the bill for the relief of James L. Cathcart; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. BLOOMFIELD, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions were discharged from the consideration of all the subjects which have been referred to them, and not yet reported on.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported without amendment the act concerning Thomas Shields and others; and it was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Ways and Means.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a detailed report upon the state of the finances; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, as relates to the finances, respectfully submit to the following report: The total net receipts of the Treasury, during the year 1820, amounted to - - - $20,969,001

State of the Treasury, public revenue, and appropriations, for the service of the year 1821.

1. The State of the Treasury.

The amount of available money in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, agreeably to report of the committee, dated the 6th February, was believed to be - - - - - $476,271 18

From which must be deducted amount of deposits in the Bank of Vincennes, which it cannot pay - - 214,808 00

Leaving available funds in the Treasury, on 1st day of January, the sum of 261,463 18

2. The revenue for 1821.

Customs, as estimated by the Committee of Ways and Means, in their report of Feb. 6th $15,005,328

Lands, estimated by the committee - 800,000

Internal taxes, agreeably to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury - 100,000

Bank dividend, by the same - 350,000

Post office receipts from debts of banks, and other incidental receipts - - 100,000

Estimated amount of means available for the service of the year 1821 - $16,355,328

3. Amount of the several appropriations for 1821.

1. Permanent appropriations, viz:

Principal and interest of public debt - - - - - $5,477,776
Gradual increase of the navy 500,000
Arming the militia - - 200,000
Indian annuities - - 152,000
Indian trading houses - - 19,000
Civilization of Indians - - 10,000

6,358,776

2. Temporary, agreeably to the several appropriations made for the service of the present year.

For the service of the navy - $2,209,093
For the military - - 4,936,451
Civil Department - - 1,517,352
Public Buildings - - 90,445
Private claims, estimated at - 200,000
Treaty of Ghent, presumed - 45,000
Spanish Treaty, supposed - 100,000

9,098,341

15,457,117

Leaving an excess of receipts, over the expenses authorized by law, of - - $898,211

4. State of the Finances.

Actual balance against the Treasury, on the 1st day of January; see report of the Committee of Ways and Means - $4,579,094

To which must be added amount due by the Vincennes bank, and which will not be available for the service of the present year; see Secretary's letter of the 12th instant - - - - 214,808

Actual deficit to be provided for - - 4,793,902

To supply that deficit there may be applied the surplus of the estimated receipts, in 1821, over the expenditures authorized by the several acts of appropriation passed during the present session, which is presumed by the preceding view, to amount to the sum of - - 898,211

And the available funds in the Treasury on the 1st day of January - - - - 261,463

1,159,674

Leaving an actual deficit to be provided for by loan, of - - - - 3,634,228

But if the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury should prove correct, to wit: that the customs will yield only fourteen millions, then there must be added (the difference between his estimate and that of the committee) the sum of - - - - 1,005,328

$4,639,556

The committee, under all these circumstances of difficulty and doubt, submit a bill authorizing a loan for four millions five hundred thousand dollars.

The House will perceive a difference between the present report and that of the 6th of February, arising out of the expenditures being bottomed in the one as estimates, and the other as the actual sums appropriated for the service of the present year; and in the estimate of receipts for the land during the year 1821, the committee have, in their present report, assumed only one-half the amount of their former, which was taken from the estimate of the Treasury. The committee do not pretend to much personal knowledge on the subject, but, from conversation with well informed gentlemen from the West and South, and a correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury, they were induced to believe it would be unsafe to rely on a larger sum than eight hundred thousand dollars to be received for land during the present year. The House will also perceive a difference in the available fund arising from the default of the Bank of Vincennes.

Retrenchments in the public expenditures.

The deductions made from the estimates of the several departments for 1820, amounted to the sum of - - - - $2,180,000

Those for 1821, amounted to - - - 2,317,155

4,447,155

Civil - - - - 116,508

Military - - - - 1,481,064

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Naval, including five hundred thousand dollars from gradual increase - - - 719,583

Total amount of retrenchments in the annual public expenditures during the sixteenth Congress - - - - $4,447,155

It will be perceived, by the preceding view, that the expenditures for the present year are less than fifteen and a half millions. The committee are of opinion that those of the next year will not exceed fifteen millions, for, during that year, the whole effect of the reduction of the Army will be felt; that reduction has reduced the expense of the present year $561,000, and will reduce that of the next, nearly $1,000,000. The Revolutionary pensioners will cost in future $200,000 less than the sum appropriated for the present year. In fine, the committee are of opinion that the receipts will, (if no unforeseen change should happen,) greatly exceed the annual expenditures.

All which the committee respectfully submit.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of public lands prior to the first July, 1820," was read the third time as amended; and on the question, shall it pass? It was passed in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Anderson, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Beecher, Bloomfield, Brown Brush, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cook, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Dewitt, Dickinson, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Eustis, Fay, Folger, Ford, Fuller, Gorham, Gross of New York, Hackley, Hardin, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hill, Hooks, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Kendall, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lathrop, Maclay, McCullough, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Moigs, Mercer, Metcalf, Monell, Montgomery, R. Moore, S. Moore, T. L. Moore, Moseley, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Patterson, Pinckney, Plumer, Rankin, Rhea, Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Rogers, Ross, Sergeant, Settle, Silsbee, Simkins, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, Street, Strong of New York, Swearingen, Tarr, Tucker of Virginia, Tyler, Udree, Van Rensselaer, Walker, and Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Bateman, Blackledge, Bryan, Buffum, Butler of New Hampshire, Case, Claggett, Cocke, Culpeper, Denison, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Foot, Gray, Guyon, Hall of New York, Hibshman, Lincoln, Little, Livermore, McCoy, McCreary, Morton, Newton, Parker of Massachusetts, Phelps, Philson, Richards, Russ, Stevens, Tomlinson, Tucker of South Carolina, Upham, Wendover, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina.

The bill was ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence in the amendments.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported, without amendment, the bill from the Senate for continuing the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

16th CON. 2d SESS.—40

[This bill provides for the continuation of the charters of the Bank of the Metropolis, the Bank of Washington, the Patriotic Bank in the City of Washington; the Union Bank, the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, the Bank of Columbia, in Georgetown; the Bank of Alexandria, and the Farmers' Bank, in Alexandria, until the year 1836. It authorizes the consolidation of the Union Bank of Alexandria with the Bank of Potomac, and extends the charter of the said united bank to the same term as the others. The Central Bank is allowed to proceed forthwith to liquidate and close all the concerns of the corporation, and for that purpose its corporate authority is continued for five years.]

Mr. COCKE moved to lay the bill on the table, but afterwards withdrew the motion; which was renewed by Mr. COBB, opposed by Mr. HARDIN, and Mr. MERCER, and negatived by a large majority.

Mr. COCKE moved to amend the bill so as to extend the charters to 1826, instead of 1836, being five years instead of fifteen.

This motion gave rise to a short debate.

The motion was supported by Mr. COCKE and Mr. COBB, and opposed by Mr. HARDIN, Mr. MERCER, and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia—and was negatived—yeas 68, nays 47.

Mr. EDWARDS moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions so to amend it as to authorize any stockholder, if he thinks proper, to withdraw himself from any of the said companies, and to receive such funds as he may have therein. Negatived—yeas 30.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time this day, and was subsequently read a third time and passed.

INDIAN TRADE.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, pursuant to instruction, an amendment to the Indian trade bill, to the following effect:

"That the Secretary of War shall cause to be disposed of at public sale all the property, now belonging to the United States, employed in the Indian trade, and the proceeds thereof to be paid into the public Treasury; and that, from the first day of November next, the offices of superintendent of Indian trade and of factors, &c. shall cease and determine."

This amendment was agreed to; and the question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. SOUTHARD caused to be read by the Clerk three or four articles of different treaties between the United States and Indian tribes, wherein the Government had expressly stipulated to maintain trading houses, and then asked how, after these solemn pledges, Congress could abolish the whole system?

Mr. MCLEAN, of Kentucky, said he had voted for the amendment, not being aware of these provisions of treaties. He wished that vote to be reconsidered, that a bill might be passed to continue the system in existence for one year, to give an opportunity to the next Congress to revise it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Virginia, stated, that the readiest course would be, to reject this bill, and take up the bill from the Senate, containing the very provision which the gentleman had suggested.

After some conversation between Messrs. RANKIN, FLOYD, SOUTHARD, and SIMKINS, the bill was, on motion of Mr. RANKIN, ordered to lie on the table—in the course of which—

Mr. FLOYD said, incidentally, that the Choctaws had fairly retorted on the United States their own policy, and got possession, by treaty, of about one-third of the whole of the population of the Territory of Arkansas. The bill was ordered to lie on the table.

GENERAL POST OFFICE.

Mr. PHELPS, from the select committee, delivered in the following report:

The select committee to whom was referred the investigation of the affairs of the Post Office Department, according to order have had the same under examination, and beg leave to submit to the House the following report, in part: That, immediately after their appointment, they commenced a performance of their duties, and believed it would be in their power to effect an extensive investigation. They began an inquiry into several important subjects, which the state of health of several members of the committee compelled them to abandon. They have recently devoted their attention entirely to such inquiries as offered a fair prospect of termination during the present session of Congress.

When it is recollected that the transactions of this Department embrace a period of many years, and extend to almost every part of our country, it will be obvious that obstacles would occur in the investigation of them, which could be surmounted only by an extensive and protracted inquiry.

The committee never entertained a belief, that, during the present session of Congress, they should be able to review, in a manner satisfactory to themselves, or the House, the quarterly receipts and expenditures of this department. This service the law requires of the accounting officers of the Government, when the proper vouchers are exhibited by the Postmaster General, and which, by law, he is bound to render quarterly.

The following subjects have been investigated by the committee:

1. The expenditure of public money by the department, for transporting the mail from Washington City to Fredericksburg, in the years 1814, 1815, and 1816.
2. Whether duplicates of all contracts made by this department, and all proposals respecting them, have been lodged with the Comptroller of the Treasury or not.
3. Whether the Postmaster General has, once in three months, rendered to the Secretary of the Treasury a quarterly account of all receipts and expenditures of the department or not.
4. Whether the Postmaster General has paid into the Treasury of the United States the balance due from him, as the law requires, or not.
5. Whether the public money was not loaned to Benjamin Tallmadge and John G. Jackson.

6. Whether the Postmaster General, in his annual reports to Congress of the contracts made by his department, has reported them conformably with law, or not.

7. Whether he has annually reported to Congress all contracts made by his department, or not.

The evidence, in relation to these several subjects of inquiry, consists of the original applications to transport the mail from Washington City to Fredericksburg, during the years, 1814, 1815, and 1816, a copy from the original list of bids, as furnished by the Postmaster General, and official documents.

The evidence, in connexion with the several heads, is referred to numerically.

In reference to the first head of inquiry, the committee find that, in the month of September, 1813, a contract was made by the Department with four persons, believed to be entirely responsible, for transporting the mail from Washington City to Fredericksburg, during the years 1814, 1815, and 1816, for the sum of $3,300 per annum, amounting in the whole to the sum of $9,900: a part of which contract was afterwards transferred to another person. No farther contract embracing the same route and period, has been discovered in the list of the contracts; duplicates of which have been returned to the Comptroller of the Treasury, or been furnished to the committee by the Post Office Department; but, it appears that a sum considerably larger than that stipulated by the above contract has been paid for the service in question, on behalf of the United States. The reason assigned for this additional expenditure by the Postmaster General, is, the occurrence of a change in the mode of transporting the mail, alleged to have been rendered necessary by the war, and to have been adopted in obedience to the direction of a superior authority. The sum paid under this variation of arrangement, for the three years above mentioned, appears from the returns of the Treasury to have been $31,551 52, of which amount $16,150 81, were paid for the year 1816. These entries are alleged by the Postmaster General to furnish an erroneous exhibit of the real expenditure, resulting from the manner of making up the returns to the Treasury, in which various sums paid to the same person, though for different services, are comprehended in the same entry. Thus, from the account in detail on the books of the Post Office Department, the whole sum paid for the transportation of the mail from Washington to Fredericksburg, for the year 1816, appears to be $8,915 45, instead of $16,150 81, as shown by the returns to the Treasury. The committee have no time or opportunity to obtain testimony in relation to the facts connected with the subject. They submit the documentary evidence they have collected, numbered from one to eleven, the letter of the Postmaster General to the committee; and two extracts marked A and B from the books of the Post Office Department, verified by the Chief Clerk of that Department.

In relation to the second head of inquiry, the committee find the duplicates of all contracts, and proposals respecting them, have not been lodged with the Comptroller, as is required by law.—Documents No. 12 and 13, and letter of the Postmaster General.

In relation to the third head of inquiry, it appears that the Postmaster General has not rendered his accounts to the Treasury Department for settlement, to a later period than the 31st day of March, 1819.—Reference to documents No. 14 and 15, and the explanation on the subject offered by the letter of the Postmaster General.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

General Post Office.

H. OF R.

In relation to the fourth head of inquiry, it appears that the balance due from the Post Office Department to the Department of the Treasury, amounted, on the 1st day of January, 1819, to the sum of $653,491 99, which includes all money then on hand, and debts due to the Post Office Department; the amount of which the committee have no documents to ascertain.—Reference to documents Nos. 16, 17, and letter of the Postmaster General, accompanying his report of debtors to his Department.

In reference to the fifth head of inquiry, no evidence has been obtained by the committee. It will be found embraced, however, by the explanation contained in the letter of the Postmaster General, which, on this point, was satisfactory to the committee.

In relation to the sixth head of inquiry, the committee, by adverting to several annual reports of contracts, made to Congress by the Postmaster General, find that the dates and duration of those contracts are not reported, which the law, in express terms, requires. As these reports are to be found in the Clerk's office, and the committee considered it to be unnecessary to swell their report with them.

In relation to the seventh head of inquiry, the committee find that the Postmaster General has not made a report to Congress of the contracts made by his Department in the year 1818, until after the commencement of the present investigation. See document No. 18, and letter of the Postmaster General to the committee.

The committee have contented themselves with submitting the above brief statement of the objects to which their inquiries have been directed, together with the connected evidence and explanations for the information of the House, without suggesting any resolution or act for its adoption.

The report was, with the documents accompanying the same, referred to a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

The following letter accompanied the report of the committee of the House on the subject of the Post Office transactions:

GENERAL POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
February 20, 1821.

To the Honorable the Committee of the House of Representatives, appointed to investigate the concerns of the General Post Office Department.

GENTLEMEN: Agreeably to an understanding with the committee at my interview on Friday last, I shall now proceed to give such information and explanations, in relation to the several points proposed by the committee, as I trust will prove entirely satisfactory. I was gratified to learn, explicitly, from the committee, at that interview, that the cases exhibited were not regarded as charges which had appeared in evidence against the Department, or on which any testimony had been taken; but that some were facts drawn from the official documents that required an explanation to satisfy the committee of the correctness of the proceedings of the Department, and that others were rumors, in relation to which the committee desired the statement of facts.

1st. The first point is, "that the public money has been improperly expended by the Post Office Department, for transporting the mail from Washington to Fredericksburg, in the years 1814, 1815, and 1816."

A plain and simple narrative of the facts in relation to that case, it is presumed, will fully justify the course which was taken. But, before entering upon the subject, it may not be improper to remind the committee, that most of these proceedings were anterior to my official duties as Postmaster General, which commenced in April, 1814.

It appears that a contract was made by my predecessor, with a company of gentlemen, in October, 1813, to transport the mail between Washington and Fredericksburg, for the years 1814, 1815, and 1816, with a distinct understanding that the letter mail was to be carried through by express, on horseback, during the Winter, while the roads on that route are so bad as to render it impossible for stages to move with any degree of rapidity; and that the mail containing newspapers and pamphlets, which was too heavy to be carried on horseback, should be subject to the more tardy movement of the stages, which occupied nearly two days.

It appears that, in November, 1813, after the above contract had been made, but before the performance under it commenced, the President and Secretaries of departments thought it advisable, in consequence of the general anxiety which the war excited, to obtain the earliest possible intelligence, that the whole mail, newspapers as well as letters, should be carried through by the express. This arrangement, which required much more than double the expense of carrying it agreeably to the plan at first contemplated, entirely vitiated the original contract. It could not be carried with sufficient rapidity in stages, and it was too heavy to be carried on horseback. It became necessary, therefore, to transport it in curricles—an expensive mode, but the only one practicable. After several unsuccessful attempts to have it satisfactorily performed at a low price in curricles, the department appears to have employed an experienced agent, who purchased horses and carriages, and carried that part of it between Alexandria and Dumfries, on account of the department; that being the worst part of the road, and on which no contractor would perform. An extra price was given to those who carried it on the other parts of the route, in consequence of the extra expense.

In this situation I found it when I came into the department in April, 1814. It remained thus until the commencement of 1815, when, finding it troublesome and expensive to transport the mail through an agent of the department, the property employed on the route was sold at a fair valuation to Colonel Tayloe, and a new contract entered into with him, upon terms considerably lower than what it cost the department while transported by its agent. It has since been advertised, and no other person has proposed to carry it at a lower rate than what was then given.

The rumors of which the honorable committee have spoken, were propagated in 1816, by certain malcontents, who were then clerks in this office; when, at my own request, a committee of the House of Representatives was appointed to investigate the fiscal concerns of this department. That committee, one of whom, the honorable Timothy Pickering, had been Postmaster General, and was perfectly acquainted with the nature of all the operations of the department, entered fully into this case; and I would respectfully refer the honorable committee to the report then made on this point, which is contained in the following sentence:

"The facts stated in this charge, viz: ('that a contract for carrying the mail from Washington to Fredericksburg, had been superseded by order of the Postmaster General, before it expired, and about double the amount given for the same service,') are admitted to be correct, and the letter of the Postmaster General, (No. 19,) contains a satisfactory explanation of the reasons for altering the terms of the contract; whether too much was eventually given for the service, under the changes required by the Postmaster General, is a subject not in the power of the committee to decide; nor would they be justified in presuming any misconduct in a transaction which appears to have been so fairly conducted."

2d. The second point is, "that duplicates of all contracts made by the department, and proposals respecting them, have not been lodged with the Comptroller of the Treasury."

To this I reply, that, since my time, they have always been regularly lodged in the office of the Comptroller, before the accounts and payments relating to them have come before him for examination, so that the spirit and design of the law have been strictly complied with. The letter of the law enjoins what is found impracticable, on account of circumstances which the committee will readily perceive. The number of contracts made at one time is usually between three and four hundred; many of which are with persons at extreme parts of the Union. These contracts are prepared at the department, and sent to them to be executed; and it often happens, from some misconception on the part of the contractor, or some explanation desired by him, or, sometimes, from his declining to comply with the conditions, that several communications pass between him and the department before he returns the contract, which prolongs the time considerably beyond the period specified in the law for lodging them with the Comptroller. They might, indeed, be sent to him, one by one, as they are received, but that would not be a literal compliance with the law; and the depositing them together, filed alphabetically, is found much more convenient to the department, while it furnishes superior facilities to the Comptroller, for reference. This subject was regarded of so little importance by my predecessor, that, during the thirteen years of his administration, he made but two lodgments of the duplicate contracts and proposals in the office of the Comptroller. All that were omitted by him, I have sent there, and all that have since been made, up to 1818. The remainder require only the formality of removing from one building to another, which will be done, as all others have been, before the accounts growing out of them shall come before the Comptroller.

3d. The third point is, "that the Postmaster General has not rendered, once in three months, to the Secretary of the Treasury a quarterly account of all receipts and expenditures."

To this I reply, that the law which requires the Postmaster General to render his accounts once in three months, has ever been understood simply to require these accounts to be presented in regular periods of three months each, agreeably to the common rule of the Treasury transactions, and not that they shall be rendered at the close of each quarter, for the three months immediately preceding, for this would be requiring an impossibility. There are 4,669 post offices in the United States, the accounts from which, after the close of a quarter, are all to be forwarded to the General Post Office. When received here, they are examined and registered in quarterly accounts current, from which they are posted into ledgers. After this, these accounts current are copied in the proper form for the Treasury. Besides these, there are upwards of a thousand mail routes, on which the mails are transported, at the average rate of 27,559 miles a day, during every season of the year. The payments made to the contractors after the close of a quarter, by remittances to every part of the Union; the obtaining receipts for these payments, to accompany the accounts to the Treasury, as vouchers, necessarily occupy a considerable length of time. As only one person at a time can be employed upon the same book, and as the labor of preparing the accounts, first for the Department, and then for the Treasury, must be performed after the necessary documents have come to hand; it must be obvious that they cannot be rendered at the Treasury till long after the expiration of the term to which they relate. It appears, from the documents of the office, that none of my predecessors, from the commencement of the Government, ever rendered their accounts sooner after the transaction occurred, than I have done, though the extension of the Department has increased in a tenfold ratio. In addition to the above, it may be proper to inform the Committee that this part of the business was far in arrears at the commencement of my official duties. When I came into the Department, in April, 1814, the accounts had been rendered to the Treasury only to the 30th June, 1809, being nearly five years behind. By unceasing and laborious exertions, all those arrearages have been brought up, and the whole accounts have been rendered to the Treasury, up to the 1st July, 1819, making a period of ten years, prepared and rendered since April, 1814. Others are in a state of forwardness, and will be rendered long before those which are already in the Treasury Department can be gone through and adjusted there.

4th. The fourth point is, "the Postmaster General has not paid into the Treasury of the United States the balance due from him."

From conversation with the committee I learned that this conclusion was drawn from the balance which appears against this Department, on the books of the Treasury. That balance exhibits not the amount of moneys collected by the department, but it embraces all balances due to the department from postmasters. The General Post Office Department is held accountable to the Treasury Department for the whole amount of postages throughout the United States; and almost the whole of the Auditor's balance remains due to this office, as will appear from the list furnished the House on the 23d of January, and for an explanation of which I would refer the committee to my letter accompanying the same. The balances have been promptly paid over as they have been collected, reserving only a sufficiency to meet such current expenses and contingencies as are daily arising; a practice sanctioned by the example of all my predecessors, and demonstrated by experience to be necessary to the successful operations of the department. I find that the whole amount paid over to the Treasury by this department, from the organization of the Government, in March, 1789, to March, 1814, a period of twenty-five years, is $702,388 40, making an average of $28,095 53 a year. Since I came into the department, from March, 1814, to March, 1820, a period of six years, the different payments to the Treasury amount to $379,411 76, making an average of $63,235 29 a year, more than double the average for the former period. But, owing to the increased length of the mail routes, principally through new and very thinly populated regions of the country, added to the general pressure which is felt, it is very doubtful whether it will be possible, for a considerable time, in future, to collect more than will be required to pay for the transportation of the mails, or even sufficient for that purpose.

5th. The fifth point is, "That he had loaned the public money to John G. Jackson and Benjamin Tallmadge."

At my interview with the committee, they informed me that no evidence of these transactions was before them, but rumor had repeated the circumstance, and a statement of facts was desired in relation thereto. This rumor appears to be a re-echo of what was brought before the committee of 1816, which committee had this subject before them; and after a thorough investigation of the facts, embraced it in the third article of their report, to which I would also respectfully refer the committee. The transactions were anterior to my time, and I can only inform the committee of what appears to have been their nature.

I find that, as early as 1806, those gentlemen, being members of Congress, frequently made collections for their constituents, principally from offices of the Government, and that it was common for them, through the Assistant Postmaster General, to remit such collections by drafts from this department, in lieu of which he received either moneys or drafts upon places where he had occasion to make remittances to pay contractors; and as, in some instances, the drafts thus exchanged did not exactly correspond in amount, he kept a memorandum of the difference; which, for the purpose of keeping more regularly, he transferred to the books of the office, the former in 1809, the latter in 1812. When I came into office, I found these accounts still open, and that the balances had been always very inconsiderable, sometimes in favor of the individuals, and sometimes in favor of the department. One of the accounts was finally closed in 1814, the other in 1816; since which time no account has been kept with any individuals who were not connected with the department. It was suggested also by the committee, that rumor informed them these exchanges were made at a time when a depreciation had taken place in the currency which was received. In answer to this, I will assure the committee, that only one payment was ever made to General Jackson after the banks had stopped specie payment, and that was made in the depreciated notes of this District; and that only one payment was ever made to Colonel Tallmadge after I came into the department, and that was made at New York, when all the banks were paying specie, and (the very reverse of a loan) it was in payment of a balance which was found due to him to close his account.

6th. The sixth point is, "That in his report to Congress of contracts made by his department, he has not reported them conformably with law."

On this point I will only remark that, as the object of the last section of the law referred to, appeared to be to show to Congress whether any of the members of either House were contractors; in making the reports which is required, this point was principally kept in view; and, as all contracts entered into by this department have been publicly advertised, with their dates and duration, in preparing the statements required by the law, there appears to have been an inadvertent omission of the date and duration of the contract, a circumstance in no degree surprising amidst the great mass of business to be performed; and an omission in no degree affecting the object of the report. In all other respects it is believed both the letter and the spirit of the law have been strictly adhered to in such reports.

7th. The seventh point is, "That he has not annually reported to Congress the contracts made by his department."

To this I reply, that the contracts made by this department have always been reported annually to Congress, except one instance, in which, owing to an accidental omission of one of the clerks, the report was not made at the time required, but the omission was subsequently discovered, and the report sent to the House.

In addition to the foregoing points, the committee asked an explanation of a difference which appears between the Fifth Auditor's statement of the post office accounts, and the account of receipts and disbursements furnished by this department.

In relation to this, the committee will observe, that the Auditor's report states the "gross amount of postages" in the United States, for a given time. From this "gross amount" is deducted the whole amount of postmasters' commissions, and contingent expenses of their respective offices. The remainder constitutes the amount of balances arising in favor of the department for that time. The report furnished from this office exhibits, not the amount of postages, but the amount of payments actually made by postmasters and received by the department. The difference, therefore, must always be considerable; and if it should so happen, that the whole amount of balances arising in favor of the department within a given time, should be paid over to this office within that time, yet, the difference between the gross amount of postages and the actual receipts by the department, would be equal to the whole amount of postmasters' commissions and contingent expenses of their offices.

I have the honor to be, with respect, your obedient servant,
R. J. MEIGS, Jr.

Prefixed to this letter, was the following note, by the committee:

To one remark, contained in the first paragraph of this defence, the committee would advert. It is that in which it is observed, that he "was gratified to learn, explicitly, from the committee, at that interview, that the cases exhibited were not regarded as charges which had appeared in evidence against the department, or on which any testimony had been taken," &c. This remark is not correct.

FEBRUARY 24, 1821.

Mr. BALDWIN moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning sales at auction; but the motion was negatived—ayes 53, noes 62.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. SERGEANT moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill from the Senate to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy; on which motion Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, demanded the yeas and nays.

The question was accordingly taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 78, noes 58; and the bill was taken up.

H. OF R.

System of Bankruptcy.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, then moved to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole; which motion was opposed by Mr. SERGEANT, as a course that would be fatal to the bill, from the delay it would produce, and was also unnecessary.

Mr. HARDIN advocated the motion to commit, being friendly to the principle of the system, but wanted to examine its details.

Mr. CLAY said to commit the bill would place it at the foot of the docket of business, and that course would be tantamount to a rejection of the bill. If gentlemen were sincere in a desire to examine it in Committee, he would propose a compromise, and that was to agree by general consent to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill forthwith; and added some remarks on the imperious necessity which existed for taking up the subject and deciding on it at the present session, as well as on the circumstances of the country which required its passage.

Mr. COBB declared himself heartily sick of all compromises, and spoke to show the necessity of acting on this subject with due deliberation. He was in favor of commitment, and could not take the system on the simple prescription of Mr. SERGEANT, or consent to act on the faith of any gentleman in the perfection of the details of the bill.

Mr. CULPEPER made a few remarks in favor of the course proposed by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. SERGEANT referred to the great length of time this subject had been before Congress; the frequency with which it had been discussed at former sessions, and the necessary general understanding which must exist of it. It had been printed at an early period of this session, as well as the last, and had been long before the members; it had been matured with great care and labor in the Senate, and he did not think it would require so much time to act on it as was apprehended.

Mr. STEVENS, of Connecticut, said the House was called on to work by faith; and he would as soon act by faith as works, if those works were not their own. The Senate had matured the bill to their liking, but it was proper the House should examine it for itself; for which there was not time, he argued, compatible with a due regard to other indispensable subjects.

The question being taken on committing the bill, it was negatived—ayes 49, noes 63.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, avowed his hostility to the bill; and to ascertain whether there was a majority in favor of the principle of the bill, without which it would be extremely impolitic to consume the precious time of the session in discussing its details, moved, for the purpose of trying the question and saving time, to postpone the bill indefinitely.

On this motion a debate commenced on the merits of the bill, as well as on the expediency of now acting on it. The debate had continued some time, and several gentlemen yet indicating a wish to speak—

Mr. McLEAN withdrew his motion; his object having been, in making it, merely to save time.

Mr. RHEA renewed the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely.

MESSRS. WOOD, ROBERTSON, TOMLINSON, SERGEANT, and LITTLE, submitted briefly their reasons for being in favor of the bill, and for advocating its consideration and decision.

MESSRS. CANNON, RHEA, TUCKER, of Virginia, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, offered their reasons against taking up the bill; for which they contended there was not time enough left, without neglecting every other subject, of which there were several of more consequence to the country. Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, offered also some remarks against the bill itself.

MESSRS. MEIGS and BRUSH submitted some arguments in favor of the bill, of its importance, and of proceeding to act on it.

Mr. F. JOHNSON said he thought this course would be to refuse to the petitioners, for some measure of the kind, who were both creditors and debtors, a just hearing of their complaints; he pointed out the general objects of the creditors and debtors who had petitioned for the measure, the importance of the subject, and the consideration which was due to it, and said that, although he should vote against the indefinite postponement, he should nevertheless vote against the bill in its present shape, and probably in any shape it might assume; but it was due, upon that, as well as upon all important occasions, particularly where the people had petitioned, that the friends of a measure should have a full and fair opportunity of making it as perfect as possible, and of then presenting the merits for consideration. Such a course, he said, was the liberal and proper one, and best calculated to effect a just and satisfactory result, &c.

MESSRS. COBB and CANNON maintained the other side of the question, and were averse to consuming the time of the session in the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLAY advocated the bill very earnestly, in a speech of some length.

Mr. STEVENS reiterated and enforced anew the opinions he had expressed against the consideration of the bill.

MESSRS. STORRS and WARFIELD supported the justice and policy of the measure, and the imperative necessity of acting on it at the present session.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, offered briefly his reasons for being opposed in principle to a system of bankruptcy.

Mr. SERGEANT replied at some length, to obviate the objections which Mr. TRIMBLE and others had adduced against the bill.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, spoke with great earnestness in favor of the indefinite postponement of the bill, on the ground of its demerits.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, then moved to adjourn. The motion was negatived.

Mr. COBB then delivered the reasons why he was most decidedly opposed to the passage of the bill in any shape.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, then moved to adjourn—negatived, 60 to 54.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, then moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was negatived.

MARCH, 1821.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. BALL then moved to adjourn; and the question thereon was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: For adjournment 59, against it 77.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. CLAY made a few remarks in favor of deciding to-night the question of indefinite postponement, and then adjourning to discuss the subject in detail on the morrow.

Mr. RHEA next spoke against the bill; and concluded by moving to adjourn.—Negatived, 71 to 48.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, then addressed the House at some length in favor of indefinite postponement.

Some rather confused proceedings then took place; when

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the bill on the table, and required the yeas and nays upon the motion; but a sufficient number did not rise to second the call.

The House then divided on the motion; when there were, for laying the bill on the table, 55; against it, 73.

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. BRYAN then moved to adjourn, and required the yeas and nays on the motion; and the question on adjournment was decided by yeas and nays as follows: For the adjournment, 62; against it, 73.

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. HOOKS then moved to lay the bill on the table, and required the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, invited those who, with him, were opposed to the bill, to withdraw their opposition to taking the question of indefinite postponement, in order to oppose the bill directly, on the morrow, when, if gentlemen desired it, the motion for indefinite postponement could be renewed.

Mr. HOOKS declined withdrawing the motion, and the question on laying the bill on the table was decided in the negative, 70 votes to 51.

Mr. CULPEPER entered his protest against the precipitation with which the main question was urged on the House, as being contrary to usage and unparliamentary.

The question was then taken on the indefinite postponement of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Blackledge, Bryan, Buffum, Campbell, Cannon, Claggett, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Culbreth, Culpeper, Davidson, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Garnett, Gray, Hardin, Hibshman, Hooks, Hostetter, Jackson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kinsey, Lincoln, McCoy, McCreary, Metcalf, R. Moore, T. L. Moore, Morton, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parker, of Massachusetts, Patterson, Phelps, Philson, Plumer, Rankin, Reid, Rhea, Richards, Ringgold, Ross, Stevens, Swearingen, Tucker of Va., Tucker of South Carolina, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Mass., Allen of N. Y., Archer of Md., Beecher, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brush, Case, Clark, Clay, Cook, Crowell, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Denison, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Eustis, Fay, Folger, Foot, Forrest, Fuller, Gorham, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hemp-hill, Herrick, Hill, Hobart, Johnson, Kendall, Kent, Kinsley, Lathrop, Little, Livermore, Maclay, McCullough, Mallary, Marchand, Meigs, Mercer, Monell, Montgomery, S. Moore, Moseley, Nelson of Massachusetts, Pitcher, Rich, Robertson, Rogers, Russ, Sergeant, Silsbee, Simkins, Sloan, Smith of Maryland, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Tomlinson, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Warfield, Whitman, and Wood—73.

The question then recurred that the bill be ordered to a third reading. When the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 1.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred, on the 2d of January last, the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, made a report thereon, accompanied with a bill authorizing the taxing of certain lands within the new States; which bill was read the first time, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting to Congress certain extracts, and a copy of letters received by the Secretary of State from the Marshal of the United States, for the eastern district of Virginia, in relation to the execution of the act of the 14th of March, 1820, to provide for taking the fourth census; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to John Gooding and James Williams, reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, the Committee of Accounts were authorized and directed to make the same allowance for extra services to each person serving this House, as was granted at the end of the last session; and that there be allowed to the two assistant messengers, David Pancoast and Charles Cooper, the sum of fifty dollars each, for extra services.

Mr. LITTLE submitted for consideration the following resolution, which was ordered to lie on the table till to-morrow:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House, at the next session of Congress, a system of revenue that shall meet all the expenses of Government without the aid of loans, and suggest such reductions, which, in his opinion, are least prejudicial to the public interest, as will bring the expenditures within the actual receipts of the Treasury.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Roads and Canals, and the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, made during the present session on the petition of John

Good; and the said reports being read, it was ordered that the petition of John Good be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to report thereon to this House at the next session of Congress.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "for passing to the credit of Nathaniel Allen certain moneys by him disbursed in the public service," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read a third time, and was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

Mr. R. also, in the same manner, reported the bill for the relief of J. L. B. McCarty, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SOUTHWARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the Senate's bill for continuing in force the act establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, reported the same without amendment; and, after some consideration, the bill was then ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. S. also reported, without amendment, the bill for appointing certain Indian agents; and the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. SMYTH, the Military Committee was discharged from the further consideration of the various subjects on which it had not reported.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom had been referred the bill from the Senate confirming the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge to a tract of thirty square leagues of land in Louisiana, reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the whole House. [We are requested to state that this bill was examined deliberately in the Committee on Private Land Claims, and that the committee was unanimous, as many as were present, in favor of the bill.—Editors N. I.]

Mr. FLOYD moved to print three thousand additional copies of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the Finances. It was short, he said, and the nation ought to have all the information they could have on the subject. This motion was opposed by Mr. Foor, on the ground that it would be an unnecessary expenditure, and it was negatived.

Mr. LIVERMORE, for the reason that the report of the Secretary of State on Weights and Measures, &c. was highly interesting, and would be a valuable addition to the stock of science of the country, moved that five hundred additional copies thereof be ordered to be printed for the use of this House. The motion was agreed to—69 to 30.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of the House, entitled "An act further to regulate the entry of merchandise imported into the United States from any adjacent territory; with amendments. And they have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act to extend the time for unlading vessels arriving from foreign ports in certain cases;" "An act to authorize the reconveyance of a tract of land to the city of New York;" "An act to establish a new land office in the State of Mississippi, and for the better regulation of certain land districts in the States of Alabama and Mississippi;" and "An act to extend the term of Samuel Parker's patents for his improvement in currying and finishing leather of all kinds;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act further to regulate the entry of merchandise imported into the United States from any adjacent territory," were read and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the time for unlading vessels arriving from foreign ports, in certain cases," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-day. It was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell and convey a certain tract of land in Northumberland county, in the State of Virginia; which was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the number and tonnage of British and American vessels cleared from ports of the United States for Bermuda, the Bahamas, and the British West India Islands, during the years 1816, 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820, rendered in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 20th of December, 1820; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the reconveyance of a tract of land in the city of New York," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish a new land office in the State of Mississippi, and for the better regulation of certain land districts in the States of Alabama and Mississippi," was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the term of Samuel Parker's patents for his improvement in currying and finishing leather of all kinds," was also read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: "An act to release French ships and vessels entering the ports of the United States prior to the 30th September, 1820, from the operation of the act, entitled 'An act to impose a new tonnage duty on ships and vessels, and for other purposes;'" and "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1821;" with an amendment to each. They have also passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of William Whitehead and others;" "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to provide for taking the fourth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, and for other purposes;'" and "An act to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and establish a temporary government therein;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

MARCH, 1821.

Yellow Stone Expedition.

H. OF R.

YELLOW STONE EXPEDITION.

Mr. Cocke, from the committee to whom was referred an inquiry into the nature of the contracts of Colonel James Johnson for transportation of supplies, &c., up the Missouri, and especially into the merits of the arbitration of his accounts with the Government, made a report thereon, being a particular examination of the subject, and expressing opinions rather against the allowances made. The report is as follows:

That a contract was entered into on the 2d of December, 1818, between the United States and Colonel James Johnson, of Kentucky, by which Colonel Johnson stipulated to furnish two steamboats, calculated to navigate the Mississippi and its waters, and place them subject to the orders of Government, by the first of March, 1819; and further agreed, in case he should be required, that he would, in a reasonable time, furnish one other or more steamboats, all of which were designed for the transportation of provisions, ordnance, and other military stores, to an expedition destined for the Mandan villages, or the Yellow Stone river; to this agreement the committee invite the attention of the House. It appears, by said agreement, that the rate of transportation was not definitively settled and ascertained, but, in case of disagreement as to the rate of compensation, it was to be fixed and determined by arbitrators indifferently chosen; a disagreement, as might have been expected, did arise, and referees were chosen. From the evidence submitted to them, it appears that the two steamboats were not placed subject to the orders of Government until some time in May following, and that on the arrival of the first boat at Belle Fontaine, the place from which the expedition was to have sailed, the Bank of St. Louis sued out an attachment against the property of Colonel Johnson, and delivered the writ to the proper officer to execute. It appears that he was not only inclined to prevent, but determined to resist with force, and called on the commanding officer at that station for a corporal's guard and arms, to enable him to oppose its execution with success; this, the committee are informed, was promptly refused. Colonel Johnson, on discovering this determination, came to anchor on the east side of the Mississippi, within the State of Illinois. The committee have thought proper to advert to those facts, believing that in some degree they contributed to the delay of the expedition, but are far from believing this the only cause. To illustrate more fully the views of the committee, and to enable the House to judge how far justice has been done the Government, they think it incumbent on them to state that Colonel Johnson was the sole contractor to this expedition, and bound to transport the military stores and ordnance from Pittsburgh, in the State of Pennsylvania, to Belle Fontaine, on the Missouri, and also, the contractor to furnish the necessary provisions. The committee discover, from the documents referred to them, that, owing to the failure on the part of Colonel Johnson to deliver the stores and munitions of war, it would have been impracticable for the expedition to have moved before the — of June, at which time the Jefferson steamboat reached Belle Fontaine, on board of which were the stores before mentioned, together with the clothing for the soldiers employed on the Yellow Stone expedition. The committee think it due to Colonel Johnson to state that this delay was occasioned by the breaking of the piston head of this boat, and not from wanton neglect. It is, however, a strong reason, in the opinion of the committee, why the United States should not pay Colonel Johnson for detention of his boats, when there was no failure on their part. It appears that a sufficient quantity of provisions had not reached the garrison at Belle Fontaine, even on the arrival of the steamboat Jefferson; that the subsistence for this expedition was partly on board another of Colonel Johnson's boats, called the Calhoun, and from the feebleness of her machinery she was unable to resist the current of the Mississippi, and never reached the garrison on the Missouri, where the troops were to embark; thus creating a deficiency of provisions which was not remedied by Colonel Johnson until about the 28th of June, and not until Colonel Atkinson, the commanding officer, called on him to complete the number of rations required, and assured him, if he did not, that the agent of the United States would be ordered to purchase, and he, Colonel Johnson, charged with them. For a more minute detail on this part of the subject, the committee refer to the evidence submitted to the arbitrators, which they have thought proper to lay before the House, together with the arguments of counsel, on the investigation before the referees. The committee will be content with a cursory examination, and notice only a few prominent facts. The clause in the argument of the 2d of December, 1818, and on which the claim of Colonel Johnson, of indemnity, for detention of his boats, is founded, provides "that if, in the arrangements and operations of Government, the said steamboats should be detained in their destination from the want of concentration of the articles to be transported or otherwise, and not imputable to the negligence of Colonel Johnson, the Quartermaster General obliged himself, on the part of the Government, to make from time to time advances, which are reasonable, on account of his transportation." The advance of money, by this provision in the contract, the committee believe, was esteemed by Colonel Johnson not only convenient, but of great importance, and a sufficient indemnity for all expenses incident to the detention; to justify this opinion they refer to an obligation executed by Colonel Johnson, of equal date with the agreement, of which the above is an extract. This obligation expresses the intention and views of the parties, and recites the previous agreement; an extract of which is submitted. "And whereas, by the terms of the said contract or agreement, the said Thomas S. Jesup hath engaged to make advances of money from time to time to the said James Johnson, on account of transportation, &c., Now, therefore, for the faithful performance of the several conditions and obligations contained in the said contract or agreement, on the part of the said James Johnson, and for the repayment and final adjustment of all and singular such advances as may be made to him by virtue of this contract," &c. From this it is evident that neither party contemplated more than a liberal advance of money, if perchance there should be any detention of the expedition; and it would have been proper in Colonel Johnson to require advances, in proportion to the time, but they cannot believe his claim is just as exhibited; if in this, however, they are mistaken, they must say, no operations of the Government caused the detention of Colonel Johnson's boats, while up the Missouri, and for which pretended claim the sum of $41,275 13 cents was awarded him. They find, from the evidence submitted to the referees, that the boats were detained solely in consequence of their inability to complete their voyage. The Jefferson was too feeble in machinery to stem the current, but for a short distance, when she was compelled to halt, and her cargo was chiefly transported by the boats of the United States. The Expedition and Johnson steamboats also failed, and that neither reached the Council Bluffs that season.

The committee are unable to discover even an apology for this allowance of $41,275 13, and are satisfied no principle of justice will sanction it; they cannot admit for a moment the idea, that when an accident happens to Colonel Johnson's boats, and over which the Government had no control, it is proper to make the United States responsible for detention, whilst the delay is indispensable to repair damages. The committee can perceive no rule of equity that will support this award; every award must be reasonable, and it is contrary to the duty of an arbitrator to do any thing that would be unjust between the parties. They also award Colonel Johnson the further sum of $5,875 39, including, they say, nothing but the actual expenses, wear and tear, and loss of time, throwing out all allowance for risk, which they supposed compensated in the freight for the detention of two boats before the expedition moved from Belle Fontaine, and for the detention of three of Colonel Johnson's boats, after they were damaged, unladen, and unable to proceed further; they say, after making due allowance for the actual expenses, the loss of time and employment, the wear and tear, and the risk of wintering in so exposed a situation, they award the further sum of $41,275 13; thus the United States has paid Colonel Johnson $47,249 51, for the detention of his boats, under the notion that, in the operations and arrangements of Government, the articles to be transported were not concentrated. The committee feel it their duty to state, that it appears, for the transportation actually furnished by Government, there has been paid Colonel Johnson, in obedience to the award, the sum of $14,969 28, for the transportation of articles not conveyed by him, or at his expense; and also the sum of $13,700 for the passage of troops in his boats to the Council Bluffs, when, in fact, the said boats never reached there, and were compelled to halt as before stated; the payment of those sums, under all the circumstances, in the opinion of the committee, cannot be sanctioned, and are not supportable, consistent with equity and justice. They feel constrained to remark, that the charge for detention of those boats up the Missouri, and for which there is awarded the sum of $41,275 13, did not make an item in the account of Colonel Johnson, when first exhibited, and must have been conceived after Congress refused an appropriation further to prosecute the expedition up the Missouri. The committee have attentively examined the account of Colonel Johnson as regards the claim for transportation of military stores and provisions; by his contract of the 2d of December, 1818, he agreed to receive a reasonable compensation for his services, and use of boats employed in transportation, and fixes as the basis the ordinary rates of transportation for such allowance. The committee can see no good reason why the sum of sixteen and one-fourth cents per pound should be paid Colonel Johnson for all articles conveyed by keel-boat navigation, when it is evident that the ordinary rate of transportation by this mode of conveyance did not exceed five and a half cents per pound; and in fact this was the sum paid by the United States to others performing at the same time similar services. In order that the House might have all the means of judging of the merits of this transaction between the Government and Colonel Johnson, and to enable the nation fully to understand how far economy has been consulted, a comparison between the prices now allowed, and those given by the arbitrators to Colonel Johnson, was considered somewhat important. The committee called on the Quartermaster General for information on this point; the answer is, that Colonel Johnson became a bidder to transport military stores, &c., to the Council Bluffs, during the year 1821, at the rate of three and three-fourth cents per pound, as has been observed. The arbitrators allowed Colonel Johnson for similar services performed in 1819 sixteen and one-quarter cents per pound. It further appears, that, among fourteen or fifteen bidders for transportation to that post for the year 1821, but one required over four cents per pound, and he less than five cents per pound: what are the causes for such a change of prices the committee are unable to conjecture. That the present scarcity of money may make some difference is admitted; but the navigation of the Missouri river is the same; the same means of transportation existed which are now used. A reduction in price from sixteen and one-fourth cents to three and three-fourth cents, about one-fifth of the price heretofore given, affords some ground, at least, for the opinion, that what once was alleged to be prudent and economical, now appears to be profuse and extravagant.

If the committee are correct in their construction of the contract between the United States and Colonel Johnson, and their views relative to the advances from time to time being esteemed by Colonel Johnson equivalent to any delay that might happen by the operations of the Government, they have no hesitation in saying the advances have not only been liberal, but profuse, and, in one instance, not guarded by such security as will, in all probability, secure the Government against the loss of a sum of more than $50,000. The only security taken for this advance, as the committee believe, is a mortgage on Colonel Johnson's steamboats, which appear to have been broken, feeble, and subject to constant decay. The committee find that, after giving Colonel Johnson credit for every allowance awarded, there is still due from him to the United States the sum of $76,372 65, and which the arbitrators did not award he should pay, although justly due. From a full view of this subject the committee think the award ought to be set aside, and, to this end, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be directed to use all legal means in his power to set aside the award made between the United States and Colonel James Johnson; and, also, use the legal means to recover, for the United States, whatever may be due from said Colonel James Johnson.

On motion of Mr. COCKE, the report was laid on the table. He then moved to print the report, which, from its length, was not read through. To this motion Mr. BROWN and Mr. F. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, objected, on the ground that it would be unjust to the parties concerned to publish the report without the documents. They animadverted, too, on the lateness of the hour at which the report had been made, which would prevent a due investigation. To this Mr. Cocke replied, that the committee had used due diligence, and had made a report as soon as they could, consistently with the duty reposed in them. He did not object to the printing of the documents if the gentlemen wished it; but must insist on the publication of the report. Mr. CANNON also supported the motion for printing; which was agreed to, so as to include the printing of the whole of the documents as well as the report.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, being announced as the business of the day—

Mr. CLARK moved to lay the bill on the table. On this motion the yeas and nays having been required by Mr. SERGEANT, were—for laying on the table 62, against laying it on the table 65, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Blackledge, Boden, Buffum, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Clark, Cobb, Cocke, Culbreth, Culpeper, Davidson, Dickinson, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Garnett, Gray, Hooks, Hostetter, Jackson, Jones of Ten., Kinsey, Lincoln, McCoy, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Metcalf, R. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Mass., Bloomfield, Brevard, Brush, Case, Cook, Cushman, Dane, Darlington, Denison, Dewitt, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Eustis, Fay, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Gorham, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hall of New York, Hemphill, Hendricks, Hill, Hobart, Johnson, Kendall, Kinsley, Lathrop, Little, Livermore, Maclay, Mallary, Marchand, Meigs, Mercer, Monell, S. Moore, Moseley, Nelson of Massachusetts, Pitcher, Rich, Rogers, Sawyer, Sergeant, Silsbee, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, Southard, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Tracy, Udree, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Warfield, Whitman, and Wood.

So the motion was negatived, by three votes. On this vote it appears nearly sixty of the whole number of members were absent from the House.

The SPEAKER then commenced the reading of the bill by sections; and the first section having been read—

Mr. HOOKS moved to strike it out; in other words, to reject the bill.

Mr. A. SMYTH rose, and, in support of this motion, delivered a speech of three hours in length, covering the whole ground of opposition to the bill.

Mr. STORRS followed in a speech of about half an hour, in support of the bill.

Mr. SAWYER, of North Carolina, delivered his sentiments in favor of the bill.

Mr. COBB then moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was decided, by yeas and nays, in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Ten., Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Bateman, Blackledge, Boden, Brevard, Bryan, Buffum, Butler of N. Hampshire, Campbell, Cannon, Clagett, Clark, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Culbreth, Culpeper, Earle, Edwards of N. So the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the year 1821.

Considerable debate took place on the item of appropriation for fortifications. Mr. SMITH of Maryland moved, by instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means, to fill the blank for that object with $172,000. Mr. NEWTON moved to fill the blank with $300,000.

After a debate of more than three hours—

The question was taken on Mr. NEWTON's motion, and there were—for the motion 21, against it 63. A quorum not having voted—

The Committee rose and reported the fact. The SPEAKER, having counted the House, announced that there was not a quorum present; and, the House adjourned, after a session of nearly ten hours.

FRIDAY, March 2.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the adjudication and payment of claims under the Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the term of Samuel Parker's patents for his improvement in currying and finishing leather of all kinds," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. FORREST, from the Committee on Agriculture, made a report on the petition of P. S. Chazotte, stating in substance that it is too late to act upon it at the present session ; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate to authorize the Clerk of the United States' court for the Louisiana district to appoint a deputy, was ordered to be read a third time ; and was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

The Committee of Ways and Means ; the Committee on Private Land Claims ; and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads ; were severally discharged from the consideration of all petitions, and other matters to them, respectively, referred at the present session, upon which they have not reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Clerk was directed to pay, out of the funds of the House, to the assistant in his office, from the period at which he was last paid by order of the House, to the end of the present session, and at the lowest rate of compensation allowed to clerks employed in his office.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1821, was read, and concurred in by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, viz: "An act making appropriations for the public buildings ;" and "An act to alter and establish certain post roads ;" with amendments. They have also passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out the road therein mentioned ;'" "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Missouri ;" "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' passed the 2d of March, 1799 ;" and "An act to revive and continue in force 'An act fixing the compensations of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, of the clerks employed in their offices, and the Librarian ;' approved the 18th of April, 1818 ;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings," were read, and concurred in.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' passed the 2d day of March, 1799, was read twice and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill to amend the act of last session laying an extra tonnage duty, was taken up. [This amendment gives a power to the President of the United States to suspend the operation of the act of the last session, on a satisfactory arrangement being made, during the recess, by the President.]

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word "dominions," whereit occurs (as applicable to the United States,) and inserting "territories," the former being an expression unusual in our laws. Mr. NEWTON said he should not quarrel about words. The motion was rejected, though not by a large majority—but a different amendment, having the same effect, was made.

The amendment of the Senate was then agreed to, without opposition.

The bill from the Senate for giving further time for taking the third census was read twice, and afterwards read a third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate for authorizing the reconveyance of a tract of land to the State of New York, gave rise to considerable opposition, and was supported by Mr. MEIGS, Mr. WOOD, and others. Mr. WARFIELD moved to postpone it indefinitely. But a motion of Mr. COCKE, to lay the bill on the table, was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of William Whitehead was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, concerning the road now laying out from Wheeling to the Mississippi, was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. COBB, from a hostility to the further prosecution of this road, moved to reject the bill.

This motion was opposed by Mr. CLAY, and supported by Mr. HARDIN. On motion of Mr. BRUSH, the bill was then ordered to lie on the table—yeas 69, nays 49.

The bill from the Senate to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Missouri, was read the first and second time. The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate to revive and continue in force the act fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, of the clerks in said offices, and of the librarian, was twice read, ordered to be read a third time, and finally read a third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate to provide for the occupation of Florida and for the establishment of a temporary government therein, was twice read and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The engrossed bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of a tract of land in Northumberland, late the property of Presley Thornton, was read a third time and passed.

The amendments of the Senate to the annual post road bill were taken up and agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed "An act authorizing the President of the United States to establish a port of entry in the district of Sandusky, in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes ;" "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1821 ;" and "An act to authorize the building of lighthouses on Cross and Pond islands, in the harbor of Boothbay, and at the mouth of Oswego river ; and placing buoys on the shoals of Nantucket and Vineyard Sound, near the harbor of Wickford, and on the Altamaha river, and for other purposes," Revenue and Expenditures—Military Appropriation Bill.

with amendments; in which amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States for the year 1821, be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the payments to inspectors, weighers, gaugers, measurers, and markers, employed by the collectors of the customs in the years 1816, 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820, so far as the returns have been received; which letter and statement were ordered to lie on the table.

PENSION LAW.

Mr. MALLARY, after adverting to a late decision of the Attorney General under the pension law, offered the following joint resolution for consideration:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to restore to the pension list any person who may have been, or shall be, stricken from the pension list, on the evidence of such person's schedule, agreeably to the act of the 1st of May, 1820, in addition to the pension law of 1818, whenever the Secretary of War shall be satisfied, by other or additional evidence, that such person is in such reduced circumstances as to come within the provisions of the aforesaid acts.

The House having agreed to consider this resolution, and the resolution being put on its second reading, was objected to by Mr. McLEAN; and the question then, according to the rule of the House, was on the rejection of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, on the ground that there would not be time to act on the resolution at the present session, moved to lay it on the table; which motion was carried, 53 to 47.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURES.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, which was yesterday submitted by Mr. LITTLE:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House, at the next session of Congress, a system of revenue that shall meet all the expenses of the Government, without the aid of loans, and suggest such reductions, which, in his opinion, are least prejudicial to the public interest, as will bring the expenditures within the actual receipts of the Treasury.

Mr. COBB moved to strike out that part of the resolution which relates to a system of revenue; but, after a few observations from Mr. LITTLE against it, the motion was negatived—ayes 39.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said that he should vote against the resolution. The House, he said, was getting too much into a habit of devolving its proper business on the Heads of Departments. The subject of this resolution was properly within the scope of the duties of the House, and he hoped the House would not transfer it elsewhere.

Mr. COBB said, that experience sufficiently proved that there was no great disposition on the part of the executive officers to retrench expenditures, and that every thing of that sort that is done is forced upon them by Congress. The better opinion, too, now appeared to be, that the present revenue would be found sufficient, if a proper economy was infused into the expenditure of it. If this resolution were to pass, the House might rely upon it, that the suggestions received would be, in substance, that no retrenchment can be made in the public expenditures, consistent with the public interest.

Mr. FOOT expressed himself decidedly in opposition to the resolution. He was not for this House giving bond for the performance of its duty, nor requiring of other public officers to do so.

Mr. COCKE objected to the resolution, because it was calling on the President to do what he is already constitutionally bound to do, that is, to give such information as he may deem expedient, &c. This House ought not to touch the subject in this manner, having their own duty to discharge.

Mr. EUSTIS was opposed to the resolution, because it calls on the Executive to do what is peculiarly the duty of this House.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he thought it would be as well not to act on the resolution at all. He therefore moved to lay it on the table, and the motion was agreed to.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the military appropriation bill.

[The Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the bill making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1821, having risen last night for the want of a quorum, and reported the fact to the House, a question arose this morning whether the bill was in Committee or in the House.]

The SPEAKER decided that the bill was in the House, and that the Committee, having risen for defect of a quorum, could make no other report than to inform the House of the fact; whereby the Committee was dissolved.* Whereupon, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the House proceeded, in that Committee.]

And the question again presenting itself on the amount to be appropriated for fortifications for the current year; and the question being on filling the blank, as proposed by Mr. NEWTON, with three hundred thousand dollars, the debate, which occupied so much time last night, was resumed; and the largest amount proposed was warmly supported by Mr. NEWTON, Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, and Mr. F. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and was opposed

* See Jefferson's Manual, page 40. "This quorum (that of the Committee of the Whole,) is the same as that of the House, and if a defect happens, the Chairman, on a motion and question, rises, the Speaker resumes the chair, and the Chairman can make no other report than to inform the House of the cause of their dissolution." 2 Hats. 125.

by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. The largest amount was at length negatived, and the amount of $170,000, as proposed by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was agreed to.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that he understood one object of the gentleman from Virginia, in making the motion he had, was to enable the Secretary of War to carry on and complete the fortifications at Mobile bay, which he esteemed essential to the best interests of the Western country; that he had, upon all occasions, from principle, manifested an aversion to a profuse and unnecessary expenditure of public money; that he could not consider the subject embraced by the motion as of that character; that, upon the present occasion, he should have remained silent, had not so strong a disposition been manifested yesterday and to day, by the Committee, to abandon those fortifications, notwithstanding the expenditures already made there. He considered the fortification of Mobile bay as important, and necessary to the security of the outlet of the Mississippi; and upon every thing which tended to weaken or strengthen the security of the free commerce of that great river, he could but feel a deep interest. The present bill proposes to appropriate $172,000 for carrying on fortifications at Fort Delaware, Fort Washington, Fort Monroe, Fort Calhoun, and the Rigoletts; but not one cent for Mobile bay. Such seems to be the policy which the Committee of Ways and Means, who reported the bill, would dictate.

Under this view of the subject, Mr. J. said he would ask the patience of the Committee to bear with him till he should make a few remarks. He said he should not inquire now into the policy of fortifications; the necessity of them had long since been demonstrated, and the system had been pursued, until almost every other part of the Union was secured, and he could see no good reason for abandoning those at Mobile. Why, he would ask, was every other part of the nation to be secured by fortifications, except the Gulf of Mexico? For his part, he conceived that the Executive and the Secretary of War, in attending to that quarter, had done nothing more than their duty, and shown a just regard to the interest of the West; and he should, he conceived, do nothing more than justice to the Secretary of War to say that he was the first officer of the Government, who, by efficient measures, had paid that just regard due to the great and vital interest of the Western States. Until his time, he would inquire, what had been done there, while fortifications were rising in almost every other direction? The fortifications at Dauphin Island were progressing more rapidly than that at Mobile Point. Both are going on; but they are to be abandoned—and why? It was said by some gentlemen that the contracts have not been complied with, and they apprehend one of the contractors would fail. Was that, he said, any reason, were it so, for abandoning the work? But it was not the fact; for the time in which the works were to be completed had not arrived: the failure had not yet taken place, and may not; and if the contemplated failure does happen, he said he was informed, from undoubted authority, that the undertaker had given the most ample security for his performance. But if, he said, we refuse to make appropriations to fulfil the engagements of the Government, the breach may be somewhere else than on the part of the undertaker; and there was no danger, while there was a prospect of failure, that any money that shall be appropriated would go into the hands of the contractor.

It is said, moreover, by some gentlemen, that money has been appropriated, year after year, for fortifications, and they don't know how it has been expended. The reason why gentlemen don't know, said Mr. J., is because they have not taken the trouble to inquire and inform themselves. Not a dollar, he presumed, had been expended upon these fortifications, but what a particular and detailed account of it might be seen; and because gentlemen will not inform themselves, they don't know, and make that another argument against completing those fortifications. No, Mr. Chairman, he said, we ought to inform ourselves upon all these points, and as to the necessity and utility of every proposed fortification; and not, by anticipated failures in contracts, and the want of knowledge, which a little labor might supply, to seek an apology for abandoning important and necessary measures.

Again, said Mr. J., gentlemen seem to deny the necessity and utility of fortifying Mobile bay, and the Committee of Ways and Means had refused to report any thing for that purpose; but the honorable chairman of the committee had been good enough to admit the necessity of protecting that bay by fortification, but protests most roundly that he would as soon build a fort on the Alleghany mountain, as on Dauphin island, for the protection of that bay, and says, Mobile Point is the only place where there ought to be a fortification, and there he admits it is necessary. And if that point was necessary to be fortified, why leave it out of the bill? The honorable gentleman tells us he was willing himself to have included Mobile Point, but the rest of the committee opposed it. But, to fortify Dauphin island, it is alleged it is altogether unnecessary; and why? Because gentlemen say that the channel into the bay by Dauphin island affords only nine or ten feet water, and therefore no vessel of war of any size can pass it into the bay, and the only channel they can pass is by Mobile Point. It is true the channel by Dauphin island is not more than nine or ten feet, and that large vessels of war cannot pass through it; but it is also true that between this island and Pelican island, which lies to the South, there is a most excellent and safe anchorage for large ships, which would be commanded by a fort on Dauphin island, and the conclusions which are drawn from the facts stated by gentlemen, that it is unnecessary to fortify on Dauphin island, by no means follow, when its peculiar and important position is ascertained. For his own part, said Mr. J., he was disposed to hearken to what the corps of engineers had reported upon the subject, at whose head was General Bernard, a most distinguished and able engineer, who had surveyed, actually surveyed, Mobile bay and our coast on the Gulf of Mexico; had actually sounded the passes by Mobile Point and Dauphin island, and all about them, and had ascertained the condition and position of Point Mobile and Dauphin island, and their importance, as well in regard to Mobile bay itself, as in relation to the adjacent coasts and country, and the Gulf of Mexico generally; and they had, in his opinion, taken a just and proper view of the subject in all its bearings. They tell us, continued Mr. J., first, what is evident to every reflecting man, that, from the peculiar circumstances under which that country labors, (Louisiana and Alabama,) in its population, its Indian neighbors, its natural position, and its connexions, that it becomes all important (beside the regard to the safety of Mobile bay) to protect all the indirect, as well as the direct, approaches to New Orleans; to fortify every harbor on our side the Gulf, which might be important to an enemy, on account of the excellencies of its anchorage, or as a safe place of arms to operate from against any part of the frontier. To these propositions, he said, we must all assent, as this plan, if carried into execution, would "compel an enemy to carry these frontier works or fortified harbors, as a preliminary to any military designs against the country;" and, if an invasion should be attempted, without carrying such works, the enemy would have to resort to insecure anchorage grounds near the sea islands, and of effecting landings in boats on some intermediate points on the seashore, unprotected by their ships of war—an enterprise too hazardous to be attempted without subjecting them to the worst results. It would seem, said Mr. J., then only necessary to ascertain whether Mobile bay be a point of importance; whether it can be defended, and how it can be defended. In the first place, then, said he, Mobile bay is the principal harbor which belonged to the United States, in the Gulf of Mexico, previous to the late cession of the Floridas, and it has not diminished in its importance by that event. It is a large and spacious harbor, sufficient to contain a fleet of any size or magnitude, that could pass the bar at its mouth, of seventeen or eighteen feet water. He said, independent of the necessity of its defence for the protection of Alabama, and the commercial depots of Blakeley and Mobile, it was important that it should not fall into the hands of an enemy, because it would afford him a safe anchorage and secure harbor for transports, a secure place of arms to operate from on the inhabitants of Tombigbee and Alabama, and to create a diversion in a direct or indirect attack on Orleans, and to harass the whole frontier, and menace and annoy Pensacola.

The engineers concur in opinion that Mobile bay can only be defended from Mobile Point and Dauphin island; that the distance between these two points exceeds three miles; that there are only two channels in that place offering any facilities to vessels of magnitude attempting to enter the bay; that the east or main channel approaches Mobile Point, and the west channel, admitting of nine or ten feet water, within eleven or twelve hundred yards of Dauphin island. The space between these two channels, from actual sounding, is found to be a sand bank, admitting of irregular soundings of three, four, five, and six feet water, and changeable by every gale of wind agitating the ocean; that there is no communication between the channels, and no one position, it is expressly stated, can be selected to command both; that the east or main channel can be defended from Mobile Point alone, and the west from Dauphin island. The occupancy of one of these points alone cannot, therefore, insure the object for which fortifications at that place would be necessary, and hence it is found necessary to command both of these points, or to abandon the defence of Mobile bay. And are Congress prepared to abandon the defence of Mobile bay? Surely gentlemen from the West are not, nor should he suppose the nation was. It was, he thought, obvious that the defence of Mobile bay was essential to the security of New Orleans in another point of view; that it was so to secure the communication between New Orleans and Mobile bay, by Lake Ponchartrain and the lesser lakes, comprised between the main land and the chain of islands bounded by Cat island to the west, and Dauphin island to the east.

Another specific object, he said, to be obtained in fortifying Dauphin island, was to command the western channel, to prevent vessels from penetrating into the bay, which might be constructed for that purpose, to carry ten or twelve guns, and to draw only eight or nine feet of water, who would be capable of annoying the whole adjacent country, and conveying transports for interior operations—and is it of no importance to check these sort of operations? But, another object, not less important to be attained by the fortification there, was to deprive an enemy of the excellent anchorage between Pelican island and Dauphin island, which would be completely commanded by its guns, and secure it to the Navy of the United States. Leave Dauphin island unfortified, he said, and you leave it and the anchorage between that and Pelican island subject to the possession of an enemy, and what would be the consequence? It would afford him a secure place of arms, a safe anchorage, a rallying point, from which he might sally forth, and return at pleasure, from incursions against New Orleans or any other part of the frontier, and certain it was it would afford great facility for blockading the bay and penetrating the western channel, and even of annoying Pensacola. Sir, said Mr. J., let me but state what the justly celebrated engineer General Bernard has reported in relation to this point and Pensacola: He says, "if, in consequence of the acquisition of the Floridas, 'Pensacola becomes a naval depot and a harbor of rendezvous (for the American Navy,) Mobile bay 'would be a most favorable place of arms for an enemy to operate from thence upon the naval establishment at Pensacola;" and this, he said, was no guess work of General Bernard's; it was from examination and observations made upon the ground, and his judgment in these matters no one will question. So that we find that, instead of the acquisition of Pensacola making it unnecessary to fortify Mobile bay, as has seemed to be thought by some, the acquisition of Pensacola, and the establishment of a naval depot there, forms an additional reason for continuing the fortifications at Mobile bay.

There was another reason, Mr. J. said, which should induce us now to be more attentive to the security of Mobile bay; that, by the same treaty by which we had acquired Pensacola, we had surrendered the Texas country, and thereby deprived ourselves of all protection to New Orleans and the mouth of the Mississippi from the harbors and shores to the west of it. And surely, said he, we are not prepared to leave the east, subject to the insult and encroachment of an enemy. It was hazarding too much; it was leaving New Orleans and the Gulf of Mexico substantially without defence, and in a situation too precarious and uncertain for its great importance to the Western country. He said it was unnecessary for him to say any thing as to the importance of New Orleans and the permanent security of the free outlet of the Mississippi; that it was a subject upon which every intelligent man in the nation was well informed, and he could but be surprised to see gentlemen from the West opposing the measure.

It is true, he said, that the country is in a depressed state; that our revenue does not promise us an excess in the Treasury; but it is equally true that, for years, $800,000 has annually been appropriated for fortifications; that all our seashores and harbors, except those on the Gulf of Mexico, are nearly secured; and now the committee has reported $172,000 principally for the completion of those objects, and an additional hundred is asked by the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, principally to favor the completion of the defence of Mobile bay and New Orleans, and it is objected to. If gentlemen, he said, would abandon other fortifications, there would be some apology for abandoning these; but as fortifications are to go on, and have gone on, he said, he could see no reason or justice in denying an equal participation to the people of the West, in the benefits to be derived from fortifications. Some gentlemen, he said, could vote without scruple for the appropriation of upwards of $100,000, in these hard times, to cover in the centre building of the Capitol; but to vote the same sum for the protection of the commerce of the West, and the security of the people bordering on the coast of the Gulf, they would not do that—the times are too hard, the work is unnecessary. But times are not too hard to build an addition to a Capitol that is not necessary, but for show and splendor.

Sir, said he, it would seem, from the arguments of some gentlemen, that the Executive and War Departments alone were interested in these great works of defence; for they seem to imply that these works are to be carried on merely to gratify the desires of the Executive and Secretary of War. What interest have they in the defences of the country more than we ought to have, or more than any other friend to the nation has? They can have no other interest than the security against invasion of this country, which is dear to all, and the protection of its commerce. The greater the anxiety they shall manifest to the permanent peace and security of the country, the greater praise is due them; the greater confidence will they derive; it is a faithful discharge of the great trust reposed in them. It is a laudable desire to defend our common country, the blessings and protection of which we all in common enjoy. He said he should not, that he knew of, himself have proposed any thing toward fortifications this session, more than was indispensable for the preservation of those erected and erecting; but he did not like to see the cup pass by without sharing a little of its contents. And, after again urging the propriety and necessity of continuing those fortifications, and speaking of the great waste of public money heretofore expended upon fortifications injudiciously situated, before the nation had employed competent engineers to survey the seaports and harbors, and to fix on the proper places of defence, he concluded by declaring himself in favor of the amendment proposed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, then moved to amend the bill, by inserting an appropriation of $40,000 specially for Mobile Point.

On trying this question, as on several others during the day's sitting, there was not a quorum present. But, a quorum being at length assembled, the vote was 58 to 35 against it.

A motion was also made, with no better success, to make a special appropriation for fortifications at Dauphin Island.

A great deal of other debate took place on various amendments proposed to the bill, the consideration of which occupied the House, in Committee of the Whole, until a late hour.

Among the amendments proposed to the bill, was an appropriation of $40,000 to pay arrears of the cost of the erection of an arsenal at Augusta, in Georgia. This was opposed by Mr. MALLARY and Mr. CULPEPER, on the ground that the expenditure was unauthorized by law; and was supported by Mr. REID, Mr. CUTHBERT, and Mr. SIMKINS, on the ground that individuals ought not to suffer from their having complied with contracts which they had made with the Government. Mr. FLOYD also spoke on the subject. The amendment was agreed to—yeas 48, nays 45.

Mr. SIMKINS was understood to say that he should not have raised his voice on this subject, had it not been for the extraordinary turn of the debate; but, feeling only the interest which all American citizens should feel, he should have left this appropriation bill to share the fate destined for most measures by the spirit and temper predominant in this House. But, sir, said he, as distrust and allegations of fraud against public officers and public contractors are not only the order of this debate, but the order of the day, he could not sit still and hear those charges made, without repelling them in the most pointed and unequivocal manner. Sir, he continued, on what grounds, and on what evidence, are these charges made? They are supported by not a single vestige of truth. What head of department has refused to furnish the most ample information? Had the

H. OF R.

House called, in a single instance, on the head of that department charged with the disbursement of the intended appropriation, and has he refused fully and amply to answer such call? Let an instance be pointed out. But contractors are charged with fraud and wilful dishonesty in the performance of their contracts. No charges are easier made; but, sir, the merest reptile that crawls on the earth should be shielded from criminal imputation till evidence can be produced for such charge. This House presents now, as it has for some time back presented, the extraordinary spectacle of a tribunal for criminal accusations; and still more extraordinary is it that these accusations are made upon public rumor, hearsay, and out-of-door accusation, and, when proof is demanded, (which he now demanded,) nothing tangible exists!

Sir, every avenue and subject of legislation here seem to be bottomed on suspicion and distrust. In this spirit the gentleman from Vermont, (MR. MALLARY,) and from North Carolina, (MR. WILLIAMS,) say that no account has been given of the money appropriated for fortifications. Have they asked information on this point? And, if they have, let them show when and where it has been refused? Sir, your public officers must have your confidence to a certain extent, otherwise the Government stops; but, if any member will or can show that all matters of contract, in every part of this vast continent, cannot be fully shown and faithfully accounted for by the Secretary of War, then he would join in the present unjust cry of accusation. To cast a prejudice, however, against the granting the appropriation in this instance, it is said that a gentleman, (not here to defend himself,) a clerk in the War Department, was interested in a contract to build the fortification at the Rip Raps. He was, he said, one of a committee, at the last session, for the investigation of these very contracts, (together with the gentleman from Tennessee, MR. COCKE, and one from New York, MR. STORRS, which last took notes on the examination at length, and who he was sorry not to see in his place;) he should state the facts, as far as he could remember them. Sir, it appeared that this gentleman was once interested in the contract; but he did not become so till nine months after the contract was entered into, and at the very time when the contract was thought to be a bad one; for stone of a particular kind, much nearer the fortification, was refused or rejected, and the undertaker had to get it at perhaps twice the distance. Immediately, however, after the rising of the last session, this gentleman, (the chief clerk,) supposing that he would be subjected to further accusation, as he had already been to flagrant misrepresentation, entirely discharged himself, by consent of all parties, from this famous contract.

The gentleman from New York (MR. TRACY, of the "Ways and Means,") has said that the fort at Mobile Point was disproportioned in size to the good to be produced by it. Sir, said he, it is admitted that, shallow as the water is at that point, it is deep enough for vessels of eighteen feet; and, although these are not of the largest size, yet the number may be multiplied; and, so far from two little towns only to be protected, as stated by the member from Georgia, (MR. COBB,) this river waters, and these forts would protect, the immensely rich country up the Alabama, and is nearly connected with the lake leading to that most important point—New Orleans. These forts, with the important ones on the Chesapeake, are pronounced by gentlemen to be worthless, and that their progress ought to be instantly stopped. After the surveys, most diligently and skillfully made, by some of the first engineers in the world, acquiring their professions by years of the most diligent and profound study, who have disinterestedly fixed the sites of these forts, he would as soon go into the Supreme Court, without ever having studied law, and pronounce a legal opinion, as to pronounce in this House, without any professional skill, that these fortifications are worthless.

The gentleman from New York (MR. TRACY) says he conceives the estimates of money for the Rip Raps are not at all to be relied on, because a very large sum (perhaps upwards of $400,000 out of an estimate of near a million) was given, or contracted to be given, for stone alone. Sir, this is by no means wonderful, when it is considered that the whole of the fortification, from the depth of the water, is to be raised by stone; that, in fact, stone is the principal, and almost the only, material of the work.

But prospective contracts, as they are called, are improper, and ought not to be entered into. Sir, said he, a resolution of this kind would destroy your public works, or cause you to pay more than double the price for their erection. Contracts are not to be prospective! And pray, sir, said he, will gentlemen have the goodness to point out what other contracts can be entered into? Will they show how the public works are to be executed?

Sir, said he, I rose unexpectedly, under an imperious sense of duty, and to demand evidence of that general and hateful distrust, jealousy, and spirit of crimination, which are urged to fill our minds with prejudice, unfit us for dispassionate legislation, and which seem intended to sap the foundations of our national defence. He deemed the Navy, from the very nature and situation of the country, our most indispensable defensive institution. Fortifications and the Army come next. May the efforts which seem to be making, not merely to lessen, but to destroy them, be arrested.

The Committee rose, and reported the amendments which had been made to the bill. The question on concurrence in the appropriation for completing the arsenal at Augusta was decided by yeas and nays—yeas 66, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Moore, T. L. Moore, Murray, Patterson, Philson, Richards, Richmond, Ross, Russ, Sloan, Stevens, Strong of Vermont, Tracy, Tucker of Virginia, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina—48.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, renewed the motion which he had made for the specific appropriation of $40,000 for fortifications at Mobile Point, and $40,000 for the fortification at Dauphin Island. On suggestion of Mr. F. JOHNSON, of Virginia, Mr. B. modified his motion so as to make it $30,000 for each point. The question having been divided, on the motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the question was first taken on the appropriation for Mobile Point, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 43, as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Mass. Anderson, Archer of Md., Archer of Va., Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Blackledge, Bloomfield, Brush, Bryan, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Case, Clark, Cook, Crowell, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Denison, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Fay, Ford, Fuller, Gorham, Gray, Hackley, Hobart, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Kent, Kinsey, Little, McLean of Kentucky, Meigs, R. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Tennessee, Bateman, Beecher, Buffum, Cocke, Crawford, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Floyd, Foot, Forrest, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hall of New York, Hardin, Hendricks, Hooks, Hostetter, Jones of Tennessee, Lathrop, Lincoln, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, Mallary, Metcalf, Monell, T. L. Moore, Moseley, Patterson, Plumer, Richards, Richmond, Ross, Russ, Sloan, Strong of Vermont, Tomlinson, Tracy, Tucker of South Carolina, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina.

So this clause of the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the remaining clause of Mr. BUTLER's motion, and decided in the negative—yeas 31, nays 85, as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brush, Butler of Louisiana, Crawford, Crowell, Cushman, Cuthbert, Edwards of North Carolina, Jackson, Johnson, Little, McLean of Kentucky, Montgomery, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Pitcher, Reid, Robertson, Sawyer, Sergeant, Simkins, Smith of New Jersey, Swearingen, and Tucker of Virginia.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts,

Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Barbour, Bateman, Beecher, Blackledge, Bryan, Buffum, Cannon, Case, Clark, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Culpeper, Dane, Denison, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Fay, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Ford, Forrest, Fuller, Gorham, Gray, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hardin, Hemphill, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Hostetter, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kent, Lathrop, Lincoln, Livermore, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, Mallary, Meigs, Monell, S. Smyth of Virginia, Stevens, Street, Strong of Vermont, Tomlinson, Tracy, Tucker of South Carolina, Udree, Walker, Wendover, Whitman, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wood.

So this clause of the amendment was rejected.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

SATURDAY, March 3.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the Senate's bill to amend the act, entitled "An act supplementary to 'An act entitled an act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine," reported the same without amendment; and the question being on ordering it to be read a third time—Mr. BALDWIN, regarding it as conflicting with the salutary provisions of the appraisement law, expressed his hope that it would not pass. Mr. SILSSEE supported the bill at some length, as being important to the importing merchants. Mr. BALDWIN replied, and stated that the lateness of the session would prevent the obtaining proper information on the subject; one fact, however, he knew from the best authority, viz: that an association had been formed in England to throw goods into this country at an under valuation, and that their names had been communicated to the Treasury, and by the Treasury to the custom-house officers. Mr. B. concluded by moving that the bill lie on the table; which motion was agreed to.

The Committee on the Public Lands, the Committee of Claims, and the Committee on Naval Affairs, were discharged from the further consideration of all petitions and other matters to them respectively referred at the present session, upon which they have not reported to the House.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Richard W. Meade, and it was laid on the table.

Mr. SWEARINGEN, from the select committee, to which was referred the petition of Catharine Wager, and others, made a report thereon, accompanied with a bill for the relief of the widow and children of John Wager, junior, deceased; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Buntin,"

MARCH, 1821.

The Navy.

H. OF R.

with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments were read, and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled, "An act to authorize the building of lighthouses on Cross and Pond Islands, in the harbor of Boothbay, and at the mouth of Oswego river, and placing buoys on the shoals of Nantucket and Vineyard sound, near the harbor of Wickford, and on the Altamaha river, and for other purposes," were read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said amendments; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported its agreement to the said amendments, which were concurred in by the House, together with that proposed to the title thereof.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, viz:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: We have the pleasure of informing you, that, in the case of Anderson vs. Dunn (with the defence of which we had the honor to be charged on behalf of the House of Representatives,) the Supreme Court has fully affirmed the power of the House, sui juris, to vindicate its own privileges against every attack of violence or fraud, necessarily tending to control the freedom, or taint the purity of legislative deliberation.

The interest so justly manifested by the House, in the issue of this important question, has induced us to communicate, without delay, the determination of the court, in order that it may be known to the House before its approaching separation.

We have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servants,

WM. WIRT,
W. JONES.

WASHINGTON, March 2, 1821.

The said letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State, delivered in the following report:

The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State, report—

That they have attended to the duties imposed on them by order of the House, as far as the business of the House would possibly permit, since the committee was appointed, and that they find the accounts and expenditures of the said Department to be correct.

That they have also, conformably to the order of the House, inquired into the facts relating to the employment of an agent on behalf of the United States, under the 6th and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, and find that Mr. Joseph Delafield was employed during the past year, as a secretary, for the performance of the duties which would have been required of an agent, under the said articles. They find, however, that the employment of Mr. Delafield, or some person in that capacity, was indispensable to the interests of the United States; that the compensation allowed to Mr. Delafield was much less than the salary of an agent; and that the allowance of such compensation is not, in their opinion, improper or unreasonable. The committee respectfully refer the House, for the particular facts relating thereto, to the Message from the Executive Department on that subject.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1821," were read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said amendments; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported their agreement to the amendments, which were concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to establish a port of entry in the district of Sandusky, in the State of Ohio," were read, and concurred in by the House.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1821," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the term of Samuel Parker's patents for his improvement in currying and finishing leather of all kinds," was read the third time, and passed.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to establish an additional land office in the Territory of Michigan, were discharged from the consideration of the same, and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read, and is as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I communicate to the two Houses of Congress copies of a treaty this day ratified on the part of the United States, concluded and signed at the Indian Springs, on the 8th of January last, with the Creek nation of Indians, in order to such legislative measures as may be necessary for giving effect to it.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 2, 1821.

The Message was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the location of land warrants, and the issuing of patents in certain cases," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the location of warrants, and the issuing of patents in certain cases," were read, and concurred in by the House.

THE NAVY.

The House proceeded to consider the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States:"

The second section whereof is in the words following, viz:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, instead of the appropriation therein contained, there shall be and is hereby appropriated the sum of five hundred thousand dollars per annum for six years, from the year 1821, inclusive, to be applied to carry into effect the purposes of the said act.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to amend the said second section by striking out the word six, and inserting in lieu thereof the word three; to strike out the words "to be applied to carry into effect the purposes of the said act," and to add to the section the following words, viz:

"To be applied to the purchase of the remaining materials necessary for the construction of the ships authorized by the said act, and to their construction, so far as to frame, plank, bolt, and stay them, and their preservation, by the erection of houses over them; and any balance thereof which may remain after the completion of these objects to be applied to the equipment of said vessels."

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 66, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. THE GENERAL POST OFFICE.

Mr. PHELPS, from the committee appointed on the 19th of December to investigate the concerns of the Post Office Department, made a further report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. It is as follows:

The select committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Post Office Department, beg leave further to report, in part; that the abstract of payments for transporting the mail from Washington city to Fredericksburg, and the Postmaster General's explanation of it, cannot be understood but in connexion with three mail contracts, and abstracts of the payments of them. These contracts are, one with Hazlewood Farish for the transportation of the mail, in the years 1814, 1815, and 1816, from Fredericksburg to Charlottesville; one with Woolfolk, Smock, & Co., for transportation of the mail, in the same years, from Charlottesville to Richmond; and the other with William G. Garner for transportation of the mail, in the same years, from Charlottesville to Staunton. The committee obtained copies of those mail contracts, and also of the abstracts of payments rendered by this Department to the Comptroller of the Treasury, for explanatory evidence. But, as these documents contain important facts, they are not reported as explanatory evidence only, but to show the expenditure of public money for transporting the mails upon these routes.

The committee find that the contract price for carrying the mail from Washington city to Fredericksburg, in the years 1814, 1815, and 1816, was	9,900 00
From Fredericksburg to Charlottesville, in same years	7,200 00
From Fredericksburg to Richmond, for the same years	10,500 00
From Charlottesville to Staunton, for the same years	3,000 00
	$30,600 00

The committee find that there was paid for transporting the mail, in the years 1814, 1815, and 1816, upon these four routes, the following amount:

[On the subject of the above Report, the following note was addressed to the Printers to Congress by the Postmaster General:]

GENERAL POST OFFICE, March 15, 1821.

MESSRS. GALES & SEATON: I was informed by a portion of the committee of investigation that the annexed document was to have formed a part of their report. Presuming that some mistake had caused the omission, I addressed a note to the Clerk of the House of Representatives upon the subject, a copy of whose reply is annexed. I likewise addressed a note to the printers of Congress upon the same subject, whose reply is likewise annexed. I shall write to the chairman, requesting him to cause it to be restored to the proper files. I deem it due to justice to give the whole publication in your paper, and I will thank you to publish it without delay.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
R. J. MEIGS, JR.

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REFS.,
March 6, 1821.

SIR: Yours of this morning is before me; in answer to which I have the honor to state that the report by Mr. PHELPS, on Saturday evening, was received and ordered to lie on the table, (the reading having been dispensed with,) and the report and accompanying papers ordered to be printed. I never opened the papers, and therefore can only say that, if the letter alluded to formed part of the documents, it will be found with the report, which is yet in the hands of Messrs. Gales & Seaton, as printers to the House of Representatives of the United States.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your humble servant,

THO. DOUGHERTY, Clerk.

Hon. R. J. MEIGS, Postmaster General.

WASHINGTON, March 6, 1821.

There was no letter from the Postmaster General accompanying the second report of the committee of investigation, as delivered at the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the undersigned.

GALES & SEATON.

GENERAL POST OFFICE, March 3, 1821.

SIR: It was stated to the committee, in my previous verbal communications, that, owing to the state of war and other circumstances, the contracts for carrying the mail between Richmond and New York, and some others, were partially vacated by my predecessor in 1813, and new agreements were entered into, making adequate compensation for the service.

It seemed to be considered in my conversation with the committee that the route from Washington to Fredericksburg was, on account of the increased pay to Colonel Tayloe, the strongest case, and that was taken as a sample for investigation. My remarks in relation to that route apply in extenso to all the others, with the exception of an additional trip per week between Fredericksburg and Charlottesville, and between Charlottesville and Staunton. I am now advised that another portion of these routes has been started in the committee at this late hour, and that it contains the aggregate payments for carrying the mail on the routes from this to Fredericksburg, already discussed and reported on, with that of four or five other routes, and that those are contrasted with the aggregate of the payments, that might have been made in several years, if the contracts had not been vacated. But it has already been shown that the carriage of the mail, according to the contracts, was not then satisfactory to the public; and it is difficult to perceive the utility of contrasting an operation which answers its object with one which has become useless. The accumulation of the amount of expenditure on many routes, for several years, serves to make a great sum, but by no means shows its disproportion to its real worth.

But it seems we must at this late hour recur to first principles; and the chairman has asked if I had a right to alter contracts. The Postmaster General has by law the power of causing the public mails to be transported in such manner as he shall deem expedient and most promotive of the public interest. The law declares "that he shall provide for the carriage of the mail on all post roads that are or may be established by law, and as often as he, having regard to the productiveness thereof, and other circumstances, may think proper." And, in the schedule of the contracts, provision is made for any alteration which the Postmaster General shall direct.

In a country like this, where new villages, towns, counties, and even States, are continually rising, the post office arrangements cannot be permanent, but must vary with the exigency of the times. It was under this authority, and the then existing circumstances of the nation, that my predecessor made the alteration, which produced the enlargement of expenditure.

When I afterwards came into the superintendency of the department, I did not deem it decorous or expedient to annul the arrangement of my predecessor, supported as he was, in that arrangement, by the highest authorities of the nation. But if I had, it would not have been practicable on this route, even after the return of peace, for, as I had stated in my communication to the former committee of investigation, a steamboat had been established between this place and Fredericksburg.

The price of conveying the mail by contract was predicated on its being carried in stages, to be supported by passengers. This price was altogether below the expense of carrying it in carriages. The establishment of the steamboat took away the passengers, and of course a support for the stages. They have not run since, excepting for a short time in the winter, when they cannot carry the mail. The establishment of the steamboat applied with like injury to the stages running between Fredericksburg and Richmond; for the steamboat ran to suit its own convenience, and not so as to throw its passengers into a line of stages that could carry the mail; and no alteration could be made in the arrangement of the mail to suit that object without producing an inconvenience to the large cities from which most of the revenue of the establishment was derived. But, if the contracts had not been vacated in the beginning, no material advantage could have been derived from it, for the proprietors could not have sustained the expense without certain loss, if not ruin; and new contracts would have been as high, and probably much higher. If the committee had cause to believe the compensation paid to the contractors too high, the contractors were at hand and could have been summoned to show their actual expenditures. They could have given them all the minutiae in that respect, necessary to the formation of a proper estimate.

The subject has been in the hands of the committee upwards of three months. The chairman has indeed been out of health a short time; but there has been most ample time for a full investigation when the chairman was in health.

There has not been time, since your communication of the amount paid for carrying the mail on sundry routes has been handed me, to make a proper comparison and statement of particulars. But I find it embraces payments and credits for services in 1813, for carrying the mail between Richmond and Charlottesville; for express mails to the President, and for expresses sent with the President's despatches in relation to the conclusion of peace; but the whole amount has not yet been ascertained. In concluding my remarks, you will permit me very respectfully to add, that, in investigating the concerns of the General Post Office the office itself would seem to be the proper theatre for operation. There the books, papers, officers, and clerks, are all at hand, to show what may be desired, and to elucidate what might appear to be doubtful. These the condensed statements rendered to the Treasury can neither show nor elucidate. And here, although I have had the pleasure to see all the other members of the committee, I have not had that of seeing yourself, the chairman, at whose instance the investigation was instituted. I am sensible that a practical economy is everywhere due to the principles of this Government; and, though a decided friend to official responsibility, I may be permitted to observe, that the chief of a Department has every motive, of loyalty to his nation, of honor, and of justice to his own moral and legal obligation, and of respect to his own reputation, to avoid an unnecessary and prodigal disbursement of public moneys. If a contrary presumption is to prevail, the rule of law is reversed, and a system of political ethics is to be introduced founded on palpable error and injustice.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. J. MEIGS, Jr.

Hon. E. PRELPS, Chairman, &c.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

Mr. COCKE submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That this House will forthwith proceed to ballot for a printer to execute its work during the next Congress, according to the provisions of the resolution "directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed; fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a printer or printers," passed on the 3d day of March, 1819.

The SPEAKER put the previous question of consideration on this motion, and it was determined in the affirmative. Mr. Sergeant moved to lay it on the table; which was negatived. The resolution was then agreed to. The SPEAKER then laid before the House letters from E. De Krafft, Elliot & Irvine, Davis & Force, and Gales & Seaton, offering themselves as candidates for this employment; the first named offering to do the work for 25 per cent. less than the prices established by the act of March 3, 1819, and the second named offering to do it for 25½ per cent. less. An attempt was then made by Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, and Mr. WOOD, of New York, to suspend or dispense with the election; but the motion for that purpose was pronounced out of order, the House having determined to proceed forthwith to the election. The House then balloted accordingly, and the tellers (Mr. GROSS, Mr. BEECHER, and Mr. COBB) reported that the votes were—

For Gales & Seaton	-	-	-	-	87
Elliot & Irvine	-	-	-	-	31
Davis & Force	-	-	-	-	9
E. De Krafft	-	-	-	-	6

and that Gales & Seaton were of course elected.

In the Senate, the election took place on the same day, on the motion of Mr. BARBOUR. The votes in that body were—

For Gales & Seaton	-	-	-	-	23
Scattering	-	-	-	-	3

The House proceeded to consider the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act for regulating process in the courts of the United States;" whereupon, it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

The House then adjourned until five o'clock, P. M.

Five o'clock, P. M.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States;'" and "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for regulating process in the courts of the United States;'" were severally read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to establish an additional Land Office in the Territory of Michigan," was read the third time; when

Mr. ROSS moved that it lie on the table; which motion being negatived, the question was taken, Shall the bill pass? and passed in the affirmative.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Speaker resumed the chair, and Mr. LATHROP reported that the Committee had again had the state of the Union under consideration, and directed him to report the bill thereto committed on the 27th February ultimo, for carrying into execution the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at Washington the 22d of February, 1819, with several amendments; which were read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill was then further amended; and

A motion was made by Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, further to amend the same by inserting after the word Territories, where it first occurs in the second section, these words: "not incompatible with the Constitution and laws of the United States;" so that the civil, military, and judicial powers exercised by the Spanish authorities within the territories of East and West Florida, and which are established by the said bill for the government of said territories until otherwise provided, shall "not be incompatible with the Constitution and laws of the United States."

And the question being taken to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Speaker resumed the chair, and Mr. COBB reported that the Committee had again had the state of the Union under consideration, and directed him to report the bill thereto committed on the 26th of February ultimo, to authorize the President of the United States to borrow a sum not exceeding four millions five hundred thousand dollars, without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz:

"An act for carrying into execution the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at Washington, the 22d of February, 1819;" and "An act to authorize the President of the United States to borrow a sum not exceeding four million five hundred thousand dollars," were severally read a third time, and passed.

A motion was made by Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, that the several orders of the day which precede the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Missouri," be postponed for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was negatived by the House.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill to continue in force an act, entitled "An act regulating the currency within the United States of the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain," passed the 29th day of April, 1816, so far as the same relates to the crowns and five-franc pieces of France, be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that the said bill be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

The House proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of General Robert Swartwout." Whereupon, it was ordered that the bill be committed to a committee of the whole House to-day.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; which was reported without amendment, read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Shields and others;" which was reported without amendment, read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to continue in force an act entitled 'An act regulating the currency within the United States of the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain,'" passed the 29th day of April, 1816, so far as the same relates to the crowns and five-franc pieces of France," was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish the salaries of the commissioners and agents appointed under the Treaty of Ghent. The bill was reported with sundry amendments, which were concurred in by the House; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have elected Gales & Seaton printers, on their part, in pursuance of the resolution of Congress of the 3d of March, 1819. They have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1821," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1821," were read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said amendments; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported their disagreement to the same. The question was then taken to concur with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the said amendments, and passed in the affirmative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House of the following title, viz: "An act to continue in force an act entitled 'An act regulating the currency within the United States of the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain,'" passed on the 29th day of April, 1816, so far as the same relates to the crowns and five-franc pieces of France," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Another message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House of the following title, viz: "An act to authorize the President of the United States to borrow a sum not exceeding four millions five hundred thousand dollars," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act establishing the salaries of the commissioners and agents appointed under the Treaty of Ghent," was read the third time, and passed.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. CLAY rose, and addressed the House to the following effect:

I rise to submit a motion, which, if it should conciliate the general concurrence of this House, I shall be extremely glad. The present session was commenced under very unpleasant auspices. In the appointment of a presiding officer of the House, the first manifestation was made of that unfortunate division of opinion which has been the peculiar characteristic of the session. The storm has happily subsided, and we have the great satisfaction to behold the ship of our Confederacy unimpaired by its rage; her hull, her rigging, and her patriotic crew completely fit for a long and glorious voyage, under the star-spangled banner which proudly floats aloft.

The moral of that agitating drama, of which for more than two years past our country has been the theatre, is that, whilst our Federal Union is admirably fitted to accomplish all the national purposes for which it was intended, there are delicate subjects, exclusively appertaining to the several States, which cannot be touched but by them, without the greatest hazard to the public tranquillity. They resemble those secluded apartments in our respective domicils, which are dedicated to family privacy, into which our nearest and best neighbors should not enter. Let us terminate the session by making that officer the depository of our entire reconciliation, whose election first elicited our divisions, and whose situation has been extremely arduous and difficult. For my part, I have great pleasure in testifying to the assiduity, impartiality, ability, and promptitude, with which he has administered the duties of the Chair since I was able to take my seat. I move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be given to the honorable JOHN W. TAYLOR, for the assiduity, promptitude, and ability, with which he has administered the duties of the Chair.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, (who was temporarily in the Chair,) having stated the question—

Mr. RHEA said he hoped this resolution would obtain an unanimous vote. He had been long a member of this House, and he had never seen the duties of the Chair discharged more satisfactorily than by the present Speaker.

Mr. HARDIN said, that it was with great satisfaction he should vote for this resolution, because it met his entire approbation. To be candid, the Speaker had, in the discharge of the duties of the Chair, far outgone his expectations; and he would vote him the thanks proposed with a great deal of pleasure.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, and decided in the affirmative, one negative voice only being heard.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the military service of the United States for the year 1821," except the latter part of the last of the said amendments, from which latter they recede.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate informing this House that they insist on certain of their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1821." Whereupon, it was, on motion of Mr. HARDIN, resolved that this House doth insist on their disagreement to the amendments aforesaid.

[The following is the substance of Mr. SIMKINS's remarks on the motion to insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate's amendments of the military appropriation bill.]

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that neither the extraordinary zeal of the member from Kentucky (Mr. HARDIN) or of the member from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) against the amendments to this bill, made by the Senate, will prevent the House giving them that most serious and deliberate consideration to which they are entitled. Sir, it has been somewhat fashionable, in this House, not only to distrust a co-ordinate branch of the Government, but to reject their acts, with a haste and an impatience bordering on contempt. I do not think that a body so grave and dignified has deserved such treatment. On the contrary, it must be admitted, by all impartial men, that for two years past its wisdom and firmness have rescued this nation from the most disastrous measures. Dislike as we may the opposition of this branch of our Legislature to certain favorite doctrines and favorite measures impetuously urged upon us by the majority of this House, yet we shall be compelled to respect it, as a barrier to great evils, and as a body to which the people look with anxious and increasing solicitude.

The member from Kentucky (Mr. HARDIN) says, that every thing wears the appearance of bustle and activity of preparation, as if we were about to be involved in war. Nothing, sir, can be further from the fact. The Senate amend our bill by adding a comparatively small sum, say about $200,000, for carrying on the most indispensable fortifications of our country, placed with the most perfect skill, and after accurate and skilful surveys on our exposed points; a sum altogether but little more than one half of what has been appropriated for a series of years; and the gentleman calls this a great preparation for war. Sir, so far from preparing for those perilous exigencies which must arise, we are retrograding into a state of apathy most alarming to every American who can extend his views beyond the present moment. We assume to ourselves a wisdom which brands with the imputation of folly and extravagance every session of Congress since the late war. Eight hundred thousand dollars annually has been most deliberately resolved upon as the sum necessary for these important works for several years, and now you reduce it down to $300,000, without a solitary reason to justify you. I say without a shadow of reason; for who will say that these works are less important with an exhausted Treasury than they were with a full one? You last year appropriated $800,000, and allow the Secretary of War to make contracts for this year, in some degree, at least, proportioned to a similar appropriation. After he has made the contracts, and pledged the faith of the nation, you desert him, by offering a small sum which will not cover them, and but little more than preserve the works and materials. You break the faith of the nation, ruin public contractors, and send them petitioning at your heels, for years, for damages sustained by your conduct; and which you will be compelled in the end to pay. This is not all. You so prostrate the United States' credit that nobody will work for you without double price. Besides this, you impede, and finally will endanger, the important defences of the country. Fortifications placed at proper points, and well built, have been determined, by the universal consent of all ages and nations, to be of infinite moment; and yet it is found out by the talent and wisdom of this Congress, and of this Congress alone, that they are of little importance, and have been pronounced by some gentlemen to be absolutely worthless! This Congress may be the wisest of any, but its policy is diametrically opposed to the policy of every session since the war. Indeed, we have heard some gentlemen pinning their whole faith on the Committee of Ways and Means, and have given a decided preference to the sweeping judgment of this committee, not a member of which will pretend even to have become scientifically acquainted with the subject of engineering, against the opinions of all your officers, and particularly against some of the first engineers that ever adorned the scientific annals of any country on earth!

Closing Business.

H. OF R.

The chairman of that committee has boldly taken upon himself the responsibility of condemning the fort on Dauphin Island as utterly useless. I will not detain the House further on this point than to say, that it has been demonstrated by the gentlemen from Louisiana and Kentucky (Messrs. BUTLER and JOHNSON) that this fort will effectually command the waters of a spacious and deep harbor, which a naval enemy would instantly possess, and, with it, seize Dauphin Island, which would give them a secure and perfect foot-hold, from which they would not only destroy our trade up the bay, but annoy the whole adjacent country, stop the communication to New Orleans by the lake, and materially injure Pensacola. This is no dream; the facts are palpable to every man who has actually examined the country, and yet such men are flatly contradicted by members here, not distinguished for military science, and who have never for a moment placed their eyes on the spot!

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HARDIN) says the best means of defence is to make the people easy and happy, by lightening their burdens. Sir, we have never imposed any burdens; and, from the temper of this House, can it be supposed that any ever will be imposed? In truth, it seems that every institution would be prostrated, destroyed, and sunk, sooner than tax the people; although they would never hesitate to pay taxes indispensable to the due and vigorous and proper support of the Government. Taxes present no such frightful and hideous monster to the people as they are represented here. They are, to be sure, the constant, never ceasing bugbear presented to our view, whenever an army, navy, or fortifications, are to be preserved and perfected. It seems to be no crime to make the people pay taxes indirectly, by way of impost; whilst it is horrible, and unpardonable, past endurance, to ask these same people to pay taxes directly levied upon them. It is laudable, if you can cheat them into the payment, but past forgiveness, if you openly tell them to pay! It is, however, matter of joy that our essential preparations may be preserved for many years to come, and perfected without the imposition of a single additional tax of any kind, notwithstanding the eternal noise made about taxes.

Sir, a single hour will put an end to my existence as a member of this body; but I cannot take my leave without expressing my most unfeigned sorrow at the ruinous fluctuating policy now pursued by the representatives of the people. I hope (and the hope is indeed faint) that we shall agree to the amendments made by the Senate.

CLOSING BUSINESS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to borrow a sum not exceeding four millions five hundred thousand dollars;" and the same being read twice, were disagreed to.

That portion of the said bill to which the third amendment proposed by the Senate applies, reads thus, viz: "reimbursable at the will of the Government, and at the will of the creditor, at any time after the first day of January, 1835."

The third amendment of the Senate proposes to strike out the words, and at the will of the creditor.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to amend the said third amendment so as to make the aforesaid clause in the bill read thus: "reimbursable at the will of the Government at any time before the first day of January, 1835; and at the will either of the Government or the creditor, at any time after that period."

And the question being taken to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative; and the said amendment was then concurred in by the House.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force an act, entitled 'An act regulating the currency within the United States of the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain,' passed on the 29th day of April, 1816, so far as the same relates to the crowns and five-franc pieces of France," was read and concurred in by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. CANNON, that the several orders of the day which precede the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians" be postponed, for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration.

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. SERGEANT moved that the several orders of the day which precede the bill authorizing Benjamin H. Rand to import a certain piece of plate free of duty, be postponed, for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was rejected by the House.

Closing Business.

MARCH, 1821.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The treaty concluded between the United States and the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, on the 30th of July, 1820, having been ratified, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, I now lay a copy of the said treaty before the House of Representatives, in order to such legislative provisions being made as may be necessary to carry into effect the stipulations therein contained, on the part of the United States.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 3, 1821.

The Message was ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force for a further time the act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes.'"

A motion was made by Mr. STORRS to amend the said bill, by striking out June, and inserting February, so as to limit the continuance of the said act to the 1st day of February, 182—, instead of the 1st day of June, 182—, as provided for in the said bill.

The question being taken to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

The Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill authorizing the settlement of the accounts of the late Le Roy Opie, were discharged from the consideration thereof, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

Mr. FULLER moved that the several orders of the day, which precede the bill to incorporate the United States Naval Association, for the relief of the families of deceased officers, be postponed for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was rejected by the House.

Mr. RHEA moved that the several orders of the day, which precede the bill concerning invalid pensioners, be postponed, for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was rejected by the House.

Mr. SAMUEL MOORE moved that the several orders of the day, which precede the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act explanatory of the act for the relief of James Leander Cathcart," passed May 15, 1820, be postponed for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was rejected by the House.

Mr. CULPEPER moved that the several orders of the day, which precede the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens, and Austin L. Sands, legal representatives of Richardson Sands, deceased, and others," be postponed, for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was rejected by the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved that the several orders of the day, which precede the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William Whitehead and others," be postponed, for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was rejected by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. CANNON, that the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians," be discharged from the consideration thereof.

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts of the late Le Roy Opie," was read the third time, and passed.

A motion was made by Mr. JOHNSON that the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Missouri," be discharged from the consideration thereof.

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. COBB then moved that the several orders of the day which precede the said bill be postponed, for the purpose of taking the same into consideration. This motion was also negatived by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to borrow a sum not exceeding four millions five hundred thousand dollars," and ask a conference upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said amendments; to which conference they have appointed managers on their part. The Senate further insist on their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1821," and ask a conference upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said amendments; to which conference they have appointed managers on their part.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate informing this House that they insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to borrow a sum not exceeding four millions five hundred thousand dollars;" whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do recede from their disagreement to the said amendments.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate asking a conference upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1821:" whereupon

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the conference asked by the Senate upon the subject of the amendments depending to the said bill, and that managers be appointed to attend the same on their part.

Mr. HARDIN, Mr. TRACY, and Mr. COBB, were appointed managers in pursuance of the foregoing resolution.

titled "An act for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens, and Austin L. Sands, legal representatives of Richardson Sands, deceased, and others," be postponed, for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was again rejected by the House.

Mr. CANNON moved that the several orders of the day which precede the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians," be postponed, for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was again rejected by the House.

Mr. BEECHER moved that the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out the road therein mentioned,' be now read the second time; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bills from the Senate, entitled "An act providing for the adjudication and payment of claims arising under the Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty;" and "An act to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and establish a temporary government therein;" and that the said bills lie on the table.

A motion was made, by Mr. RHEA, that the several orders of the day which precede the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians," be postponed, for the purpose of taking that bill into consideration. This motion was again rejected by the House.

Mr. HARDIN, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend a conference with the managers appointed on the part of the Senate, upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments depending to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1821," reported, that they had met the managers on the part of the Senate, and conferred freely upon the subjects committed to them; that they had agreed to recommend to the House of Representatives to recede from their disagreement to the residue of the fourth amendment of the Senate, containing an appropriation for carrying into effect the treaty concluded on the 30th of July last, between the United States and the Kickapoo tribe of Indians; and that they could come to no agreement whatever upon the subject of the other amendments depending to the said bill.

Mr. HARDIN then moved that this House adhere to their disagreement to the said amendments, with the exception of the residue of the fourth. Pending the question on this motion, a message was received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate recede from all their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1821."
